MCLELLAN v. MCLELLAN.

C [PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Karminski, J.), November 23, 1953.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Order for periodical payments—Date of commencement of payments—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1).

D By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1): "Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife . . . the court . . . may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just . . ." On an application by the wife under that sub-section,

E HELD: the court had discretion under the sub-section to order payments to be made as from the date of the summons, and not merely from the date of the finding of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 23 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 410; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 84, 85, Nos. 631-636.

APPLICATION by the wife.

F On May 27, 1953, the wife issued a summons for maintenance under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1). The husband was at that time paying maintenance at the rate of £500 a year free of income tax, and he paid sums of £125 on June 10, 1953, and on Aug. 6, 1953. On Nov. 13, 1953, KARMINSKI, J., found that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife. HIS LORDSHIP found the husband's annual income to be G £3,750, and the wife's to be £250, and ordered the husband to pay £850 a year less tax during joint lives, together with a further £150 a year less tax to be secured to the wife for her life. The wife now applied for an order that the payments should be made as from the date of the summons, alleging that the payments by the husband on June 10, 1953, and on Aug. 6, 1953, were in respect of the periods March-April-May and June-July-August, so that if the H payments under the order were to be made from the date of the order, namely Nov. 13, 1953, the wife would have been without maintenance for three months. On behalf of the husband it was contended (i) that under s. 23 (1) there was no provision for an order for alimony pendente lite, so that until the court had found the husband guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance there could be no award, and, therefore, the order for periodical payments could be effective only from the date of that finding, i.e., Nov. 13, 1953; (ii) that the payments made by the husband on June 10 and Aug. 6, 1953, were in respect of the periods May-June-July and August-September-October; that the wife had not been left destitute; and, therefore, that on the merits the order should be effective from Nov. 13, 1953.

Ormrod for the wife.

V. O. Williams for the husband.

KARMINSKI, J.: I think I have power under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), once wilful neglect by the husband to provide reasonable maintenance has been proved, to order payments to be made from the date of the summons. The sub-section says that

“ . . . the court . . . may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just . . . ”

The sub-section does not indicate from what date the order may be effective. I think the sub-section is intended to leave the question of date, as a matter of discretion, to the court. If, as counsel for the husband has claimed, an order can run only from the finding of wilful neglect, gross injustice might be done to a wife. Counsel for the wife has indicated some of the mischief which might follow, such as an obstructive husband deliberately holding up the course of the inquiry by a refusal to disclose his means and the disobedience, perhaps, of an order for discovery.

I feel little doubt that it is intended that the court shall have power under s. 23 (1) to order payments from the date of the application, as in the not dissimilar case where alimony pendente lite is awarded. The court has power, which it usually exercises, to make the order for alimony pendente lite effective from the date of service of the petition, and the order for maintenance usually runs from decree absolute. I think the discretion of the court is sufficiently unfettered by the sub-section to allow me to order the payments to be made from the date of the summons. It is fair to say, first, that there has been no delay or obstruction by the husband, and secondly, although, in my view, he was guilty of neglect to provide reasonable maintenance, I could not possibly have found on the figures that he had neglected to pay any maintenance at all. I think it right to order the maintenance to run from the date of the summons, credit to be given by the wife for all sums received from the husband since that date.

Solicitors: Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker (for the wife); W. T. Donovan (for the husband).

JOZWIAK v. SADEK AND OTHERS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J., sitting with a jury), December 3, 4, 1953.]

Libel—Evidence—Identification of plaintiff as person libelled—Statements made at meetings—Anonymous telephone communications—Admissibility.

A In an action for libel in respect of words appearing in a newspaper, the defendants agreed that the words complained of bore the meaning alleged by the plaintiff, but denied that they related to him. The plaintiff sought to tender evidence of anonymous telephone messages received by him after publication of the matter complained of, and of statements made at public meetings, to show that the words complained of did relate to him.

B HELD: on authority and on general principle, evidence of the statements made at public meetings was admissible to show that the plaintiff was identified with the subject-matter complained of: Hough v. London Express Newspaper, Ltd. ([1940] 3 All E.R. 31), Cook v. Ward (1830) (6 Bing. 409), and Du Bost v. Beresford (1810) (2 Camp. 511), applied; and, further, that evidence of the telephone communications was admissible, although the jury should be warned to treat such evidence with caution.

ACTION for damages for libel.

The plaintiff, a prominent member of the Polish community in London, sued the defendants, the author, proprietors, publishers, editor and printers, in respect of a story in Polish which was published on Feb. 20 and 21, 1953, in the "Polish Daily", a newspaper which had a very wide circulation among members of the Polish émigré community throughout the United Kingdom. The story, which on the face of it was fiction, concerned two persons who had committed suicide because of financial difficulties, and the suggestion was that these difficulties had been caused in an indirect way by a man who was the chairman of an association. Two well-known members of the Polish émigré community had committed suicide some time before the story was published, and the plaintiff was at all material times the chairman of the Association of Polish Merchants and Industrialists in Great Britain, an association in the Polish community which existed for the purpose of bringing members of the community together for business reasons and assisting them in various ways. The plaintiff alleged that the story was intended to refer to him, and that he was the person described in the story as being responsible for the financial downfall and suicide of the two persons concerned. On the issue whether the words complained of related to him, the plaintiff sought to tender evidence of anonymous telephone messages received by him after publication of the story and of statements made at public meetings. The jury retired and legal argument was addressed to the court.

H Milmo for the plaintiff.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Stranger-Jones for the defendants.

ORMEROD, J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendants agrees that the words of the story bear the meaning alleged, but the issue is whether or not those words relate to the plaintiff, i.e., whether or not the person referred to in the story would be identified as the plaintiff in the minds of any persons knowing the circumstances.

In these circumstances, counsel for the plaintiff seeks to tender evidence of anonymous telephone messages which the plaintiff received after the publication of this story, accusing him of being a murderer, and also evidence of statements which were made at public meetings, showing that the persons present at those meetings did, in fact, identify the plaintiff with the individual referred to in the story. Counsel for the defendants objects to that, first, on the ground that the use of the term "murderer" is extending the innuendo as it is pleaded, and, secondly, on the ground that this evidence is purely hearsay, and that, in the circumstances, it should not be admitted. A

I have come to the conclusion that it should be admitted, and I have come to that conclusion, putting it shortly, on the authorities which have been cited to me by counsel for the plaintiff. In the first place, he referred to Hough v. London Express Newspaper, Ltd. (1), in which the question arose whether the plaintiff could be identified with the matters referred to, and it was held that the evidence of persons who lived in the same street as the plaintiff and in the same district could be admitted, as it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that they were persons who knew the special circumstances and might understand the words as having the meaning referred to. There are two older authorities which probably are more in point. One of them is Cook v. Ward (2), which was a libel action in which, in order to identify the plaintiff with the libel, evidence was called of laughter and statements which had been made at a vestry meeting. It was held that the evidence was admissible on that ground, i.e., on the ground that it identified the plaintiff with the subject of the libel. C Equally, in Du Bost v. Beresford (3), the question arose, although, in fact, the action was not a libel action, whether the subject of a picture was libellous, and it was held that evidence was admissible of remarks made by persons who saw the picture when it was exhibited, to show that those persons had identified the subject of the libel with the plaintiff. D The report is a short one, but the note is (2 Camp. 512):

"In the course of the trial LORD ELLENBOROUGH held upon argument, that the declarations of the spectators, while they looked at the picture in the exhibition room, were evidence to show that the figures portrayed were meant to represent the defendant's sister and brother-in-law." E

On the authority of those decisions, and indeed, I think, on the application of the ordinary principles of evidence, I feel that I ought to admit the evidence of statements made at meetings of the Polish community, or sections of the Polish community, which took place after the publication of this story; and if that be so, I fail to see that I am extending the principle if, at the same time, I hold that evidence of telephone communications to the plaintiff in which similar statements were made is admissible in evidence. It may be that such evidence is of no very great value, and quite clearly the jury will have to be warned to treat evidence of that kind with the caution which is necessary; but at the same time I fail to see that such evidence should not be admitted, and I rule that it should be, and is, admissible. R. v. RIDER.

[CHELMSFORD ASSIZES (Streatfeild, J., sitting with a jury), November 18, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Carnal knowledge—Girl under sixteen—Defence of reasonable belief—"First occasion"—Separate committals for trial on two separate occasions relating to two different girls—Trial on one indictment—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922 (c. 56), s. 2, proviso.

A By s. 2 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922: "Reasonable cause to believe that a girl was of or above the age of sixteen years shall not be a defence to a charge [of carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen] under s. 5 . . . of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 . . . Provided that in the case of a man of twenty-three years of age or under the presence of reasonable cause to believe that the girl was over the age of sixteen years shall be a valid defence on the first occasion on which he is charged with an offence under this section." The accused was committed on two separate occasions by justices for trial at assizes on two charges of carnal knowledge of two different girls between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years, contrary to s. 5. At the trial both charges were included in one indictment.

C HELD: (i) a "charge" was made within the meaning of the section when the accused was charged before a court which had jurisdiction to determine the matter in question; where justices committed the accused for trial, there was no "charge" until he was tried on indictment; and, therefore, the accused was "charged" for the first time at the trial.

D (ii) although the accused was committed for trial on separate occasions, both charges were joined in one indictment, and, therefore, the accused was charged on one "occasion" for the purposes of the proviso to s. 2 of the Act of 1922.

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Rogers, [1953] 1 All E.R. 206; [1953] 1 Q.B. 311; 117 J.P. 83.

F The accused, John Rider, was charged at the Essex Autumn Assizes at Chelmsford on Nov. 18, 1953, before STREATFEILD, J., on an indictment containing two counts charging him with carnal knowledge of two girls between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years on two separate occasions, contrary to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 5. He had been committed for trial on the charge relating to one of the girls, and then, on a later occasion, on the charge relating to the other girl. He sought to set up the statutory defence laid down in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 2, proviso.

G F. H. Lawton for the prosecution.

E. C. S. Russell for the accused.

H STREATFEILD, J.: I have to construe the meaning of s. 2 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, which amended s. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and laid down that reasonable cause to believe that a girl was of or above the age of sixteen should not be a defence to a charge under s. 5, provided, however, that in the case of a man of twenty-three years of age or under the presence of reasonable cause to believe that the girl was over the age of sixteen years should be a valid defence on the first occasion on which he was charged with an offence under s. 5.

The circumstances of this case are somewhat unusual. The accused is charged in respect of two girls under the age of sixteen and he was committed for trial by the justices in respect of one of them. He was then brought before the justices on a later and separate occasion and committed for trial in respect of the second girl, and the case now comes before me on both charges, joined in one indictment. He seeks to claim that he is entitled to set up the statutory defence in respect of not only one girl, but both girls, on the ground that this, today, at the assize is the first occasion on which he has been charged with an offence under the section.

I cannot help thinking that this situation was not contemplated by the draftsmen of the Act of 1922, but, nevertheless, I have to give a construction to the words which were used, and I have to rule on what is meant by a "charge". When is a charge made? It is agreed by counsel that, within the meaning of the section, a charge is not that which is stated by a police officer verbally to a man when he is charging him with an offence. The next question is whether a man is charged before justices, or whether he is not charged effectively until he appears before a jury on an indictment. I have come to the conclusion that the proper construction to put on the word "charge" is that a man is charged before a court which has jurisdiction to determine the matter in question. That may well be justices, if they refuse to commit the accused person for trial. They are hearing the evidence as examining magistrates; they then determine the question whether there is a prima facie case for committal for trial, and if they find there is not, that clearly would be a charge before a court having jurisdiction to determine it. But if justices commit a man for trial they are not adjudicating on the case. The only thing they determine is whether there is a prima facie case to answer, and, if they think there is, they commit the accused. He is then brought before the court at assizes or quarter sessions on indictment, and it seems to me that then, for the first time, he is before a court having jurisdiction to determine the matter.

The next question for my decision is this. Having decided that the "charge" within the meaning of this section is the charge on indictment at assizes, what is meant by an "occasion". Is it one occasion or two occasions if a man appears on an indictment on two counts? Force is lent to the argument that there are here two occasions when one bears in mind that there have been separate committals for trial—by the same justices, but on separate occasions. For this purpose I think I must have regard to R. v. Rogers (1). It is true—as counsel for the prosecution has submitted—that one must not necessarily come to the conclusion that the construction of a word in one Act of Parliament bears precisely the same construction or meaning as it does in another Act of Parliament. The fact, however, remains that, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, in s. 21 and s. 22, there occurs three times the phrase "on . . . previous occasions" in connection with a conviction—a conviction on previous occasions. The Court of Criminal Appeal held in Rogers' case (1) that where a man is convicted of two offences which are charged in separate counts of an indictment, the resulting convictions form only one occasion of a conviction.

In those circumstances it seems to me to be difficult to put a different interpretation on the word "occasion" in the Act of 1922. The matter is not beyond doubt, but I think there is another principle that one ought to apply, and it is this. This section with its proviso exists for the purpose of the liberty of the subject, and, if there is any doubt about its construction, I think that one ought to lean more in favour of the subject than against him. I have come to the conclusion, applying, as I do, the principle of R. v. Rogers (1), that the occasion which is applicable here is the occasion of the defendant's appearance before this court on two counts of one indictment, and it follows that he is entitled to set up this defence in respect of both counts of the indictment.

Will—Forfeiture clause—No advancement clause—Application of statutory power of advancement—Consent by life tenant to advancement—Trustee Act, 1925 (c. 19), s. 32 (1), s. 69 (2).

A By cl. 16 of his will dated Nov. 6, 1935, a testator directed his trustees to hold the net proceeds of sale of his residuary estate on trust to divide and pay the income thereof to his three grandchildren during their lives and after their deaths to divide the corpus equally between the respective children of his grandchildren who should survive them, per stirpes, B “provided that if any person to whom . . . any life interest is . . . given shall . . . become of unsound mind . . . or shall become bankrupt or assign or charge his . . . life interest or any part thereof . . . then . . . the . . . income given to such person shall cease. And after the cesser of any such . . . life interest in the lifetime of the [life tenant] my trustees may at their absolute discretion . . . during the life of the [life tenant] apply C any sums . . . for the maintenance support or otherwise for the benefit of the [life tenant] and his or her wife or husband and issue (if any) or any one or more of them exclusively . . . in such manner as my trustees shall . . . think fit.” No express power of advancement was conferred on the trustees by the will. On a summons to determine whether the D trustees were entitled to exercise, in relation to the contingent share in the residuary estate of any great-grandchild of the testator, the power of advancement conferred by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 32 (1), and whether any life tenant, by giving his consent to an advancement under the said power, would forfeit his life interest, HELD: (i) the proviso in cl. 16 of the will did not amount to the expression of a clear “contrary intention” within s. 69 (2) of the Act of 1925, and, therefore, s. 32 (1) was applicable and must be read into the will.

E (ii) the consent of a life tenant to an advancement under s. 32 (1) fell literally within the proviso to cl. 16 of the will, but the draftsman of the will must be deemed to have had in mind the statutory power, and could not have intended that consent to its exercise should work a forfeiture, and, therefore, the life tenant’s consent to the advancement of a great-grandchild would not cause a forfeiture of his life interest.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (i) whether on the true construction of the will of Robert Price Rees and by virtue of the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 32, the trustees for the time being of the said will, viz., the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank, Ltd., and the first and eleventh defendants, were entitled subject to the consents made requisite by the said s. 32 to exercise, in relation to the contingent share of any great-grandchild of the testator in his residuary estate under cl. 16 of the will, the power of advancement contained in s. 32, and (ii) whether, on the true construction of the will, any of the testator's grandchildren giving his or her consent to an advancement under the said powers would forfeit his or her determinable life interest in the testator's residuary estate.

J. A. Armstrong for the plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank, Ltd.

R. Gwyn Rees for the seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth defendants, infant beneficiaries under the will.

J. K. Wood for the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, eleventh and twelfth defendants, the adult beneficiaries.

UPJOHN, J.: The first question that I have to determine is whether the trustee's power of advancement under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 32, in favour of persons contingently entitled to capital is applicable to the Will of Robert Price Rees. By cl. 16 of his will dated Nov. 6, 1935, the testator gave the residue of his estate on trust for sale to pay his debts, and so forth, and on trust to divide and pay the income thereof to his three grandchildren, the first, second and third defendants, during their respective lives, and after their respective deaths he gave the estate over to those defendants' respective children who should survive them. The testator then provided that the life interest should be held on what are called "protective trusts". He did not, however, incorporate the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33, but expressed the "protective trusts" in these terms:

"provided that if any person to whom any annuity or life interest is hereinbefore given shall either be at my death or thereafter become of unsound mind and be legally certified as such or shall become bankrupt or assign or charge his or her annuity or life interest or any part thereof or do or suffer anything whereby the said annuity or life interest or any part thereof would become payable to or vested in any other person then and in any such case the annuity or income given to such person shall cease. And after the cesser of any such annuity or life interest in the lifetime of the annuitant my trustees may at their absolute discretion without being liable to account for the exercise of such discretion in every or any year during the life of the annuitant apply any sums not exceeding in any one year the amount of the annuity or life interest hereinbefore given to him or her for the maintenance support or otherwise for the benefit of the annuitant and his or her wife or husband and issue (if any) or any one or more of them exclusively of the other or others in such manner as my trustees shall without being liable to account think fit."

The testator died on Nov. 27, 1935, and his will was duly proved.

I need not read s. 32 of the Trustee Act, 1925. It is sufficient to say that the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 32 (2) and (3) are satisfied, for the assets comprising the residue are held on trust for sale, and the will came into operation long after the commencement of that Act. Section 32, therefore, applies unless a contrary intention is expressed in the will: see s. 69 (2) of the Act. It is submitted by the trustees, who have very properly argued this point before me as representing unborn children, that the form of the protective life interest and the discretionary trust that arises thereunder on forfeiture is a contrary intention within the meaning of s. 69 (2). It is said that the trust after the cesser of the life interest, whereby the trustees have an absolute discretion as to the application in any one year of the amount of the annuity or life interest, indicates that the amount of the life interest would continue during the residue of the life of the particular life tenant without diminution by reason of the reference to the words "the amount", and, therefore, there was a contrary intention which would exclude s. 32, for, of course, any application of moneys under that section would reduce "the amount" of the life interest. I was referred to Re Turner's Will Trusts (1), where it was held that a direction to accumulate negatives the power under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 31 (1), to pay income to a person contingently entitled who had attained the age of twenty-one. The question is, however, one of the construction of the will, and, in my judgment, I do not find sufficient in the discretionary trusts to amount to a contrary intention within the meaning of s. 69. I think the proper view to take is this. This will is silent as to powers of advancement, and I must, therefore, assume that the draftsman had in mind the power conferred on trustees by s. 32. To exclude that beneficial power there must be expressed a clear contrary intention, and, in my judgment, the words I have read do not amount to such a clear contrary intention.

In my view, the true conclusion to draw is that s. 32 of the Act of 1925 applies, and, being applicable, it must be read into the settlement: see Re Garrett (2). That was a case concerning a restraint on anticipation, but CLAUSON, J., said ([1934] Ch. 482):

"As has been pointed out, the powers given by [s. 32] have effect subject to the terms of the instrument creating the trust: see s. 69 (2) of the Trustee Act, 1925; and one of the terms of the will is that Mrs. Croft shall not anticipate the income of the share in question. But, in my judgment, Mrs. Croft has, notwithstanding the restraint, power to give her consent to the exercise by the trustees of their power of advancement under the section. That power must be taken to be incorporated in and read as part of the will and Mrs. Croft's power of consenting is not, in my view, inconsistent with the restraint against anticipation imposed by the will. Further, it is to be observed that in this will there is no forfeiture clause, the presence of which might well make a difference and introduce matter for consideration."

I think that in that last sentence the learned judge was merely expressing a doubt whether, where there was a forfeiture clause, a consent to an advance would operate to forfeit the primary life interest. That is a matter with which I shall have to deal later.

It seems to me, therefore, that s. 32 of the Act of 1925 must be read into this will, and, thereupon, if, pursuant to the power of advancement, money is raised, the provisions of the will merely operate on what remains in settlement from time to time. Raising the money does not per se create a forfeiture: see Re Mair (3) where FARWELL, J., takes that view ([1935] Ch. 566).

The next question which I have to determine is whether, if the trustees exercise the powers conferred on them by s. 32, a life tenant, whose consent to any advancement is, by the terms of that section, necessary, by giving such consent forfeits his life interest and brings into operation the discretionary trust. That matter is not free from authority. It may, I think, be conceded that, reading the words of the forfeiture clause quite literally, "giving consent" under s. 32 is doing or suffering anything whereby the annuity or life interest or any part thereof would become payable to or vested in any other person. That, however, is not conclusive of the matter, for NEVILLE, J., in Re Hodgson (4), said ([1913] 1 Ch. 40) of the forfeiture clause in that case that "... it should be read as though there had been inserted at the end of the forfeiture clause 'But this provision is not to affect any steps taken by the husband to enable the advances by the trustees hereinafter provided for to take effect'."

Of course, in that case the judge had to deal with an express power of advancement, there being at that time nothing corresponding to s. 32. That case was recently followed by HARMAN, J., in Re Shaw's Settlement, Re Wisely's Settlement (5). He had there to consider a decision of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Stimpson's Trusts (6) where the learned judge came to a conclusion contrary to that of NEVILLE, J., in Re Hodgson (4), and held that giving consent to the exercise of a power of advancement under s. 32 operated to work a forfeiture. However, for the reasons pointed out by HARMAN, J., in Shaw's case (5), Re Stimpson's Trusts (6) cannot be regarded as a satisfactory decision, and HARMAN, J., felt himself at liberty to follow the decision of NEVILLE, J., in Re Hodgson (4) in preference to that of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Stimpson (6). HARMAN, J., was dealing with a case of an express power of advancement, and, having reviewed Re Stimpson's Trusts (6), he said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 659):

"In these circumstances the argument which appealed to NEVILLE, J., and appeals to me was not available. It may be that the decision in Re Stimpson's Trusts (6) may hereafter be followed in a case where an express advancement clause is lacking, and where, on the other hand, no use is made of the protective trusts set out in the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33. I leave that question to be decided when it arises."

In my judgment, however, if the true view be, for the reasons I have given, that s. 32 must be read into the will, there can be no difference between a will containing an express provision written out in extenso and a will which incorporates s. 32.

I forbear to examine Re Stimpson (6). The judgment of LUXMOORE, J., on the point is not reported. I do not know what authorities were cited to him, nor for what reasons he came to his conclusion. In any event, that decision is plainly distinguishable from that before me for, in that case, the will was made in 1906, although it did not come into operation until 1929. The draftsman of the will cannot, in 1906, have had in mind a section of an Act to be enacted nearly twenty years later, whereas in this case I have no reason to doubt that there was no express provision as to advancement included in the will because the draftsman of the will before me must, in 1935, be taken to have been well aware of and to have relied on that section. Accordingly, for these reasons, it seems to me that the reasoning of Re Hodgson (4) and Re Shaw (5) is applicable to a case where s. 32 is incorporated into a will, whence it follows that a life tenant, by consenting to an advance, does not thereby forfeit his life interest. Accordingly, I must answer question (i) of the summons by saying that the trustees of the testator's will are, subject to the consents, entitled to exercise the powers of advancement conferred by s. 32, and such consent, if given, will not operate to forfeit the life interest.

Declaration accordingly.

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Interim order—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 23 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 56 (10).

A On June 23, 1953, the wife issued a summons for maintenance under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1). The husband was resident in Nigeria, and, because of the delay caused thereby, on Oct. 14, 1953, the wife gave notice of an application for an order for alimony pendente lite. On Nov. 12, 1953, the district registrar dismissed the application on the ground that the court had no power to make such an order. On appeal,

B HELD: the power under r. 56 (10) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, to make an interim order under s. 23 (1) was (i) confined to a judge, and (ii) was given to him only when, at the hearing of an application under s. 23 (1), he decided to refer the matter to the registrar for investigation into the means of the parties; further, as an applicant for maintenance under s. 23 (1), the wife was not "a competent suitor . . . in a matrimonial cause" within the meaning of that phrase as used ([1927] P. 169, 177),

C in Welton v. Welton, and, therefore, there was no inherent power in the court to make an order for alimony pendente lite, and the wife's application failed.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

C. G. Heron for the wife.

Shenfield for the husband.

F COLLINGWOOD, J.: This is an appeal from a decision of the Birmingham District Registrar, who, on Nov. 12, 1953, dismissed the wife's application for an order for alimony pending suit.

G The wife issued an originating summons under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1), on the ground that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. The husband is at present employed at Lagos, Nigeria, and because of this some delay in the proceedings was inevitable. Accordingly, on Oct. 14, 1953, the wife gave notice of an application to the court for an order that the husband pay her a weekly or monthly sum in respect of alimony pending suit. On Nov. 12, 1953, this application was heard and dismissed by the district registrar who held that there was no power in the court to make the order for which she asked. It is against this decision that the

H wife appeals.

It was submitted on behalf of the wife that the power to make such an interim order was given by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. It was contended that the effect of r. 56 (10) and (16) was to give to the court the same power as if this application were a matrimonial cause, the originating summons were a petition, and the wife were the petitioner. Rule 56 (16) provides:

"The provisions of rr. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 23, 32, 35, 36, 69 and 70 shall apply to an application under this rule [i.e., an application under s. 23 (1)] as if it were a matrimonial cause and as if the originating summons were a petition and the applicant were the petitioner."

None of the above-mentioned rules has any bearing on the present application. Rule 56 (10) provides:

"On the hearing of the application [under s. 23 (1)] the judge may make such order as he thinks fit, or may refer the application to a registrar for an investigation into the means of the parties to the marriage and, pending the final determination of the application, the judge may make an interim order upon such terms as he may think just."

The power to make an interim order under this paragraph is clearly confined to a judge, and is given to him only when, at the hearing of the application under s. 23 (1), he decides to refer the matter to a registrar for investigation into the means of the parties. I find no other provision in the rules which confers on a judge the power to make an interim order in any other circumstances.

It was further contended that, apart from the rules, the court had an inherent power to make an interim order, and in support of this contention I was referred to Welton v. Welton (1). In that case the wife was suing for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, and pending suit she obtained in the registry an order for alimony. The husband appealed on the ground that in a previous suit, in which he was petitioner, the wife had been found guilty of adultery, and it was contended on his behalf that the court had no jurisdiction to grant alimony pendente lite to a wife who had been so found, despite the fact that the husband's petition had been dismissed on the ground that he had been guilty of conduct conducing to the wife's adultery. In the course of his judgment, on the husband's summons to rescind the registrar's order, LORD MERRIVALE, P., said ([1927] P. 169):

"So long as a wife was a competent suitor in the ecclesiastical court in a matrimonial cause the general practice of those courts was to require the husband to make provision according to his means for her maintenance and the costs of her suit. I know of no ground for doubting the accuracy of the statement on this subject contained in OUGHTON'S ORDO JUDICIORUM, Tit. 206, 207."

In the hearing in the Court of Appeal LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid., 177):

"If, therefore, she is, as I agree with the President she is, a competent suitor, it appears to me that s. 190 (3) [of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925], comes into play, and that giving full weight to the limitation imposed by s. 22 [of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857,] it is necessary for the court to bear in mind the effect of s. 31 [of the Act of 1857], and in those circumstances to say that there was power in the court to make an order for alimony pendente lite at a time when the measure or quality of the wrong to be imputed to the husband and to the wife has not been finally determined between them. It appears to me therefore that the first ground on which the case has been argued fails."

It was submitted that in the present case the wife was "a competent suitor . . . in a matrimonial cause" and, therefore, that the husband could be ordered to pay alimony pending suit.

The question with which the court was concerned in Welton v. Welton (1) turned on the effect of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (3). That sub-section provided:

"On any petition for divorce or nullity of marriage the court shall have the same power to make interim orders for the payment of money by way of alimony or otherwise to the wife as the court has in proceedings for judicial separation."

The contention on behalf of the husband in that case was: (i) A suit for divorce a mensa et thoro by a guilty wife could not be maintained; (ii) therefore, no order for alimony pendente lite could have been made; (iii) and, consequently, no such order could be made under s. 190 (3), the power of the court being limited to the extent to which the court had power to do so in proceedings for judicial separation. Both LORD MERRIVALE, P., and the Court of Appeal rejected this argument, holding that the effect of the sub-section was not to confine the power of the court to make interim orders to cases in which the facts were such as would warrant the court in making an order in proceedings for judicial separation, but to confer on the court a general power to make interim orders of the same nature and class as could be made in properly instituted proceedings for judicial separation.

The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (3), is now repealed, and replaced by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 19 (1), s. 20 (1) and s. 22 (1). Section 19 (1) provides:

“On any petition for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may make such interim orders for the payment of alimony to the wife as the court thinks just.”

Section 20 (1) provides:

Section 22 (1) makes the same provision with regard to a petition for restitution of conjugal rights. The power of the court to make orders for maintenance where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife or the infant children of the marriage, as distinct from orders by way of ancillary relief, is derived from the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 23 (1) (replacing the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5, by which such a power was first given to the High Court). Section 23 (1) is as follows:

“Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife or the infant children of the marriage, the court, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just; and the order may be enforced in the same manner as an order for alimony in proceedings for judicial separation.”

This sub-section contains no provision as to interim payments such as is to be found in s. 19 (1), s. 20 (1) and s. 22 (1). The only such provision is that which is to be found in r. 56 (10) to which I have already referred.

In my opinion, therefore, the wife in the present proceedings was not “a competent suitor . . . in a matrimonial cause” within the meaning of that phrase as used by LORD MERRIVALE, P., and LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Welton v. Welton (1), and the district registrar was right in holding that he had no power to make the order asked. This appeal, therefore, fails.

Appeal dismissed.

MINISTER OF HEALTH v. ROYAL MIDLAND COUNTIES HOME FOR INCURABLES, LEAMINGTON SPA, GENERAL COMMITTEE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 24, 25, 26, December 9, 1953.]

National Health Service—Hospital—“Institution for the reception and treatment of persons”—Home for incurables—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (1), s. 79 (1).

A home for incurables, established in 1874, was a charity regulated by a trust deed dated June 27, 1884, and by rules and bye-laws. The object of the home was to give relief, by admission to the home or by pensions, to persons of good character and limited or reduced income, who were suffering from incurable or chronic diseases, or incapacity owing to injury or wounds. No person suffering from insanity, epilepsy, cancer or pulmonary tuberculosis was eligible as an in-patient, and no person was admitted unless he required medical supervision and nursing. There were three classes of patients: (i) paying patients, and (ii) free patients, both residing in the home, and (iii) pensioners, residing elsewhere. Immediately before the appointed day (July 5, 1948) under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the main purpose of the home was to provide the patients with the care and attention which they required in pleasant surroundings with the necessary nursing under adequate medical supervision. Although palliative medical treatment, treatment for intercurrent complaints, and physiotherapy were provided, such provision was subsidiary to the main purpose of the home and could not be regarded as either independent or concurrent purposes. Patients were admitted on the footing that no curative treatment would be given for their complaints, which in every case had to be regarded as incapable of cure. On the question whether the home was a voluntary hospital which was transferred to the Minister of Health under s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1946,

E
HELD: while the home was an institution for the reception of persons suffering from illness, it did not provide treatment for such persons, and, therefore, it was not a hospital within s. 79 (1) of the Act of 1946; nor would the home in ordinary parlance be described as a hospital; and it followed that the home was not a hospital within s. 6 (1) of the Act, and was unaffected thereby.

G
SPECIAL CASE stated by HAROLD CHRISTIE, Esq., Q.C., an arbitrator appointed to determine whether the Royal Midland Counties Home for Incurables at Leamington Spa (hereafter called “the home”) was a hospital within the meaning of the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 79 (1), and whether the interests in and attaching to the home were transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health on July 5, 1948 (the appointed day under the Act) by virtue of s. 6 (1) of that Act.

H
The matter was referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of s. 6 (5) of the Act of 1946 and of the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 888). The arbitrator made his award in the form of a Special Case.

The arbitrator found as a fact that immediately before the appointed day under the Act (July 5, 1948) the main purpose of the home was to provide the patients with the care and attention they required in pleasant surroundings with the necessary nursing under adequate medical supervision. He found that, although the provision of palliative medical treatment, treatment for inter-current complaints, and physiotherapy were objects of the home, they were subsidiary to its main purpose and could not be regarded as either independent or concurrent purposes.

In dealing with the Scottish case of Royal Victoria Hospital v. Wheatley (1), the arbitrator said:

"It was held that under the provisions of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, which are indistinguishable from the English Act, the Royal Victoria Hospital was a voluntary hospital, the premises of which vested in the Secretary of State. The Royal Victoria Hospital was established by royal charter for 'the reception and treatment of indigent and other persons in Dundee . . . who are suffering from incurable disease and are thereby rendered incapable of performing ordinary duties . . .' Insanity was excluded, but not cancer or tuberculosis. The evidence showed that a large proportion of the patients were suffering from inoperable cancer and that only patients with a short expectation of life, not more than a year, were admitted. The Lord President [LORD COOPER] referred expressly to such afflictions as advanced inoperable cancer, and thought that it would be a startling flaw in the scheme of the [Scottish] Act if Parliament had omitted to make provision for so obvious and clamant a need as the care of victims of incurable disease during the closing stages of their illness. The pursuers admitted that on the definition section alone they could not contend that the [Scottish] Act did not apply and the Lord President continued: 'This concession could not be withheld. Reading only the relevant parts of these provisions there is transferred to the Secretary of State every "institution for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from . . . any disability requiring : . . nursing"'. On the terms of the pursuers' charter and in view of the evidence, it is too plain for argument that the Royal Victoria Hospital is such an institution.' . . . The Lord President did however say that 'a hospital . . . devoted to alleviating the suffering and relieving the symptoms of the incurably ill, is incapable of being described as having any other main purpose than "therapeutic", as that expression is used in s. 9 [of the Scottish Act].' If I thought the two cases were really comparable I should feel that I ought to give great weight to the Lord President's observations, but I think they were really directed to an institution which was radically different from the home, and are not applicable to the situation with which I have to deal. Even if the Scottish case were binding on the English courts and therefore on me, I should regard it as distinguishable."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This case raises a question which is easier to state than to solve, namely, whether the Royal Midland Counties Home for Incurables at Leamington Spa (which I will call "the home") is a hospital within the meaning of the National Health Service Act, 1946 (which I will call "the Act"), and was, as such, transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health as a nationalised institution on July 5, 1948, by virtue of s. 6 (1) of the Act. That question was, in the first instance, referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions [s. 6 (5)] of the Act and certain regulations [the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 888)] made thereunder, and was answered in the negative by the arbitrator in his award, stated in the form of a Special Case and bearing date July 29, 1953. This is, in effect, an appeal from his determination.

The history of the home, its constitution and present and past activities, are set out with great particularity in the award and the documents incorporated therein. For the purposes of this judgment I need only, for the moment, say that the home was established in 1874, that it is a charity, regulated by a trust deed dated June 27, 1884, and that my decision must largely depend on the rules which were in force on July 5, 1948, that being the appointed day under the Act. From these rules it appears that the object of the institution was to give relief, by admission to the home and the grant of pensions, to persons of good character and of limited or reduced income who were suffering from incurable or chronic diseases or incapacity through injury or wounds, but so that no person should be eligible for admission if suffering from insanity, epilepsy, cancer, or pulmonary tuberculosis, and that no case was to be admitted unless it required medical supervision and nursing. The omission of cancer is, I think, important.

The home was controlled and administered by a general committee, acting largely through a sub-committee called "the house committee", and it decided, with the assistance of reports from the visiting physician, Dr. Clayton, all questions relating to the admission or discharge of patients. The medical staff of the home consisted of the said visiting physician and a visiting surgeon, Mr. Dingley, both local practitioners, who visited the home on alternate days and were liable to be called in at any time in case of emergency. There was no resident medical officer.

There were three classes of patients—(i) paying patients, (ii) free patients—both of these classes residing on the premises—and (iii) pensioners, residing elsewhere. The average number of resident patients during 1947 was 117, of which about one-third were "free" and the remainder "paying", but the latter in fact paid only a fraction of the actual cost of the accommodation. Pensions were limited to £20 per annum, and the number of pensioners on July 5, 1948, was thirty-eight. Both free patients and pensioners were elected by votes of subscribers; paying patients, if accepted, were admitted in rotation. There was always a waiting list of all three classes. Each patient, on applying for admission, had to supply a medical certificate that he was suffering from a specified disease, was regarded as incurable, and was otherwise eligible under the rules. His application was then passed on to one of the visiting medical officers, and, if suitable, he was accepted by the committee to wait for a vacancy.

In 1948 there were forty-eight full-time and twenty-nine part-time members of the nursing staff, which appears to be a slightly lower proportion of nurses to patients than in a general hospital, and a smaller number of these were State registered nurses than in a general hospital. The senior members of the nursing staff appear to have been older than is usual in a general hospital, and, to quote the words of the arbitrator, the nursing required was "more routine and of a slower tempo".

It appears that the policy of the committee was to admit those who were likely to settle down for life and make the premises their permanent home, and only those applicants were accepted whose disease had reached such a stage that no real improvement was to be expected. On the other hand, patients who were likely to die very shortly were not accepted. The average length of time between the admission and the death of a patient would seem to have been about ten years, for the diseases from which the patients suffered were chronic diseases, and not those likely to be the immediate cause of death, which usually came from some other intervening cause or fortuitous disease such as pneumonia, the average death-rate being shown by the records to have been only ten per cent. per annum. The diseases from which the patients suffered were, in the main, either crippling diseases of the joints, such as osteoarthritis, or diseases of the nervous system, such as Parkinson's disease. Of the 112 patients actually in the home on July 5, 1948, eighty were women and thirty-two men, and of these eighteen were bedridden, most of the others getting about in wheel-chairs or on crutches or with sticks, and no fewer than half of the patients regularly went away on holidays for periods up to a month.

A The secretary of the home, when asked "what sort of treatment" prospective patients would be likely to get, deposed that he was accustomed to say that "no treatment whatsoever was to be expected there", and this is important in view of the definition of a "hospital" in the Act as hereinafter mentioned. No doubt a great deal of palliative treatment was given at the home, and what the secretary was referring to, or thinking of, as not given there, was curative treatment. Treatment for the symptoms of the disease and to relieve pain was, undoubtedly, available, but the arbitrator held, and, I think, with justification, that patients were admitted on the footing that, while they would get the care and attention and nursing they required, they would not get any specific treatment for their complaint, which in every case had to be regarded as one not susceptible to, or capable of, cure. No doubt the medical officers did from time to time prescribe drugs such as sedatives, sleeping-tablets, aperients, and so forth, and notably hyoscine, which was used to reduce the tremors characteristic of Parkinson's disease. Cases of influenza or pneumonia would, undoubtedly, be treated by ordinary medical methods, but such complaints were not the relevant complaints, i.e., were not those in respect of which the patients were admitted, but incidental or intercurrent complaints. Considerable use was made of physiotherapy, and many of the patients received massage or radiant-heat treatment, or were given walking exercises. Such treatment was, undoubtedly, palliative and symptomatic rather than curative in character.

D The arbitrator was satisfied, and I also am convinced, that the atmosphere of the home was much less formal and more homelike than that of any hospital. The patients were given a very wide measure of freedom; the rules as to visiting hours were not enforced and, indeed, visitors were encouraged to come at any reasonable time. I think that at and immediately before July 5, 1948, the main purpose of the home was to provide the inmates or residents there with whatever care and attention they required in pleasant surroundings with necessary nursing and adequate medical supervision, and with palliative medical treatment, treatment for intercurrent complaints, and physiotherapy, as subsidiary to the main purpose of the home and not properly to be regarded as independent or concurrent purposes.

F In my judgment, this problem may be summarised thus: Was the institution in truth what it is designated to be, namely, a home, as contradistinguished from a hospital, or was it in truth a hospital, although styled a home? The matter does not, of course, depend on mere nomenclature, but on the facts of the case, and on the proper method of applying to those facts the provisions of the Act, and, in particular, the definitions contained in it. Those definitions, however, are, in my view, rather difficult to interpret, but they must have been framed with considerable care, because there were already some statutory definitions of the word "hospital" which might have been, but were not, adopted for the purposes of the Act. For example, the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 36 (2), provides that the expression "hospital" means "an institution . . . which provides medical or surgical treatment for in-patients"; in the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 343 (1), "hospital" is said to include "any premises for the reception of the sick"; while the Public Health (London) Act, 1936, s. 304 (1), defines "hospital" as meaning "any premises . . . for the reception of invalids . . ." If any of these comparatively simple definitions had been used in the Act the position might have been clearer than, perhaps, it is.

I will now turn to the Act and consider the definitions which are relevant, viz., the definitions of "hospital" and "illness". Section 79 (1) of the Act provides—omitting irrelevant words—that "'hospital' means"—not merely includes—

"any institution for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from illness or mental defectiveness . . .", and " ' Illness ' includes "—not means—

"mental illness and any injury or disability requiring medical or dental treatment or nursing."

It is obvious that the home is an institution for the reception of persons suffering from illness, but can it be said that it is also an institution for the "treatment" of such persons? Again, does the definition of "illness" (which, unless the context otherwise requires, introduces nursing into the definition) enlarge the meaning of the word "treatment" in the definition of "hospital" so as to include mere nursing? While I think that the question might almost be reduced to the simple one of whether this is a case of a "home" in contradistinction to a "hospital", it may well happen that an institution described, not as a "hospital" but as a "home", is in fact a hospital, just as an institution described as a "hospital" may not be a hospital in any sense, statutory or other. I need only quote the well-known example of Christ's Hospital. I think that a resident in this home would not, in ordinary parlance, be described as being "in a hospital". On the other hand, the inmate of the Dundee hospital in Royal Victoria Hospital v. Wheatley (1) referred to by the arbitrator and hereinafter mentioned would most certainly be described as "in hospital", and would not be described as being "in a home".

The present case is, I think, rather a border-line case, but inasmuch as the Act is, in a sense, confiscatory in its operation, interfering with vested interests and rights, I think that I ought not to dispossess the general committee in favour of the Minister of Health unless the latter can convince me that the home necessarily comes within the definition. "Treatment" is probably the key word, and it is to be observed that the definition does not refer to care or nursing of or attention to sick persons but only to their treatment, and treatment certainly, to my mind, suggests something more than mere palliation and implies a process directed to the achievement of a complete (or at least a partial) cure. I think that the secretary was right when he said that the residents in the home could not expect treatment, in either a technical or a colloquial sense of the word. They came to live in comfort rather than to be cured, or even to secure improvement in their health.

Royal Victoria Hospital v. Wheatley (1) is superficially very like the present case. It is unreported, but transcripts of the opinions or speeches of LORD BLADES and the Lord President (LORD COOPER) are incorporated in the award, and I have perused them with attention. The difference between the facts there and here may be summarised by saying that while the home at Leamington is essentially a place in which its inmates come to live, the hospital at Dundee is one where they come to die. The home deals with cases in which there is a comparatively long expectation of life; the hospital very largely with cases in which death is more or less imminent, and particularly cases of cancer. I have already taken notice of the fact that the Leamington institution is called a home, while the Dundee institution is called a hospital, a fact which, while far from being conclusive, is at least significant. I need not refer to any of the other authorities mentioned in the award; none of them seems to me to govern this case, or, indeed, to afford me any real assistance in deciding it, except, perhaps, Tendring Union v. Woolwich Union (2), in which the distinction between "home" and "hospital" was drawn in a manner which appeals to me as quite appropriate.

I may be allowed to say that the arbitrator's award sets out the material facts and relevant circumstances of the case in what seems to me to be a most convenient form, and his conclusions are, in my judgment, well founded in every respect.

I hold and will declare that the home is not a hospital within the meaning of the Act and is unaffected by the provisions of the Act, and that the interests in or attaching to the premises held by trustees for the home immediately before July 5, 1948, were neither transferred to nor vested in the Minister of Health on that day. I will also direct the Minister to pay to the respondents, the committee of the home, the costs of the arbitration and of this application, to be taxed as between party and party, and also to bear and pay the costs of the award, including the costs of a shorthand note of the proceedings before the arbitrator and of one transcript. The costs of the application are, in a like manner, to include the costs of a shorthand note of the present judgment and of one transcript.

- A I understand that the home has been taken over and dealt with on the assumption that it is, or was, a hospital, and that steps will be necessary for restoring the respondent committee to possession and control of the premises. The parties can, I am sure, be trusted to act with consideration and in a sensible manner. I will give them liberty to apply in case any difficulty arises. If there is an appeal from this order, matters should be left as they are until a final decision has been reached.

Order accordingly.

NEW SOUTH WALES COMMISSIONER OF STAMP DUTIES v. PEARSE AND OTHERS. PEARSE AND OTHERS v. NEW SOUTH WALES COMMISSIONER OF STAMP DUTIES.

- D [PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Reid, Lord Radcliffe, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), October 22, 26, 27, 30, November 2, December 9, 1953.]

Privy Council—New South Wales—Estate duty—Company—Shares—Valuation—Basis—Jurisdiction of court to substitute its own discretion for that of commissioner as to mode of valuation—New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, s. 124 (4), s. 127 (1) (c).

Privy Council—New South Wales—Legacy duty—Legal costs incurred by executor in connection with will—Rate of duty—New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, s. 101b, sched. VII.

F

Part of the estate of P., who died in 1946, consisted of shares in a company which were not, because of its articles, listed on a stock exchange. The respondents, his executors, included these shares in the inventory of assets of the estate for the purposes of death duty. They valued them on the basis of the average of the net profits of the company for the previous five years, which was capitalised at seven per cent. The appellant refused to accept this figure, and, in exercise of his discretion under the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, s. 127 (1) (c), where shares were not listed on a stock exchange, he adopted a sum for valuation based on the amount which, in his opinion, the holders of the shares would have received if the company had been voluntarily wound-up. The respondents appealed under s. 124 (1) of the Act by way of Case Stated against the appellant's assessment. The Supreme Court of New South Wales held that it had power under s. 124 to substitute its own discretion for that of the appellant as to the mode of valuation to be adopted, and this decision was confirmed by the High Court of Australia.

HELD: reading the Act as a whole, its intention was to leave the court with unfettered power to review the conclusion reached by the appellant, and, in particular, s. 124 contained elaborate provisions for ascertaining the facts necessary to enable the questions submitted to the court to be determined; there was no right of appeal to a board of review or board of appeal under the Act, and so, if the court had no right of review, the appellant's decision would be final although he had not heard any evidence or conducted anything in the nature of a judicial inquiry; and, therefore, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to substitute its own discretion for that of the appellant as to the mode of valuation to be adopted.

By the first column of sched. VII to the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, which specifies rates of death duty payable on the final balance of estates of deceased persons, duty is payable "on so much of the final balance of the estate consists of—(a) property which passes under the will . . . to the widow or lineal issue of the deceased", and by the fourth column "on so much of the final balance of the estate as consists of property not otherwise provided for in . . . this schedule". By cl. 13 of the will of P., who died in 1946, the respondent, L., a solicitor and a trustee of the will, was to be entitled to charge, retain and be paid all usual professional or other charges incurred by him in relation to the will against the estate. The appellant assessed the respondent's professional charges under the fourth column of sched. VII to the Act.

HELD: clause 13 of the will conferred on the respondent a gift and enabled him to take out of the testator's assets something which the law would not otherwise allow, and the amount to which the respondent became entitled under cl. 13 was not property passing under the will to the widow or lineal issue of the deceased, but was properly assessed under the fourth column of sched. VII.

APPEAL by the Commissioner of Stamp Duties of New South Wales and CROSS-APPEAL by executors of a will from a judgment of the High Court of Australia, dated July 27, 1951, affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, dated Oct. 30, 1950, on a Case Stated by the Commissioner of Stamp Duties of New South Wales, dated Aug. 2, 1950. The facts appear in the judgment. G

Dec. 9. LORD COHEN : The appeal and cross-appeal in this matter raise two questions in relation to the estate of Mr. Henry Bowen Aylmer Pearse (hereinafter called the testator) who died on Feb. 19, 1946. The question raised by the appeal is as to the proper basis of valuation for the purposes of the death duty payable under s. 101 of the New South Wales Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940 (hereinafter called the Act), of certain shares in Plashett Pastoral Co., Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as the company). The question raised by the cross-appeal is whether the commissioners are entitled to levy the higher rate of death duty specified in the fourth column of sched. VII to the Act on the whole or any part of the sum of £250, being the agreed amount of the legal costs which the respondent, Langley, a solicitor and a trustee of the will of the testator, is entitled to charge against the testator's estate under the provisions of cl. 13 of his will.

It will be convenient in the first place to state the relevant provisions of the Act. Section 101D provides for the payment of a duty (therein called death duty) at the rate mentioned in sched. VII to the Act on the final balance of the estate of every person dying after the commencement of the Stamp Duties (Amendment) Act, 1939. Schedule VII specifies the rates of duty payable. They vary according to (a) the amount of the estate, and (b) the degree of relationship to the deceased of the persons to whom the property passes under his will or on intestacy. The latter variation is indicated in the headings to the four columns into which the schedule is divided. Their Lordships are only concerned with the first and fourth columns. So far as material, the heading to the first column reads:

“on so much of the final balance of the estate as consists of:—(a) property which passes under the will . . . to the widow or lineal issue of the deceased.”

The heading to the fourth column reads as follows:

“on so much of the final balance of the estate as consists of property not otherwise provided for in the first, second or third columns of this schedule.”

Section 105 provides, by sub-s. (1), that the final balance of the estate of a deceased person shall be computed as being the total value of his dutiable estate after making the authorised allowances in respect of his debts. Sub-section (2) provides that, where not expressly otherwise provided, the value of the property included in his dutiable estate shall be estimated at the date of his death. Section 117 imposes on the legal personal representatives certain obligations as to supplying information to the Commissioner of Stamp Duties of the State of New South Wales to enable him to assess the duty payable. Section 124 which is of great importance in determining the question raised by the appeal deals with the right of the legal personal representative to challenge the assessment made by the commissioner and is, so far as material, in the following terms:

“(1) . . . any administrator liable to the payment of death duty, who is dissatisfied with the assessment of the commissioner may, within thirty days after . . . notice of the assessment has been given to the administrator . . . and on payment of duty in conformity with the assessment, and of the sum of twenty pounds as security for costs, deliver to the commissioner a notice in writing requiring him to state a Case for the opinion of the Supreme Court. (2) The commissioner shall thereupon state and sign a Case accordingly, setting forth the facts before him on making the assessment, the assessment made by him, and the question to be decided, and shall deliver the Case so signed to the person by whom the same is required (hereinafter referred to as the appellant). (3) The appellant shall within seven days after receiving the Case cause the same to be set down for hearing before the next sittings of the full court at which the same can be heard. (4) On the hearing of the Case the court shall determine the question submitted, and shall assess the duty chargeable and also decide the question of costs. (5) If it is decided by the court that the assessment of the commissioner is erroneous, any excess of duty paid in conformity with such erroneous assessment, together with any fine paid in consequence thereof, and the sum paid as security for costs shall be ordered by the court to be repaid to the appellant. (6) If it appears to the court that the facts necessary to enable the questions submitted to be determined are not sufficiently set forth in the Case or that such facts are in dispute, the court may direct all such inquiries to be made or issues to be tried as it deems necessary in order to ascertain such necessary facts, and, if it deems fit, may amend the Case. Any such inquiry may be made before a judge of the court or the master in equity, and any such issue may be tried by any such judge or a judge of any district court sitting either with or without a jury as the court may direct. (7) On the hearing of the Case the court shall be at liberty to draw from the facts and documents stated in the Case any inference whether of fact or law which might have been drawn therefrom if proved at a trial."

Section 125 empowers the commissioner to ascertain the value of any property by such means as he may think fit, but sub-s. (2) provides that his assessment shall be subject to appeal under s. 124 and his powers must also, as regards shares, be read as subject to s. 127, sub-s. (1) of which is in the following terms:

"(1) (a) For the purposes of this Act, the valuation of shares in any company, whether incorporated in or out of New South Wales, shall be made upon the basis that the memorandum and articles of association or rules of the company satisfy the requirements prescribed by the committee or governing authority of the stock exchange at the place where the share register in which the shares being valued are registered is, to enable that company to be placed on the current official list of such stock exchange at the relevant time. (b) No provision in the memorandum or articles of association or rules of any company whereby or whereunder the value of the shares of a deceased or other member is to be determined shall be applicable in determining the value of the shares for the purposes of this Act. (c) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this sub-section the commissioner may in his discretion adopt as the value of a share of any class in any company the shares of which of that class are not listed on a stock exchange such sum as in the opinion of the commissioner the holder of that share would have received in respect of that share in the event of the company being voluntarily wound-up on that date upon which the value of the share is to be ascertained for the purposes of this Act."

The company is admittedly a company the shares in which were, at the date of the testator's death, not listed on a stock exchange, and its articles of association contained provisions which would have made it impossible for it to become listed. It was a family company in the sense that, with the exception of one ordinary share held by the respondent, Langley, all the shares were held by the testator and his brother and sisters or by their respective husbands and children, but the testator did not hold a majority of the shares, and neither he nor his executors could have forced a winding-up against the wishes of the other shareholders. The testator had the right to be managing director and chairman for life, and had certain powers of appointing directors. The business of the company appears to have been the running of a station known as Plashett, and its assets consisted almost entirely of land and improvements thereon and livestock.

G

The ordinary shares in the company held by the testator were included by the executors in the inventory of assets which was filed pursuant to s. 117 at the value of £2 6s. 6d. per share, this figure being supported by a valuation supplied by a firm of chartered accountants, Messrs. Robertson, Crane & Gibbons. This was based on the average of the net profits for the five years ended June 30, 1945, which, after deducting the preference dividend, left an average of £1,171 9s. This the accountants capitalised at seven per cent. in order to arrive at the value of the shares. The commissioner refused to accept this figure and, in exercise of his powers under s. 127 (1) (c), adopted the sum of £7 16s. 10d. per share as being the sum which, in the opinion of the commissioner, the holders of the shares would have received in a winding-up. He issued his notice of assessment on July 8, 1948.

The executors, being dissatisfied with the assessment, gave notice in writing on Aug. 6, 1948, requiring him to state a Case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of New South Wales. He did so on Aug. 2, 1950, and included seven questions for the opinion of the court. In view of the course which the proceedings subsequently took it is sufficient to state the first and fifth questions:

"(1) Whether in valuing the 2,986 'B' ordinary shares in the company the commissioner was justified in exercising the discretion conferred upon him by s. 127 (1) (c) of the Stamp Duties Act, 1920-1940, to value such shares upon a liquidation basis. . . . (5) Whether by reason of cl. 13 of the testator's will duty at the rate set out in the fourth column of sched. VII to the Act should be assessed on: (a) The full amount of £250. (b) Such amount less office overhead expenses. (c) The executor-solicitor's share of such full amount. (d) The executor-solicitor's share of the full amount less his proportion of overhead expenses. Or (e) No part thereof."

As the judges of the High Court point out, the exact meaning of the first question is not clear, but it is apparent from the judgments delivered in the Supreme Court that the real contest between the parties was whether the court had jurisdiction to substitute its own discretion for that of the commissioner as to the mode of valuation to be adopted. The Supreme Court held that it had that jurisdiction and the High Court was unanimous in upholding this decision. On the question raised by the cross-appeal, the Supreme Court held that duty at the higher rate was leviable on the whole sum of £250 and this decision also was upheld by the High Court, DIXON, C.J., and FULLAGAR, J., dissenting. Special leave to appeal to this Board against the decision of the High Court on the first point was granted on Sept. 4, 1952, on the terms that the costs in Australia remain as directed in Australia and that the respondents' costs as between solicitor and client both of the petition for such leave and of the appeal to Her Majesty in Council should be paid by the petitioner in any event. At that time no application was made by the respondents for leave to appeal against the judgment on the fifth question which held duty to be payable on the said sum of £250, but a petition for such leave was presented shortly before the main appeal was due to be heard. It was not opposed by the appellants and the Board resolved humbly to advise Her Majesty that leave should be granted. In the very exceptional circumstances of the case, to enable appeal and cross-appeal to be heard together, the Board agreed to dispense with the lodging of further Cases by the parties. This had the result that their Lordships did not have the advantage of seeing on this point the considered statement in writing of the reasons of the parties normally to be found in their respective Cases.

The Supreme Court of New South Wales regarded the point raised by the main appeal as concluded by the observations of the High Court in Comr. of Stamp Duties for Queensland v. Beak (1), where similar provisions in a Queensland Act [the Queensland Succession and Probate Duties Acts, 1892-1920] were under consideration, and the following passage is to be found in the unanimous judgment of the court (46 C.L.R. 597):

"The contention of the commissioner is that the appeal given by s. 50 [of the Queensland Act] does not extend to enabling the court to review the value adopted for shares by the commissioner in the exercise of the discretion conferred by the last paragraph in s. 47 . . . Clear words would be needed to withdraw from the general power of review given by s. 50 a particular process in making up the assessment essential to the result.

A reference to discretion and opinion is not enough for the purpose. The function of valuation is performed by means of discretion and opinion, and it is because as between the Crown and the subject a judgment of an officer of the revenue should not be conclusive that an appeal is given."

The High Court regarded the matter as open though they quoted the case above cited as authority for the proposition that clear words would be needed to withdraw from the general power of review given by s. 124 a particular process in making up the assessment essential to the result. They had, however, no hesitation in coming to the same conclusion as the Supreme Court as to the effect of s. 127 (1) (c). Having reached the conclusion that the whole question of valuation was at large, both courts decided that the mode prescribed by s. 127 (1) (c) was not the proper mode to apply. Their Lordships pause here to observe that they do not read the decisions of the court as excluding all reference to the value of the assets of the company in arriving at the proper valuation of the shares, but merely as deciding that it was wrong to assess the value of the shares under s. 127 (1) (c) by reference only to what the holder thereof might have received if the company went into liquidation on the date of the death of the testator.

Counsel for the commissioner began his argument by disputing the finding of the Supreme Court that the case was concluded against his client by the decision of the High Court in Beak's case (1). He pointed out that in that case the court was considering not the propriety of the exercise by the commissioner of his discretionary power to value shares in a company on the basis that the company went into winding-up on the death of a testator, but the correctness of the valuation, no attack being made on the basis selected. Their Lordships agree with this criticism and will, therefore, treat the observations of the High Court in Beak's case (1), so far as they relate to discretion only, as obiter.

The main submission of counsel for the commissioner was that the decision of the High Court was contrary (a) to three decisions of this Board on Canadian statutes and (b) to two decisions of the High Court of Australia. Before considering these decisions, their Lordships would observe that no assistance can be derived from a consideration of those provisions of English law which provide for an appeal to the courts by way of Case Stated, for, whether the appeal be from the Special or General Commissioners of Income Tax under the Income Tax Acts, from an arbitrator under the Arbitration Act, or from magistrates under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the appeal is from persons exercising judicial functions who are required to find the facts and the appeal is confined to questions of law. The decisions of this Board on which counsel for the commissioner relied were Pioneer Laundry & Dry Cleaners, Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue (2), Minister of National Revenue v. Wright's Canadian Ropes, Ltd. (3), and D. R. Fraser & Co., Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue (4).

In the Pioneer Laundry case (2), the court was asked to review the decision of the Minister under a section of the Canadian Income War Tax Act, 1927 (R.S.C., c. 97, s. 5), which provided that income should, for the purposes of that Act, be subject to a deduction of such amount as the Minister, in his discretion, might allow for depreciation. The Supreme Court of Canada had held that there was no power in the court to review the decision of the Minister. This Board dissented from this view, but, to quote the language of LORD THANKERTON who delivered the judgment of the Board ([1939] 4 All E.R. 259):

"... the court would not interfere with the decision unless . . . 'it was manifestly against sound and fundamental principles'."

In the Wright's Canadian Ropes case (3), the question at issue arose under s. 6 (2) of the same Act, entitling the Minister to

"disallow any expense which he in his discretion might determine to be in excess of what is reasonable or normal for the business carried on by the taxpayer."

Their Lordships in that case came to the conclusion that the reference to "discretion" meant no more than that the Minister was made the judge of what is reasonable or normal, but expressed their agreement with the views expressed by the Board in the Pioneer Laundry case (2) as to the proper approach to be made by the court when reviewing the decision of the Minister.

In Fraser's case (4), the question arose under s. 5 (a) of the Income War Tax Act, 1927, as amended by a statute of 1940, and the principal question at issue was whether the Minister was authorised under that section to refuse to make any allowance for exhaustion of timber limits, or only authorised to determine the amount of the allowance. The Board, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, decided that the Minister could refuse to make any allowance. Their Lordships are unable to find in the judgment in that case any relevant statement of general principle which assists them in the case now before the Board.

The decisions of the High Court of Australia relied on by counsel for the commissioner were MacCormick v. Federal Comr. of Taxation (5), and Denver Chemical Manufacturing Co. v. Comr. of Taxation (New South Wales) (6).

The first of these cases arose under the Gift Duty Assessment Act, 1941-1942, s. 14 (i) (ii) of which provided that gift duty should not be payable in respect of any gift concerning which the commissioner was satisfied that certain conditions were fulfilled. Counsel relied on some observations of LATHAM, C.J., where he said (71 C.L.R. 299):

"This court has, in a series of cases involving the interpretation of taxation statutes, held that certain matters are to be determined by the exercise of a discretion by the commissioner of taxation, or in accordance with an opinion formed by him, and that upon an appeal the court cannot substitute the discretion or opinion of the court for that of the commissioner. But in these cases the court has also held that, if it be shown that the discretion was exercised or the opinion formed upon a wrong construction of the relevant statute, or that the discretion exercised or the opinion formed was so irrational as to be not a discretion or an opinion of the character contemplated by the statute, an assessment should be set aside and remitted to the commissioner for re-consideration in accordance with law."

DIXON, J., pointed out (ibid., 307) that in such cases the statute conferring the discretion usually provides for re-consideration on the merits by a board of review.

In Denver's case (6) the question arose under the Income Tax (Management) Acts, 1912, 1928, 1936 and 1941, of New South Wales. These statutes conferred on the taxpayer a right of appeal to a "board of appeal", and if he exercised it the Act enabled that board to substitute its decision for that of the commissioner. Their Lordships deciding that case held that the court could only interfere with the decision of the board of appeal if that board committed an error in law.

Their Lordships have carefully considered the judgments in the cases cited and the relevant provisions of the statutes there considered. These provisions seem to their Lordships so different from the provisions of the Stamp Duties Act (N.S.W.) that their Lordships are unable to regard the decisions in the cases cited as affording any assistance in the case now before the Board. They agree with the High Court that the decision in the present case must turn on the proper construction of the relevant sections in the Stamp Duties Acts. Their Lordships find themselves in complete agreement with the reasoning of the High Court on that problem as expressed in the following extracts from the judgment prepared by WILLIAMS, J.:

"There can be no question that if the statute intends that a discretion shall be exercised by a particular person and not by the court, the jurisdiction of the court is confined to supervising its exercise so as to ensure that it is exercised according to law. The statute in such a case makes the particular person the sole judge of the existence or non-existence of the fact or other matter upon which the right or liability of the subject depends and the court is not at liberty to substitute its own opinion for his. If s. 127 (1) (c) of the Stamp Duties Act means that the commissioner is to be the sole judge of the appropriate method to adopt in valuing shares in a company not listed on a stock exchange, then the court in exercising its powers under s. 124 cannot interfere unless it can be shown that the commissioner has acted in contravention of some principle of law. For, to be effective, the discretion must be exercised, in the words of LORD MACMILLAN delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in D. R. Fraser & Co., Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue (4) ([1949] A.C. 36) 'bona fide, uninfluenced by irrelevant considerations and not arbitrarily or illegally'. It was not contended for the commissioner that the court was bound to accept the amount of the valuation arrived at on the basis of para. (c). It was admitted that the notional sums attributed to the shares by the commissioner upon the hypothetical winding-up were fully examinable. Its hands were tied only to the extent that it could be directed by the commissioner to adopt the mode of valuation prescribed by the paragraph. This attitude of counsel for the commissioner seems somewhat inconsistent. The paragraph would seem to protect the opinion of the commissioner as to the sums the shares would realise on a liquidation to the same extent as his discretion to adopt this mode of valuation. There is no half-way house. Either each and every activity of the commissioner under the paragraph is subject to complete judicial review under s. 124, or each and every activity can only be reviewed to the same limited extent. When the wide powers conferred upon the court by s. 124 are considered it is apparent, we think, that it was intended to make the decision of the commissioner to adopt the paragraph subject to complete judicial review. Section 124 contains elaborate provisions for ascertaining all the facts necessary to enable the questions submitted to be determined, and sub-s. (4) provides that on the hearing of the case the court shall determine the question submitted and shall assess the duty chargeable and also decide the question of costs. Duty is payable upon the final balance of the estate, and s. 105 provides that the final balance of the estate of a deceased person shall be computed as being the total value of his dutiable estate after making such allowances as are thereafter authorised in respect of the debts of the deceased. It also provides that, save as in this Act expressly provided, the value of the property included in his dutiable estate shall be estimated as at the date of the death of the deceased. If the duty is imposed upon the court of itself assessing the duty chargeable, it seems to us necessarily to follow that the court must itself value the property included in the dutiable estate. That does not mean of course that the court must value every item. It is only concerned with the items of value which are in dispute."

Counsel for the commissioner submitted that the High Court had ignored the fact that the only appeal allowed was by way of Case Stated, and suggested that this implied a limitation on the powers of the court in dealing with the questions submitted, but their Lordships would observe that there appears to be no limit on the number or scope of the questions of law or fact which the dissatisfied legal personal representative can require to be raised. Counsel also argued that the object of the section was to prevent evasion or undue limitation of the duty, and that this object would be defeated if the commissioner's decision to proceed under s. 127 (1) (c) was open to review. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention.

Prior to 1924, shares in companies of a class not listed on a stock exchange were valued by analogy with shares in partnerships on the basis of the interest of the shareholders in the assets of the company, but in 1924 this provision was altered, and a provision substantially in the form of sub-s. (1) (a) was introduced. In 1931 the present paras. (a) and (b) became law. WILLIAMS, J., who, their Lordships were informed, has had great experience of this class of case, states in his judgment that, notwithstanding the alterations of the law in 1924, shares of companies not listed on the stock exchange had, in rare instances, been valued on the basis prescribed in para. (c), and he suggests that para. (c) was introduced

- A to preclude the argument that this course was not permissible even in those cases where it was best calculated to arrive at a fair value of the shares. This explanation seems to their Lordships reasonable, but, be that as it may, their Lordships agree with WILLIAMS, J., that para. (c) contains no sufficient indication compelling the court to attribute to the legislature the capricious intention that the court should remain under the duty of deciding a dispute between the subjects
- B and the commissioner as to the value of the shares, but should be handcuffed to the particular mode chosen by the commissioner. Before their Lordships counsel for the commissioner somewhat faintly sought to resile from the admission made in the High Court, and to contend that the court had only limited powers even to review the opinion of the commissioner as to value. Their Lordships are unable to accept this argument since they agree with the High Court that, as
- C s. 124 confers such wide general powers of review both of fact and of law and imposes on the court the definite obligation to assess the duty chargeable, it is impossible to extract from s. 127 (1) (c) an exclusion from these powers of the right to question both the mode of valuation and the value adopted by the commissioner.

- Reading the provisions of the statute as a whole their Lordships are forced to
- D the conclusion that the intention of the statute was to leave the court with unfettered power of review of the conclusion reached by the commissioner. Apart from the considerations referred to by WILLIAMS, J., there are one or two other matters to which their Lordships may usefully refer. Thus, the statute gives no right of appeal to a board of review or board of appeal so that, if the appellant's argument was well founded, it would mean that, although the
- E commissioner had not heard any evidence or conducted anything in the nature of a judicial inquiry, his decision would be final. Moreover, if the court directed inquiries as to fact under sub-s. (6) and those inquiries disclosed facts which made it obvious that the adoption of the basis of valuation provided for by s. 127 (1) (c) would not lead to the ascertainment of the real value of the share, it would, none the less, if the argument of the appellant were to prevail, be powerless to rectify
- F the matter.

- The cross-appeal turns on the proper meaning to be given to sched. VII to the Act. It is obvious that the provisions of this schedule, which brings into the law as to death duty considerations which, in England, were relevant as regards legacy duty, but have never been relevant as to estate duty, may give rise to difficulties, since the amount on which death duty is chargeable may
- G include sums such as the amount of testamentary expenses to which no beneficiary will ever become entitled. Their Lordships will, however, confine themselves to the exact question which they have now to determine, viz., whether the amount which the parties have agreed as being the amount which the respondent, Langley, has received, or will receive, under cl. 13 of the will is assessable at the rate specified in the fourth column of that schedule and not at the rate
- H specified in the first column of that schedule. Their Lordships note that it is the practice of the Australian courts in questions of law and equity common to both countries to follow the decisions of the Court of Appeal in England where the decisions of the court in England appear to have settled the law. Their Lordships think that this practice is to the advantage of both systems of law, since it will enable the courts of either country to refer to the decisions of the other country for guidance in any field of law or equity common to both countries.

In the present case, the issue is whether the amount receivable by the respondent, Langley, under the authority to charge, retain and be paid his usual professional charges, contained in cl. 13 of the testator's will, ought to be regarded as property not otherwise provided for in the first, second or third columns of sched. VII. Their Lordships agree with the majority in the High Court that the decisions to which WILLIAMS, J., refers, and, in particular, the decisions in Re Thorley (7), and Re Brown (8), lead inevitably to the conclusion that such a provision as cl. 13 confers a gift on the executor and enables him to take out of the assets of the testator something which the law would not otherwise allow. Re Brown (8) is more directly in point than Re Thorley (7), since in that case EVE, J., held that the amount which the solicitor trustee would receive under a charging clause was a legacy which in the event which happened of a deficiency of assets must abate rateably with other legacies. It was not a decision of the Court of Appeal, but their Lordships think that it follows inevitably from the reasoning in Re Thorley (7) and Re Pooley (9). Their Lordships are unable to accept the explanation of these decisions suggested by DIXON, C.J., and FULLAGAR, J., and agree with the observations of the majority that, unless the High Court refused to follow the cases cited, the amount of £250 is property which falls within the fourth column of sched. VII to the Act. The decisions of the Court of Appeal in England are not, of course, binding on this Board, and the decisions now under consideration have been criticised in some of the textbooks. They have, however, never been doubted in any judicial decision, and they have been treated as good law for so long a period that their Lordships are not prepared to depart from the principles therein laid down. Counsel for the respondents agreed that the expression "pass" in the first column of the schedule had no technical meaning, and, if that is so, their Lordships are of opinion that the £250 in question is money to which the respondent, Langley, became entitled under the will, and is not property passing under the will to the widow or lineal issue of the deceased.

Before parting with this part of the case, their Lordships would observe that their task has been facilitated by the fact that the parties were able to agree the value of the benefit received, or to be received, by the respondent, Langley, at £250. No question was raised as to the benefit being a contingent legacy subject to a condition which had not been, and might never be, fulfilled. Their Lordships had not to determine the rate of duty which would be payable on such a legacy.

For these reasons, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal and cross-appeal be dismissed. It was agreed between the parties that, in view of what transpired when leave to appeal was granted, the proper order as to costs in the event which has happened is that the respondents' costs of the appeal shall be taxed as between solicitor and client and shall be paid by the appellant, and that there shall be no order as to the costs of the cross-appeal.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

JOHN HUDSON & CO., LTD. v. KIRKNESS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), November 30, December 1, 2, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Wear and tear—Balancing charge—Wagons of coal merchants—Vesting in British Transport Commission—“Sale”—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 17 (1)—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), s. 29, s. 30 (1).

On Jan. 1, 1948, railway wagons owned by the taxpayers and then under requisition by the Minister of Transport vested in the British Transport Commission under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 29, and under s. 30 compensation in respect of them became payable by the commission to the taxpayers, the amount being determined “by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI” to the Act. This amount was substantially higher than the written-down value of the wagons for income tax purposes, and as the taxpayers had received allowances under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, they were assessed under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, to give effect to a balancing charge in respect of the excess of the original cost of the wagons over the written-down values.

HELD: the transfer of wagons under s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947, was not a sale at common law, since it did not involve a mutual assent and a price; it was an acquisition authorised by statute and not a compulsory purchase, for which an independent procedure (involving the Acquisition of Lands (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946) and different compensation provisions were laid down: Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1927) (96 L.J.K.B. 735), distinguished; any assumption that a balancing charge could be made in such circumstances in s. 34 and s. 35 of the Finance Act, 1948, did not affect the construction of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945; and, therefore, the wagons were not machinery or plant which had been “sold” within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945 and no balancing charge could be made under the sub-section.

APPEAL against an order of UPJOHN, J., dated Apr. 29, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 64, allowing an appeal from the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who had held that an assessment to give effect to a balancing charge had been properly made on the taxpayers under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, in respect of their former plant and machinery, consisting of railway wagons, which, when under requisition by the Minister of Transport, had vested in the British Transport Commission on Jan. 1, 1948, under s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947. The taxpayers contended that the wagons were not “sold” to the commission within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945, and, therefore, that no balancing charge could be raised in respect thereof. The Crown contended that the transaction was a sale within the meaning of the enactment.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The Transport Act, 1947, by s. 1 set up a public authority to be called the British Transport Commission, referred to in the Act as "the commission". Part II of the Act provided for the acquisition by the commission of railway and canal undertakings and of certain railway wagons. The acquisition of railway wagons is dealt with in s. 29 to s. 32. By s. 29:

"Where, immediately before the date of transfer, any privately owned railway wagon is under requisition by virtue of an exercise of the powers in that behalf conferred by reg. 53 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939—(a) the property in that wagon shall vest in the commission on the date of transfer, free from any mortgage or other like incumbrance, and the requisition shall then cease; and (b) the Crown shall not be liable for any compensation under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, or otherwise in respect of any damage to the wagon occurring during the period of requisition."

By s. 30 (1):

"Where under the last preceding section the property in any wagon vests in the commission, the commission shall, subject to the provisions of the three next succeeding sub-sections, pay as compensation in respect thereof an amount determined, by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI to this Act."

By s. 31 (1):

"Subject to the provisions of this section, the compensation payable by the commission in respect of a privately owned wagon vesting in them on the date of transfer shall be paid to the person who, immediately before the date of transfer, was the owner of the wagon."

By s. 32 (1):

"The amount payable by way of compensation in respect of a wagon the property in which vests in the commission on the date of transfer shall be satisfied in the manner provided by Part VI of this Act by the issue to the person entitled thereto of British transport stock."

The amount which was to be paid for railway wagons which were acquired by the commission under those sections was subject to s. 30 (2), (3) and (4). The amount specified in sched. VI to the Act, which is headed "Compensation for acquisition of privately owned wagons", and shows the amount payable for the different types of railway wagons, varies according to the year in which the wagon was built without reference to its condition, and the payment was to be made in British Transport Stock.

The taxpayers had 663 wagons to which s. 29 of the Transport Act applied, and on Jan. 1, 1948, the property in those wagons was transferred to and vested in the commission under that section. Paragraph 9 of the Case shows that:

"The [taxpayers] in due course received compensation for [their] wagons the property in which had vested in the commission. The amount of the compensation was substantially higher than the written-down value of the wagons for income tax purposes as appearing in the [taxpayers'] books. This written-down value was substantially lower than the original cost of the wagons. The balancing charge of £29,021, given effect to in the assessment to income tax for 1948-49 under appeal, represents, with the exception of £963 referable to other matters and not in dispute, the excess of the original cost over the said written-down value. For reasons hereinafter appearing it was said for the [taxpayers] that [they were] not subject to any balancing charge in respect of the said excess."

Section 17 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, so far as material, reads:

- A " (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not . . . and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act referred to as 'a balancing allowance' or 'a balancing charge') shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis period for which that event occurs . . . (3) If the sale . . . moneys exceed the amount, if any, of the said expenditure still unallowed as at the time of the event, a balancing charge shall be made, and the amount on which it is made shall be an amount equal to the excess or, where the said amount still unallowed is nil, to the said moneys."
- C

- D The object of this section is that, if plant and machinery have been depreciated in the taxpayers' books and income tax allowances have been made, and the plant or machinery is subsequently sold at a higher price than its depreciated price, then the excess of the one over the other is subject to a balancing charge on which income tax may be levied. If the price for which the plant or machinery is disposed of is less than its written-down price, there is to be a balancing allowance. Although, so far as I know, no case of a balancing allowance has reached this court as yet, there have been one or two cases in which a balancing charge has been made.

- E It is claimed by the Crown that a balancing charge of £29,021 falls to be made on the taxpayers on the basis that the wagons which were acquired by the commission under s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947, were sold to the commission within the meaning of the words in s. 17 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The real question for decision is whether, by reason of s. 29 to s. 32 of the Transport Act, 1947, there was a sale to the commission of the wagons which I have already mentioned.
- F

The Special Commissioners held that the assessment on the taxpayers was properly made. Paragraph 14 (4) of the Case reads:

" . . . what took place was in our opinion a ' transfer of the ownership of a thing from one person to another for a money price ' "

- G Then they refer to HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 29, p. 5, para. 1, and they say:

- " . . . we hold that it was a sale. We do not doubt that the wrongful confiscation of a chattel, although accompanied by a subsequent payment of a sum called ' compensation ', would not constitute a sale. In this case, however, s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947, vested the property in the [taxpayers'] wagons, which were already lawfully in the possession of the Minister of Transport under S.R. & O., No. 1085 of 1939, in the commission and the same enactment, by s. 30, provided compensation, to be computed under the provisions of sched. VI, which we hold was a money price. We think also that, if assent is necessary to the conclusion of a valid sale, it must be assumed to be present when a statute, such as the Transport Act, 1947, becomes law, since the [taxpayers as persons] living within the jurisdiction of the British Crown must assent to all such laws as are duly enacted, including the enactments contained in s. 29 and s. 30 aforesaid."

The last part of that finding was not sought to be supported by learned counsel for the Crown. The taxpayers appealed, and УРЖОН, J., allowed their appeal, holding that there was no sale. The inspector of taxes appeals to this court.

In the Transport Act, 1947, the word "sale" is not used in relation to the acquisition by the commission of property of one kind or another. Sections 12 to 16 provide for the acquisition by the commission of railway and canal undertakings. Section 12 (1) reads: A "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the whole of the undertakings of the bodies of persons specified in sched. III to this Act, being the bodies who fall within the class described in the next succeeding section, shall, on Jan. 1, 1948 (hereafter in this Part of this Act, and in the other provisions of this Act so far as they refer to the acquisition by the commission of the said undertakings, referred to as 'the date of transfer'), vest by virtue of this Act in the commission."

Section 12 specifies the date of transfer as Jan. 1, 1948, which is the date of transfer of all such undertakings under the Act.

Section 16 (1) of the Act provides for compensation for the acquisition of the railway and canal undertakings which are acquired C

"by reference to the values of the securities specified in sched. IV . . .", which, by s. 16 (2),

"shall be an amount equal to the aggregate value (computed in accordance with the provisions of the next succeeding section) of all the securities, if any, of that body existing immediately before the date of transfer . . ."; D and under s. 16 (3):

"The compensation so payable shall be satisfied . . . by the issue . . . of British transport stock . . ."

in accordance with the provisions of sched. V.

Part III of the Act, s. 39 onwards, deals with the acquisition of certain road transport undertakings. Section 49 deals with the assessment of compensation in respect of road transport undertakings which are acquired, and the mode of compensation there is on quite a different footing from that contained in Part II as to railway and canal undertakings and as to wagons. For instance, in regard to compensation under Part III a number of different circumstances have to be considered, including under s. 47 (2) the amount which the property would fetch if sold in the open market. F

The real contest is whether there was a sale of the wagons to the commission, or, in other words, whether the plant was sold. But the argument has developed a little, and I think the questions for the consideration of the court may be stated in this way. First, was there a sale in the ordinary understanding of the word? Secondly, is there anything in the provisions of the Transport Act to lead one to say that what took place must, for the purposes of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, be regarded as a sale? Thirdly, was there a compulsory sale?, though it is not admitted by the taxpayers that a compulsory sale would have the effect for which the Crown contends, and it is disputed that there was a compulsory sale. The fourth question arises on s. 34 and s. 35 of the Finance Act, 1948, from which it is claimed on behalf of the Crown that, by analogy, one ought to say there was a sale, even if that did not appear elsewhere. G

Was there a sale in the ordinary understanding of the word? The word "sold" assumes a seller and a buyer. Unless there is some reason for giving a special meaning to the word, it must be given its ordinary meaning. Did the taxpayers sell their wagons to the commission? I am quite sure what the answer of the taxpayers would be, but that is not much help. What would anyone accustomed H to the use of the words "sale" or "sold" answer? It seems to me that everyone must say "the taxpayers did not sell". Did the commission buy from the taxpayers? Equally, on the ordinary meaning of the word, I should find it difficult to say that the commission bought the wagons. In other words, there was not in this case a seller or a buyer, and that leads me to think that there was not a sale of the wagons in the sense in which the word is ordinarily understood. The wagons were acquired, as the Act says, and on Jan. 1, 1948, the property in those wagons vested in the commission. BENJAMIN'S SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY (2nd ed., p. 1), an authority on this subject, says:

"By the common law a sale of personal property was usually termed a 'bargain and sale of goods'. It may be defined to be a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money. Hence it follows that, to constitute a valid sale, there must be a concurrence of the following elements, viz.: (i) Parties competent to contract; (ii) mutual assent; (iii) a thing, the absolute or general property in which is transferred from the seller to the buyer; and (iv) a price in money paid or promised."

Counsel for the taxpayers, who relies on that passage, pointed out that in the circumstances of this case there is no mutual assent, nor, as he submitted, is there a price in money paid or promised, and on that he based his argument that here there was no sale—no sale according to the ordinary use of that word, or according to the definition of "sale" as accepted in the courts of this country generation after generation. I think that is right.

Is there anything in the provisions of the Transport Act to lead this court to say that what took place ought to be regarded as a sale within s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945? Again, I cannot see that there is anything in the Transport Act which should lead this court to take a view of the word "sold" in s. 17 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, other than that which it normally holds. An examination of the whole of the Transport Act, and in particular of s. 29 to s. 32, shows this. By s. 29,

"Where, immediately before the date of transfer, any privately owned railway wagon is under requisition . . .", the property in that wagon shall vest in the commission on the day of transfer. It is a statutory vesting, a change of ownership brought about by statute. There is nothing in that section which has the appearance of bargain and sale, or of sale. Section 30 (1) provides:

"Where under the last preceding section the property in any wagon vests in the commission, the commission shall, subject to the provisions of the three next succeeding sub-sections, pay as compensation in respect thereof an amount determined, by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI to this Act."

That, counsel for the taxpayers submitted, is not a price. The value, in accordance with the method of arriving at it which is set out in sched. VI, is something which has to be paid, but, counsel submitted, it is not a price. I am not sure that that part of counsel's argument has quite as much force as his earlier submission that this is not a sale in any sense of the word. Then there is the provision that the mode of satisfaction of the compensation is to be by British Transport Stock. I do not find in these provisions anything which leads me to think that one ought to give the word "sold" in s. 17 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, any meaning different from that which it normally has. So, on the second point, it seems to me that the argument of the Crown fails, too.

Counsel for the Crown submitted that, if there was not a sale in the ordinary sense, there was a compulsory sale, that all the elements of a compulsory sale were present, and that this court ought to hold that consequently there was a sale for the purposes of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. Authorities cited dealing with the compulsory acquisition of property showed that, when a stage is reached at which value has been fixed in the way provided by statute, the position of vendor and purchaser is created, so that the rights of the parties can be determined on a vendor and purchaser summons. I do not propose to refer to those authorities. I do not think that they apply to the circumstances of this case. In the case of a compulsory acquisition of land, it may be that something in the nature of a compulsory contract is reached. Thereupon, if the parties' rights have to be determined, that may be done on a vendor and purchaser summons. That is not this case. Section 8 of the Transport Act, 1947, authorises the commission compulsorily to purchase land for its own purposes. It appears to me that the section draws a clear distinction between compulsory purchase and what is done by the commission when it acquires railway undertakings or canal undertakings or railway wagons, or road haulage undertakings under later sections. Section 8 provides:

"The Minister may authorise the commission to purchase compulsorily any land which they require for any purpose connected with the discharge of their functions, and the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (except s. 2 thereof) shall apply as if the commission were a local authority within the meaning of that Act and as if this Act had been in force immediately before the commencement of that Act."

Section 8 thus gives the commission power to acquire land compulsorily. If they do that, they have to comply with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts embraced in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946. They have to give the necessary notices. The owner of the land then may have an opportunity of agreeing what compensation shall be paid, if his land is to be acquired for the purposes of the public. Otherwise, the value is fixed by arbitration. That is the procedure under s. 8. It is wholly different from the provisions in s. 29, under which the ownership in the company's wagons vested in the commission on Jan. 1, 1948. The provisions as to payment of compensation are wholly different. I do not regard the vesting of the wagons in the commission as a compulsory sale or in the nature of a compulsory sale. It was an acquisition authorised by statute and paid for by way of compensation in the manner provided by the statute.

"carried on the business of brewers and wine and spirit merchants, and in the course of this business kept large stocks of rum which had to be reduced and blended before sale. The blended product was sold either wholesale or retail in relatively small quantities. In January, 1918, the Admiralty, acting under the Defence of the Realm Regulations, took over about one-third of the stocks in question then owned by the respondent company. Payment of £10,315 was offered by the Admiralty, based on the actual cost of the rum and allowing a profit of about 1s. per proof gallon, and this amount was accepted on account by the respondent company, without prejudice to its claim for a larger amount."

Thereafter there was much litigation. The company proceeded by petition of right, but in the events which happened that was useless, and ultimately they had to claim before a tribunal which assessed the amount due to the brewery company as £5,309 10s. and that amount was paid to the brewery company some years after the rum had been taken. Thereupon, it was claimed by the inspector of taxes that the £5,309 10s., the second payment, which was a payment by way of compensation in one sense, ought to be included in the company's accounts for the year 1918-19. But the company contended that the sum was not a receipt of the company's trade or a profit arising from its trade or business, and that the rum taken over by the Admiralty in the foregoing circumstances was not, and could not be said to have been, sold by the respondent company in the course of its trade or business or at all. ROWLATT, J., the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords all held that the sum was a sum properly taken into consideration in the company's earnings for the year in which the sum had been taken. ROWLATT, J., said (12 Tax Cas. 934):

"The brewery company had a large quantity of rum, not yet refined or reduced or prepared for sale, which was requisitioned by the Admiralty . . .
 A Now the Admiralty took these goods at the beginning of the company's year which ended in 1918, and towards the end of the year, or in the summer, they paid £10,000, which they said was the cost, and some other allowances, plus 1s. a gallon profit. What was done upon that is perfectly clear to my mind. Neither party gave up anything. The Admiralty said that was what
 B they thought the sum was, and they were not prepared to pay any more, and the brewery company said it was not enough, but they took that sum; the Admiralty raised no objection. The brewery company said: 'We do not take it in satisfaction; we will reserve our rights to make any further claim which we may be advised to make', and the Admiralty said, 'Very well; we have no objection. You are at liberty to make any further claim'. That is what took place. Now if they had gone under the regulation they would
 C have got, to put it shortly, the cost to them plus the pre-war profit, as a price. That would have been a price. However, what they said was that this part of the regulation is invalid, and they went by petition of right to SALTER, J., and obtained a judgment from him which said that the price was not to be so determined or so limited; their right was to have the market value, to be assessed by the county court judge. Now, if they had got that, they again
 D would have got a price. But at that period the Indemnity Act came into effect, which avoided the judgment of SALTER, J., as well as other judgments in pari materia or within the ambit of the Act; and instead of that, it gave people in the position of the brewery company a right to go before a commission presided over by Sir Francis Kyffin Taylor."

E The learned judge added that they went before the tribunal, and in a passage relied on by counsel for the Crown he said (ibid., 937):

"Now what is that except a compulsory sale of the rum? It seems to me, when you really look at the substance of the thing, it is in a very small compass. That is all it is, a compulsory sale of the rum."

F As I have said, that judgment was upheld in the other courts. In the House of Lords VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., said (ibid., 953):

"Two points are made on behalf of the appellants. First, it is said that the £5,300 is not a profit from the appellants' business at all, but is a sum payable by way of compensation for the compulsory taking by the Crown of a part of the appellants' capital. I cannot agree with that contention."

G So the gist of the decision was that, though the rum was acquired by the Admiralty, it was equivalent to a contract of sale. A profit was certainly earned by the company in respect of £5,309, and that had to be taken into the company's accounts. From that, counsel for the Crown submits that, where, as in this case, there is a compulsory acquisition, the vesting of the property of the taxpayers in the commission on Jan. 1, 1948, and payment is made therefor, that likewise
 H ought to be treated as a sale. I think the two things are wholly different, and the difference, indeed, is made clear by reference to the compulsory powers of purchase of land given in s. 8 of the Act. In my view, what took place cannot be held to be a compulsory sale.

The next point arises on s. 34 and s. 35 of the Finance Act, 1948. The sidenote to s. 34 reads:

"Remission of balancing charges and other provisions, in case of certain undertakings absorbed under nationalisation schemes."

The section does not apply in this case directly; that is shown by sub-s. (1) (b). It does, or might, apply to the provisions as to the taking over of an undertaking under s. 12 of the Transport Act, but it does not apply to s. 29. Section 34 provides:

"(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where—(a) under any statutory provisions to which this section applies, property is transferred to a commission, authority, board, body or person; and (b) under the statutory provisions in question, the liability of the transferor arising from any balancing charge falling to be made on the occasion of the transfer becomes a liability of the transferee. (2) The transfer shall be treated for income tax purposes as a sale of property to which s. 59 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, applies and as if the parties to the sale had given notice of election under sub-s. (4) of that section."

The submission of counsel for the Crown is that that section shows that in other cases the draftsman of the Finance Act, 1948, had probably assumed that there would be or might be balancing charges, and if that was his view it provided some guidance or some help towards a true interpretation of the Transport Act, 1947. And he submitted that the position was carried further by s. 35 (2) which, like s. 34 (6), ends in this way:

"This section shall be deemed always to have had effect."

So that both sections have retrospective effect. Section 35 (1) reads:

"The question whether any and if so what balancing allowance or balancing charge falls to be made to or on the National Coal Board on the occasion of the transfer to the British Transport Commission under s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947, of any railway wagons which the said board acquired under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, shall be determined as if s. 29 of the Finance Act, 1947, and sched. VII to that Act, had not been passed."

That shows, said counsel, that, at the time of the passing of the Act of 1948, the question had arisen whether there should be made, or whether there fell to be made, a balancing charge or allowance as between the National Coal Board and the British Transport Commission. Of course, balancing charges and balancing allowances had been first mentioned in the Income Tax Act, 1945, and I have no doubt that, by the time the Finance Act, 1948, was passed, someone had seen that s. 17 of the Act of 1945 might lead to a harvest one way or the other. I have no doubt that someone in the National Coal Board and someone in the British Transport Commission had discussed it. But that by no means shows that a balancing charge falls to be made.

Counsel for the ratepayers submitted that nothing in those two sections of the Finance Act, 1948, helped towards a true interpretation of the provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, and it seems to me that that submission is right. I would repeat what LORD RADCLIFFE said in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Dowdall, O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (2) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 544):

"The beliefs or assumptions of those who frame Acts of Parliament cannot make the law."

I believe it to be the duty of this court to determine the effect of the Transport Act from the wording of that Act itself. I do not find myself greatly helped by references to s. 34 or s. 35 of the Finance Act, 1948, or by references to the change which was made by the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 292, or by the Finance Act, 1952, sched. VI. On the view which I take of the provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, namely, that there was in the circumstances of this case no sale, it seems to me that the judgment of UPJOHN, J., is right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 17 (1), laid down the events on which a balancing allowance or a balancing charge should fall to be made as follows:

A “ Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—
(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not; or (b) the machinery or plant, whether still in use or not, ceases to belong to the person carrying on the trade by reason of the coming to an end of a foreign concession; or (c) the machinery or plant is destroyed; or (d) the machinery or plant is put out of use as being worn out or obsolete or otherwise
B useless or no longer required . . . ”

C They were four clear, distinct events, and on the happening of any one of them certain consequences respecting a balancing charge or a balancing allowance followed. The taxpayers had been assessed to a balancing charge of £29,021 in respect of certain wagons which belonged to them, and which had been requisitioned by the Minister of Transport for a period and then, under the Transport Act, 1947, had been vested in the commission. Section 17 (2) provides:

“ Where there are no sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys . . . ”

D which clearly has reference to the events set out in sub-s. (1) (a), (b), (c) and (d), and then it goes on to deal with the balancing allowance, and the words are similarly used in sub-s. (3):

“ If the sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys exceed the amount, if any, of the said expenditure still unallowed as at the time of the event . . . ”

E then the balancing charge comes into being. Section 68 (1) of that Act, the definition section, provides:

“ ‘ Sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys ’ mean, in relation to an event which gives rise or might give rise to a balancing allowance or a balancing charge to or on any person or is material in determining whether any, and, if so, what, annual allowance is to be made to a person under Part III of this Act,—(a) where the event is a sale of any property, the net proceeds to that person of the sale; (b) where the event is the coming to an end of an interest in property on or by reason of the coming to an end of a foreign concession, any compensation payable to that person in respect of that property; (c) where the event is the demolition or destruction of any property, the net amount received by him for the remains of the property, together with any insurance moneys received by him in respect of the demolition or destruction and any other compensation of any description received by him in respect thereof, in so far as that compensation consists of capital sums; and (d) where the event is that a building or structure ceases altogether to be used or that machinery or plant is put out of use, any compensation of any description received by him in respect of that event, in so far as that compensation consists of capital sums.”

That is the machinery of s. 17, and I think it is important because all that we are really concerned with here is to say whether the event which took place, as described by my Lord, under the provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, was a sale as distinct from any of the other events in s. 17 (1). The problem is, not a simple matter, but a complicated and difficult matter.

By s. 29 of the Transport Act, 1947, the wagons were vested in the British Transport Commission as from Jan. 1, 1948. Section 30 (1) uses the word "compensation":

"Where under the last preceding section the property in any wagon vests in the commission, the commission shall, subject to the provisions of the three next succeeding sub-sections, pay as compensation in respect thereof an amount determined, by reference to the type of wagon and the year in which the wagon was first built, in accordance with the table set out in sched. VI to this Act."

And by s. 31 (1), it "shall be paid to the person who, immediately before the date of transfer, was the owner of the wagon", and, by s. 32 (1),

". . . by the issue to the person entitled thereto of British transport stock."

Schedule VI is not unimportant, because of the argument which has been addressed to us on both sides. It is headed: "Compensation for acquisition of privately owned wagons". "Year in which wagon was first built" is the heading of the first column, then there are columns for the weight, whether the truck is made of wood, and so on, and then the prices. Thus, the scheme set out in the Act was: "These wagons which admittedly are your property, though they have been requisitioned by us for use, shall now vest in the British Transport Commission, and you shall receive by way of compensation those sums which we have arbitrarily fixed (I use the word "arbitrarily" in no sinister sense) and you shall be paid that sum and no other".

If the test be, as I think it is, and as my Lord stated: Is that a sale within the ordinary connotation of the word "sale"? the first answer would appear to be clearly "No". The vendor had no choice as to whether he would sell or not, or as to the price or sum or compensation which he was to receive which was fixed by the schedule. He had no choice whatever as to the form in which he would get his payment. He was to have it by way of British Transport Stock whether he liked it or not. From that point of view it would have seemed, using the language in its ordinary sense, that a compulsory acquisition, a compulsory transfer, or some such phrase as that, was more appropriate to that particular transaction or event than the word "sale". But counsel for the Crown addressed a forcible argument on this matter, by saying: "Although the outward form of it may not appear to be a sale in the ordinary sense of that term, as it is customarily used, nevertheless, for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, 1945, it is a sale", and he relied on the words in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 29, p. 5, of which we were told the author was the late SCOTT, L.J.:

"Sale is the transfer of the ownership of a thing from one person to another for a money price."

The sidenote to that paragraph reads: "Sale and exchange or barter distinguished". Counsel relied on that, and said: "If that is right, we come fairly and squarely within it, because there is a transfer of the ownership of a wagon from one person to another for the money price set out in sched. VI to the Transport Act, 1947". The article deals in much more detail with what a contract of sale is, but great insistence was laid on that definition as being conclusive. It was said in terms: "Of course, the definition stated by the late Mr. BENJAMIN is there too, but, in a word, one should follow, not that, but this plain, simple declaration." Though one must not be overawed by great names, the late Mr. BENJAMIN admittedly was a great lawyer and a great authority on the sale of goods. The definition cited by UPJOHN, J., and by my LORD is his own. It comes from the edition which he prepared for publication and has been incorporated in every subsequent edition of BENJAMIN'S SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY, and great respect should be paid to it. In that definition Mr. BENJAMIN lays stress on the question of mutual assent. Counsel for the Crown argued that mutual assent does not matter, and he cited Newcastle Breweries, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) in which time and time again the lords justices in the Court of Appeal and the lords of appeal in the House of Lords referred to this matter in terms of this kind. LORD PHILLIMORE said (12 Tax Cas. 954):

- A "The rum was purchased for trade purposes, and the particular sale was none the less a trade sale because the trade was forced upon the appellant company."

VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., said (ibid., 953):

- B "If the raw rum had been voluntarily sold to other traders, the price must clearly have come into the computation of the appellants' profits, and the circumstance that the sale was compulsory and was to the Crown makes no difference in principle."

And there are other observations to the like effect. That case was seeking to establish that a compulsory sale—as that was held to be—made no difference to the point which was then in issue, which was: "Were there profits which had been made? Had profits been made? If so, into what year of assessment do they fall?", and the House decided that profits had been made and that the fact that it was a compulsory sale made no difference. That case was pressed on us very strongly, as were the cases under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, particularly Regent's Canal Co. v. Ware (3) and Great Western Ry. Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4).

- D With great respect to counsel's argument, I do not propose to discuss the matter at length, but I cannot think that those cases, and the analogy sought to be drawn, have really got any true application to the facts with which we have to deal. Under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, most elaborate machinery is set up for the taking of land, machinery dealing with the questions of arbitration and agreement as to the price, and with the verdict of a jury in default of agreement, and so on, and I can very well understand that, in the machinery of that Act, one does quite clearly reach a point where one can say: "The position of vendor and purchaser is here created". But I cannot think that those cases and the principles applicable to them are really of very much assistance on the question of the taking of these wagons. The question here is the one simple matter: Was this a sale?

- F In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Wolfson (5) LORD SIMONDS said, on a question of construction ([1949] 1 All E.R. 868):

- G "It was urged that the construction that I favour leaves an easy loophole through which the evasive taxpayer may find escape. That may be so, but I will repeat what has been said before. It is not the function of a court of law to give to words a strained and unnatural meaning because only thus will a taxing section apply to a transaction which, had the legislature thought of it, would have been covered by appropriate words. It is the duty of the court to give to the words of this sub-section their reasonable meaning . . ."

- H It is argued here by counsel for the taxpayers that it is giving a strained and unnatural meaning to the word "sold" in s. 17 (1) (a) to call the taking of the wagons and the awarding of compensation under sched. VI a "sale"; and he referred us to two statutes. The Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 292 (1), provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, where any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or an annual allowance has been made for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either . . ."

where the machinery or plant ceases to belong to the person carrying on the trade, where there is a sale of the machinery or plant, or in any other circumstances of any description; and I gathered that counsel's whole purpose in citing that section was to reinforce the words of LORD SIMONDS in the case which I have just cited, and say: "The legislature could, in s. 17 (q), have devised and inserted words which would have covered this transaction completely, as in s. 292 (1) they do, but one must not construe s. 17 (1) (a) of the Act of 1945 by putting in words which the legislature themselves did not do." On the first point in this case—Was there here a sale of the wagons?—I am of the same opinion as my Lord and URJOHN, J., that there was no sale within the meaning of s. 17 (1) (a). A

Counsel for the taxpayers said with force that for there to be a sale there must be a price, and there was no price here in any sense of the word, because the term "price" must connote some agreement or some assessment according to the value. At one stage in the argument I thought that the assessment of value under sched. VI, crude though it might be, might suffice because there wagons are taken according to their year, tonnage and structure, and a fixed value or sum is placed on them. But it is plain that it did not matter one iota what the condition of the wagons was. They might have been in the last stages of decay, but the sum laid down in sched. VI was automatically to be paid according to the year of building, the materials used, and the tonnage. Many arguments on both sides dealing with assent, and the construction of the words "price" and "compensation" were used before us. I agree with what my Lord said about them. I do not think that the event of the taking over of these wagons was within the words "the machinery or plant is sold". B

As regards s. 34 and s. 35 of the Finance Act, 1948, I understood the argument to be that, if one looked through the Acts one would find there a consistent scheme, that this transaction or event quite properly could be comprehended under the term "sale", and that it was only if one adopted the standard set by Mr. BENJAMIN that one fell into error: "Follow the Acts, follow the consistent scheme, and all will be well". Under s. 34 of the Finance Act, 1948, which by sub-s. (6) was to be deemed always to have had effect: C

"(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where—(a) under any statutory provisions to which this section applies, property is transferred to a commission . . . (b) under the statutory provisions in question, the liability of the transferor arising from any balancing charge falling to be made on the occasion of the transfer becomes a liability of the transferee. (2) The transfer shall be treated for income tax purposes as a sale of property to which s. 59 (1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, applies and as if the parties to the sale had given notice of election under sub-s. (4) of that section." D

I will not read the relevant parts of s. 59, but it is perfectly plain that the purpose of s. 34 (2) could perfectly well have been achieved without any mention of the word "sale" at all. And to say that, because the words "treated for income tax purposes as a sale" within the meaning of s. 59 (1) (a) are found in the Act of 1948 leads to the conclusion that under the Income Tax Act, 1945, this was a sale, is a step which I myself find it extremely difficult to take. Similarly, it may very well be that s. 35 (1) impliedly says that there is to be a balancing charge on an occasion of this sort, but I do not think that that of itself lends very much assistance to the determination of the simple question in this case: Were the events as we now know them, which took place by virtue of s. 29, s. 30, s. 31 and s. 32, and sched. VI, a sale for the purposes of s. 17 (1)? With great respect to the arguments which have been addressed to us by the Crown, I am of opinion that they cannot be, and that the judgment of URJOHN, J., ought to be affirmed. E

HODSON, L.J.: I agree. F

CALVERT v. MAYES.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Barry, JJ.),
December 9, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Living on earnings of prostitution—House and car knowingly permitted to be used for purposes of prostitution—No money paid to defendant by prostitutes—Vagrancy Act, 1898 (c. 39), s. 1 (1) (a), s. 1 (3), as amended by Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912 (c. 20), s. 7 (1).

- A The respondent, the driver of a motor car, visited, in the evenings from October, 1952, to April, 1953, certain public houses known to be frequented by prostitutes. He parked his car outside and allowed it to be used for the purposes of prostitution, sometimes while it was parked, and sometimes while he was driving American service men back to their base camp. He would also on occasions drive American service men and prostitutes into the neighbouring countryside and either wait while sexual intercourse took place or return to fetch them the following morning. There were standard charges for the hire of the car which the men paid to him, the prostitutes getting their reward in the form of food, drink, and clothing. From January, 1953, to April, 1953, the respondent permitted his house to be used by prostitutes and service men for the purposes of prostitution, and during March, 1953, one of the prostitutes stayed at the respondent's house on the terms that she would pay for her board and lodging by prostituting herself with men whom she either brought herself to, or who were brought to her at, the house. On all these occasions, the respondent received money from the men, the prostitutes receiving their reward in the form of food, drink and clothing. An information was preferred against the respondent charging that he, being a male person, for a period of six months unlawfully and knowingly lived in part on the earnings of prostitution, contrary to the Vagrancy Act, 1898, s. 1 (1).

E HELD: (i) although all the money was paid direct to the respondent, he was in the same position as if it had been paid to the prostitutes and they had passed it on to him; it was being earned by prostitution; and so he was guilty of an offence against s. 1 (1).

F (ii) in any event, in the circumstances he had been proved to be habitually in the company of the prostitutes concerned and to have exercised direction and influence over their movements in such a manner as to show that he was aiding and abetting their prostitution, and, therefore, as he had failed to satisfy the court to the contrary, he was to be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution, and so had committed an offence under s. 1 (3) of the Act, as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, s. 7 (1).

G AS TO LIVING ON EARNINGS OF PROSTITUTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 403, para. 683; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 15, pp. 851, 852, Nos. 9347-9351.

CASE STATED by the recorder of King's Lynn.

H At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at King's Lynn on May 8, 1953, the appellant, Fred Calvert, a police superintendent, preferred an information against the respondent, Robert George Mayes, charging that for the previous six months at King's Lynn he, being a male person, unlawfully and knowingly lived in part on the earnings of prostitution, contrary to the Vagrancy Act, 1898, s. 1 (1). The justices convicted him and sentenced him to three months' imprisonment. He appealed to quarter sessions against the conviction and sentence.

On the hearing of the appeal the following facts were proved or admitted. The respondent, together with his wife and four children, occupied a house in King's Lynn. At all material times he was employed as an agricultural labourer.

In August, 1952, he was taught by one Douglas Haig Royle to drive a motor car, and thereafter he was employed by Royle as a part-time hire-car driver at a weekly wage of £2 plus commission. The hire-cars owned by Royle and driven by the respondent were not licensed hackney carriages. Throughout the period of twelve months immediately prior to the end of April, 1953, a number of young women, who were prostitutes and otherwise unemployed, came to King's Lynn on the advent of American air service men. They had no fixed place of abode and mostly frequented premises in King's Lynn, and, in particular, the Maid's Head public house and the Glendevon Hotel with the intention of introducing themselves to American service men for the purpose of prostitution. Throughout the period of six months immediately prior to the end of April, 1953, the respondent and Royle spent most of their evenings, with the exception of the time when the respondent was actually engaged in driving, inside the premises in question. The respondent knew that the women were prostitutes, he was habitually in their company, he exercised direction and influence over their movements, and generally aided and abetted their prostitution with American service men. On each occasion that he visited the premises in question, the car he drove was parked outside, sometimes empty and sometimes with one or more of the prostitutes sitting in it. The cars driven by the respondent were often used for the purposes of prostitution by the prostitutes and the service men in one or other of the following ways—(i) on journeys from King's Lynn to the American Air Force base at Sculthorpe, Norfolk (known as "base trips"), when sexual intercourse took place in the back of the car during the journey, or in some convenient place during a break in the journey. For these journeys, the standard hire charge was £2 which was paid to the respondent by the service men concerned, the prostitutes obtaining reward from the men in the form of food, drink, and clothing, though on one occasion one of them obtained from one man a small sum of money as such reward. A free service was provided for men at the base at Sculthorpe to King's Lynn with a late return at night; (ii) on journeys to barns, haystacks, or other convenient places in the countryside outside King's Lynn, where the prostitutes and men were left for the night and collected early the following morning, the men then being driven back to their base and the women brought back to King's Lynn; (iii) on short journeys to secluded places within or near King's Lynn when sexual intercourse took place either in the back of the car or in some convenient place nearby. The parties were then driven back by the respondent to the Maid's Head public house. The length of these journeys varied between three miles and two hundred yards. The respondent was paid 10s. by the men concerned for the use of the car, and the prostitutes obtained reward from them in the form of food, drink, and clothing; (iv) while standing outside the Maid's Head public house or Glendevon Hotel, when sexual intercourse took place in the back of the car. On one occasion the respondent and Royle were seen keeping watch about 10.45 p.m. outside the Glendevon Hotel, while an American service man and an unidentified girl had sexual intercourse in the back of the car; (v) for the conveyance of prostitutes and service men to the respondent's home for the purposes of prostitution. On some occasions, the prostitutes arranged their own meetings with the men and then arranged with the respondent to use his car. On other occasions, all the arrangements were made, and the parties brought together, by the respondent and Royle, or one or more prostitutes waited in the car until a service man or service men were brought to them by the respondent. At all times the respondent knew that his car was being used for the purpose of prostitution and he encouraged such use. During the six months' period the cars driven by the respondent were used frequently for the conveyance either of the prostitutes and service men or of one or more of the prostitutes in order to attract American service men. But for the presence of the prostitutes and opportunities for sexual intercourse, the car would have been used far less for journeys to the American base, and not at all for the other journeys, and the income of the respondent and Royle would then have been considerably reduced. The prostitutes on no occasion paid for journeys in the car, even when they were driven alone by the respondent.

From the beginning of 1953 until the end of April, 1953, the respondent knowingly permitted his house to be used as a brothel, and he was convicted of that offence and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. During this period, his house was frequently used by the prostitutes and service men for the purposes of prostitution. The respondent charged the American service men £2 per night and the prostitutes obtained reward from them in the form of food, drink, and clothing. No meals or services, other than the use of a room for the night, were provided for the service men. During March, 1953, one of the prostitutes stayed for four weeks at the respondent's house on the terms that she should pay him for her board and lodging by prostituting herself with men whom she brought to, or who would be brought to her at, the house. The respondent informed her that receiving one man would suffice to cover the cost of her keep for a week. In accordance with this arrangement, she frequently prostituted herself with service men in the house, and on each occasion the respondent was paid by the man concerned. During March, 1953, at least one other prostitute lived for a week at the respondent's house and there prostituted herself on the same terms as the first prostitute. As in the case of the use of the car driven by the respondent, arrangements for the use of his house for the purposes of prostitution were made sometimes by the prostitutes and sometimes by the respondent. On all occasions he knew the purpose for which the house was being used, and encouraged such user. The house was not otherwise used as a boarding-house or for the accommodation of lodgers. But for the opportunities for sexual intercourse, the rooms at the respondent's house would have been let far less frequently, if at all, and he would not have been able to demand such a heavy charge for their use. On occasions, when they were short of money, some of the prostitutes were given sums of money by the respondent to enable them to purchase meals. On no occasion was any money or reward paid to the respondent by any of the prostitutes. The money paid by the service men to the respondent was for the use either of his house, or of the car, as a brothel.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant at the hearing of the appeal that, on these facts, the respondent had been proved guilty of the offence charged against him. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, although the women concerned were prostitutes and he had knowingly permitted his house to be used as a brothel (on which charge he had been convicted) and had knowingly used his car for the purposes of prostitution, no money had ever been paid to him by any of the prostitutes, the money paid to him by the men had been paid solely for the use of the house or the car as a brothel, and, in those circumstances, he was not guilty of the offence charged against him.

The recorder allowed the appeal on the ground that, although the evidence would support a charge of keeping a brothel, there was no evidence to support a charge of living in part on the earnings of prostitution, and the appellant appealed.

Boreham for the appellant.

E. L. Gardner for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The respondent has a cottage in King's Lynn. He arranged for a prostitute to live in that cottage with him and it was found that during March, 1953, a young woman named Eady,

"one of the said prostitutes stayed for a period of four weeks at the respondent's said dwelling-house on the terms that she should pay the respondent for her board and lodging by prostituting herself with men whom she brought to, or who would be brought to her at, the said dwelling-house. The respondent informed her that one man per week would suffice to cover the cost of her keep for that week."

What does that mean? She lives in the house and pays nothing, it is true, to the respondent. He says he will give her lodging and will board her, but she has to bring at least one man a week to the house, and when the man comes to the house he takes £2 from the man. Who earns the money? The woman earns the money. How does she earn the money? She earns it by prostitution. Why is he not then living wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution? It is just the same as if the American service man had paid the girl £2 and she had handed over £2 to the respondent. The respondent is exactly in the position of a brothel-keeper who keeps girls on the premises and takes money from the people who come to the brothel. He is letting the room and letting the services of the woman.

The Vagrancy Act, 1898, provides:

"1 (1) Every male person who—(a) knowingly lives wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and may be dealt with accordingly."

Section 1 (3), as amended by s. 7 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, provides:

"Where a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute or is proved to have exercised control, direction, or influence over the movements of a prostitute in such a manner as to show that he is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person or generally, he shall, unless he can satisfy the court to the contrary, be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution."

It is said that the respondent has satisfied the court that he was not living on the earnings of prostitution because the learned recorder found that on no occasion was any money or reward paid to him by any of the prostitutes. Why? Because he took it from the man before the man paid the prostitute. The man was paying for the room with the prostitute in it with whom he was going to commit fornication. The respondent simply took the money before it reached the prostitute, and it seems to me clearly he was living on the earnings of prostitution.

There are other matters which are found by the learned recorder to which I had better refer in detail. So far as the respondent was concerned, the arrangement he made with this woman Eady clearly, in my opinion, brings him within the terms of the statute, but, no doubt, it is desired that we should consider the other part of the case, because this is what the recorder finds and, no doubt (as we are told), other cases are dependent on it:

"Throughout the period of six months immediately prior to the end of the month of April, 1953, the respondent and his employer . . . Royle spent most of their evenings, with the exception of the time when the respondent was actually engaged in driving, inside the [public houses where these women congregated]. The respondent knew that the said women were prostitutes, he was habitually in their company, he exercised direction and influence over their movements and generally aided and abetted their prostitution with American service men. On each occasion that the respondent visited the said premises the car he drove for the said Royle was parked outside, sometimes empty and sometimes with one or more of the said prostitutes sitting in it. The cars driven by the respondent were often used for the purposes of prostitution by the said prostitutes and the American service men who formed their clientele, in one or other of the following ways."

Then he sets out, first, the journeys from King's Lynn to the Air Force base. For these journeys the respondent was paid £2, and sexual intercourse took place in the back of the car or at some convenient place during a break in the journey.

"The said £2 was paid to the respondent by the American service men concerned for the use of the said car. The standard charge for the journey by hire car was £2. The prostitutes obtained from the American service men reward in the form of food, drink and clothing. On one occasion one of the prostitutes obtained from one of the American service men a small sum of money as such reward. There is a free service provided for the service men at the base . . . to King's Lynn with a late return at night."

A So these service men had means of making the journey, but they hired the cars driven by the respondent in order that they might indulge in sexual intercourse in the cars, and for that the respondent and his employer were receiving money which they would not have received if they had not knowingly permitted these prostitutes to behave in this way. The Case continues:

B "On journeys to barns, haystacks or other convenient places in the countryside of Norfolk outside the borough of King's Lynn where the said prostitutes and the American service men were left for the night and collected early the following morning: the American service men were then driven back to their base and the women brought back to King's Lynn. On short journeys . . . to secluded places within or near to the borough of King's Lynn when sexual intercourse took place either in the back of the car or in some convenient place nearby. The parties were then driven back by the respondent to the Maid's Head public house. The length of these journeys varied between three miles and two hundred yards. For these journeys the respondent was paid 10s."

There are then various other findings, and the learned recorder finds that

D "But for the presence of the prostitutes and opportunities for sexual intercourse the said car would have been used far less for journeys to the American base and not at all for the other journeys. The income of the said Royle and the respondent's commission would thus have been considerably reduced."

E In the circumstances, it seems to me quite clear that the respondent was trading in prostitution. He is living on the earnings of a prostitute, because the prostitutes are earning money which otherwise he would never have received. It does not seem to me to matter whether he received it from the hand of the service man or whether the man handed it to the girl and the girl handed it to him. In any case, she was earning the money by prostituting herself. The fact that the respondent was also driving the men back to the Air Force base does not seem to me to avail him by way of defence because, though it is true that, if it was a legitimate journey, he would have been paid the same sum of money, he would probably never have gone on these journeys because the service men would, presumably, have used the free transport provided if it were not for the fact that he was providing them with a prostitute to ride in the car with them.

G The learned recorder obviously gave great care to this matter. He came to the conclusion that the Act did not extend to this class of case. He found that the respondent was keeping a brothel—not only a brothel in his house, but, I think, he thought that the cars also were being used as brothels—but he did not consider there was an offence against the Vagrancy Act. In my opinion, that is not the right way to look at it. I think the words of the Vagrancy Act are quite wide enough to cover the conduct shown in this case. Each case, of course, must be dealt with on its own particular facts, but here I think we must reverse the decision of the learned recorder and say that the offence is proved, and, accordingly, the respondent will have to serve the sentence which was most rightly passed on him by the justices.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. The facts of this case are clearly within the mischief with which the Vagrancy Act was designed to deal, and the only question is whether the facts bring it within the letter of that Act. It is clearly shown that the respondent was trading in prostitution, both in the use of his own home and in the activities of his employment with Royle in the use of motor cars which the respondent drove, both for journeys to promote this prostitution and for the direct use of the cars for that purpose. The vital finding of fact is that "the respondent knew that the said women were prostitutes, he was habitually in their company, he exercised direction and influence over their movements, and generally aided and abetted their prostitution with American service men."

I am prepared to agree with my Lord that, although it may be an extension of the interpretation which has been given to this Act before, the facts of this case bring it under s. 1 (1) of the Vagrancy Act, 1898, which provides that,

"Every male person who—(a) knowingly lives wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution" commits an offence under the Act. It certainly comes, in my view, under s. 1 (3), which, as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, s. 7 (1), provides:

"Where a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute or is proved to have exercised control, direction, or influence over the movements of a prostitute in such a manner as to show that he is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person or generally, he shall, unless he can satisfy the court to the contrary, be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution."

The facts of this case clearly bring the respondent within that provision, and he has committed an offence under the Act unless he can satisfy the court that he was not living on the earnings of the prostitutes or of prostitution. The remarkable fact is that he made an arrangement as a landlord letting the services of his house—a room at any rate—and board and lodging to a prostitute on the basis that she should pay for that accommodation and those services by prostituting herself at least once a week, and he should get the proceeds of that prostitution. I should have thought that that came directly under the letter of the Act, and it in no way establishes the necessary facts which the respondent would have to establish to satisfy the court that he was not living on the earnings, in whole or in part, of prostitution.

Counsel for the respondent said that the interpretation which we are placing on this statute would leave the matter in a curious way because it would mean that a male person could be convicted under this Act in these circumstances but a female could not. I think that is an erroneous submission, because s. 7 (4) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912, makes provision in very much the same terms for the female:

"Every female who is proved to have, for the purposes of gain, exercised control, direction, or influence over the movements of a prostitute in such a manner as to show that she is aiding, abetting, or compelling her prostitution with any person, or generally, shall be guilty of an offence. . . ."

I do not doubt that, if any female (as did this male) entered into a bargain such as was entered into here that she should be paid rent for the use of her room for the prostitution of the tenant, she would have knowledge of the prostitution, she would be aiding and abetting it, and she would be getting from the earnings of the prostitute, in whole or in part, some benefit. I think that the argument on this point is fallacious, and that the Act can be so construed as to apply equally to male and female. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

BARRY, J.: I agree. I feel that the decision of the court is dependent on the finding that the respondent knew that the women were prostitutes and habitually exercised direction and influence over their movements, aiding and abetting their prostitution with American service men. In view of that finding, I am satisfied that these facts fall within the provisions of the Vagrancy Act, 1898, s. 1 (3), as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1912.

Appeal allowed.

MORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SANDESS UNIVERSAL PRODUCTS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), December 4, 1953.]

B Libel—Defamatory words—Words capable of defamatory meaning—Statement by employer that servant dismissed.

Practice—Preliminary point of law—Libel action—Issue whether words complained of capable of defamatory meaning—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2.

C The defendants stated in a circular letter addressed to their customers that they had dismissed the plaintiffs who had now no connection whatsoever with the defendant company. The plaintiffs sued for libel, alleging that the words used by the defendants meant that the plaintiffs had been guilty of some discreditable conduct, and the defendants contended that the words complained of were incapable of a defamatory meaning. On that issue, tried as a preliminary point of law under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2,

D HELD: the test to be applied by a judge in deciding whether or not words were capable of a defamatory meaning was whether a reasonable jury would be justified in finding that the words complained of were defamatory, and, notwithstanding the various inoffensive meanings which the words complained of might be said to be capable of bearing, it was impossible to hold that they were not capable of a defamatory meaning.

E Dictum of LORD PORTER in Turner (otherwise Robertson) v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures, Ltd. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 454), applied.

Per curiam: the question here raised was not a proper subject to be raised and disposed of as a preliminary point of law under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2.

APPEAL by the defendants against an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated Oct. 29, 1953.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged, inter alia:

H

“(1) The defendants are distributors and retailers of carbon papers, inked ribbons and similar articles, and until on or about June 20, 1952, employed each of the plaintiffs as a sales manager each at a weekly salary of £18 10s. with commission. (2) On or about the said June 20, 1952 . . . each of the plaintiffs agreed orally with the defendants to determine their respective employments by the defendants, by the plaintiffs tendering their resignations and the defendants accepting the same. (3) At all material times the defendants well knew that it was the intention of the plaintiffs on leaving their said employments to set up . . . in a business . . . (4) On and after the said June 20, 1952, the defendants falsely and maliciously wrote and published in a circular letter of and concerning the first plaintiff and of and concerning him in the way of his said business the words following, that is to say: 'Sandess Universal Products. Sandess Carbon Papers, Inked Ribbons, Stencils & Duplicating Inks . . . Dear Sirs, We wish to bring to your notice the fact that we have dismissed [the first plaintiff] from our employ, he having been our representative in your area, and finally, that he has now no connection whatsoever with our company. Yours faithfully, Sandess Universal Products.' Particulars. The said words were published by posting the said circular letter to—and to many score others, potential customers of the first plaintiff in the said business, and whether or not such publishees were in fact, as alleged in the said circular letter, situate in the area for which the first plaintiff had been the defendants' representative . . . (5) By the said words the defendants meant and were understood to mean that they had dismissed the first plaintiff from their employment against his will, and that the first plaintiff had been guilty of some conduct entitling the defendants to terminate his employment without notice or salary in lieu, or that the circumstances of the termination of the first plaintiff's employment were such as to be discreditable to the first plaintiff."

Paragraphs 6 and 7 repeated with respect to the second plaintiff the allegations set out in paras. 4 and 5 respectively.

On a request for particulars of the facts and matter on which the plaintiffs relied in support of the meanings alleged in paras. 5 and 7, the plaintiffs replied:

"Under para. 5. Under this paragraph, the first plaintiff will rely upon a secondary meaning of the word 'dismissed' and will contend that such a secondary meaning is 'to dismiss from an employment against the will of the employee, or to dismiss an employee who has been guilty of some conduct entitling the employer to terminate his employment without notice or salary in lieu, or to dismiss an employee in circumstances such as to be discreditable to the employee', and further, that in the particular facts and circumstances set forth in para. 1 and the first sentence of the particulars to para. 4 of the statement of claim the words complained of were calculated to convey and did convey such meaning with regard to the dismissal of the first plaintiff. Under para. 7. [like particulars with regard to the second plaintiff.]"

By their defence the defendants pleaded, inter alia, in answer to paras. 5 and 7 respectively of the statement of claim:

"The said words do not mean and were not understood to mean and are incapable of the alleged meanings, or any other defamatory meaning, and without the alleged meanings are no libel."

G

On July 7, 1953, it was ordered under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2,

"that there shall be tried as a preliminary point of law the issue whether the words complained of in the statement of claim have in their ordinary signification any defamatory meaning or are capable of bearing the alleged defamatory meaning other than their ordinary meaning having regard to the facts and matters relied upon herein."

H

This preliminary issue came before LORD GODDARD, C.J., who on Oct. 29, 1953, decided that the words "dismissed from our employ" in a letter of the kind in question were capable of a defamatory meaning. The defendants appealed.

Aldous for the defendants.

Marnan for the plaintiffs.

JENKINS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendants says, in effect, that the particulars given of the facts and circumstances relied on by the plaintiffs as giving the words complained of any other than their usual meaning add nothing to what is alleged in the statement of claim. So far, I am disposed to agree with him. He says, further, that, taking the letter containing the alleged libel at its face value and construing the language used according to its ordinary signification, the words are incapable of a defamatory meaning. In support of his argument, he has referred us to Nevill v. Fine Art & General Insurance Co. (1), where the appellant acted for some time as agent to an insurance company at his own offices. After some correspondence as to a change of terms, on which the parties could not agree, the company's secretary sent to persons who insured through the appellant a circular stating that the agency of the appellant at his offices had "been closed by the directors". The question was whether or not the statement that the agency at the appellant's offices had been closed by the directors was capable of a defamatory meaning. We were referred by counsel for the defendants to the speech of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., ([1897] A.C. 73) where His Lordship said:

"In the original argument of Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty (2) in the Court of Appeal, I observe that BRETT, L.J., says this (5 C.P.D. 541): 'It seems to me unreasonable that, when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document. Therefore I am of opinion that this document could not reasonably be taken in a defamatory sense by those to whom it was published according to the primary meaning of the language used in it'. And in this House LORD WATSON affirmed the same proposition in language to which I think my noble and learned friend, LORD SHAND, has already called attention. It would not be enough, therefore, in this case to say that some persons might have understood these words as conveying some reflection upon the honour or business capacity of Lord William Nevill. It stands, therefore, as it appears to me, a long way distant from what was done in Henty's case (2), where a communication was made to the persons who had to make payments to the brewer in the particular case, and they were informed that the cheques of such and such a bank were not to be received in future. That undoubtedly, as LORD WATSON points out, might possibly by some persons have been understood to convey some reflection upon the solvency of the particular bank upon which the cheques were drawn, but because some persons may choose, not by reason of the language itself, but by reason of some fact to which it refers, to draw an unfavourable inference, it does not follow that therefore such matter is libellous."

Counsel also referred to Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty (2), in the House of Lords, and, in particular, to the speech of LORD WATSON (7 App. Cas. 788), who said:

"If I were satisfied that an inference injurious to the credit of the bank would naturally and necessarily suggest itself to the mind of any person of average intelligence on reading the circular, I should hold that it had a libellous tendency, although the language used is not in itself libellous. But, besides the one injurious inference suggested by the appellants, there are many other inferences of an innocent character, which naturally might, and probably would, suggest themselves to any reader of the circular who was not induced to put a malignant construction upon it by some cause such as is not proved to have existed in the case of any one of the persons to whom it was sent."

LORD BRAMWELL said (ibid., 793):

"I say, then, that the words are harmless in themselves, and that they do not import or justify the inference of the plaintiffs' insolvency. If I am wrong in this, and if the words do impute or justify the inference of insolvency as a possible cause of the defendants' refusal to take cheques on the plaintiffs, I say that that is only one of several things which they import, or of which they justify the inference; that no action lies in such a case; that if it would lie against any one not interested to do and say what the defendants did and said, it does not lie against them who were so interested and did and said no more than they had a right to do."

Finally, counsel for the defendants referred to Beswick v. Smith (3). There the alleged libel, written by former employers, was:

"H. Beswick is no longer in our employ. Please give him no order or pay him any money on our account."

LORD HALSBURY said (24 T.L.R. 170) that:

"The words complained of, if taken in their natural meaning, would not convey to the mind of a person of ordinary intelligence the impression that any imputation was being made against the plaintiff. He did not deny that there might be a publication under such circumstances as to make that which was prima facie not libellous convey in fact a defamatory imputation. But that was not the case here. It was quite possible, and it seemed to him to be quite natural, that some of the defendant's customers might, in the absence of notice, have sent money or orders to the plaintiff. The ordinary and reasonable inference to be drawn from the notice which was sent was, perhaps, that the employment had terminated because the parties had quarrelled, but certainly not that the defendant was imputing anything criminal to the plaintiff. Such an inference seemed to him to be the invention of an imagination already tainted with the idea that there was something wrong in the termination of the employment. He thought that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant."

On those authorities, counsel for the defendants submits that the most that can be said against the letter complained of in the present action is that somebody reading it might conceivably draw the inference that the first or second plaintiff, as the case might be, had been dismissed for discreditable conduct of some sort, but that that is no more than one of a number of possible inferences that a reasonable reader of this letter might draw. Therefore, he says, it would be wrong for the court, having regard to those authorities, to pick from several equally possible meanings the one injurious meaning and say on the strength of it that these words are capable of constituting a libel.

I confess that, on reading these authorities, I find it difficult exactly to appreciate the position in which they leave the matter. For many statements are capable of more than one meaning, and if these authorities are to be understood as ruling that an alleged libel is to be held capable of a defamatory meaning only in a case in which it cannot have any meaning other than a defamatory one, it seems to me that the task of a judge in deciding whether or not a case is one to be left to the jury would often be difficult, because so often the question what the words complained of might be held to mean by a reasonable person is likely to be nicely balanced. But I find assistance in this difficulty from Turner (otherwise Robertson) v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures, Ltd. (4), to which we were referred by counsel for the plaintiffs, and, in particular, from the following passage in the speech of LORD PORTER, where his Lordship said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 454):

"Some argument was presented to your Lordships as to the attitude which the judge should adopt where, in his view, the only inference which can be drawn from the words complained of is that they lie on the border-line, and it is impossible to say whether, when properly considered, they are capable of a libellous meaning or not. It is, of course, the duty of a judge in the

A first instance to put an accurate interpretation on the words used, and, having done so, to make up his mind whether they are capable of a defamatory meaning or not. Theoretically, if he is left in doubt, he should rule them incapable of a defamatory meaning, but this, I think, is a theoretical and not a practical difficulty. It is the judge's duty to make up his mind and, save in very exceptional cases, he can decide on which side of the line the words complained of are to be placed. If he comes to the conclusion that a reasonable jury would be justified in finding that they had a libellous tendency, he must leave it to them even though the words might also bear an innocent interpretation, or, to put it from the point of view of an appellate court, the question of libel or no libel should have been left to the jury if it cannot be said that twelve men could not reasonably have come to the conclusion that the words were defamatory. This, I think, is what LORD BLACKBURN means in his observations in Capital & Counties Bank v. Henty (2), when he says, quoting BRETT, L.J. (7 App. Cas. 786): ' . . . it is unreasonable that when there are a number of good interpretations, the only bad one should be seized upon to give a defamatory sense to the document '. It is in accordance with the test put by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., when he says (ibid., 745): ' The test, according to the authorities, is, whether under the circumstances in which the writing was published, reasonable men, to whom the publication was made, would be likely to understand it in a libellous sense '. In the present case both the court of first instance and the Court of Appeal, though for different reasons, found the letter capable of a defamatory meaning, and I proceed to consider the second question whether there is any evidence of malice on the part of the respondents on this footing."

The matter, therefore, depends on the question whether or not a reasonable jury would be justified in finding that the words complained of had a libellous tendency, or, in other words; whether or not it can be said that twelve men could reasonably come to the conclusion that the words complained of were defamatory.

E Counsel for the defendants has suggested to us a variety of meanings for the word "dismissed", and he says that it does not, by any means, necessarily have a derogatory connotation. But, in my view, the function of the judge on such a matter is to endeavour to decide what meaning the language used could reasonably be held to convey to the persons to whom the communication was addressed. F Looking at this letter from that point of view, notwithstanding the various inoffensive meanings which the words: "We have dismissed [the first, or second, plaintiff]", might be said to be capable of bearing, I find myself unable to hold that the words complained of are not capable of a defamatory meaning, or that it is not possible that a reasonable jury might hold them to be defamatory. With the question whether or not they are defamatory, this court at this stage G has nothing whatever to do. That will be a question for the jury when the case comes to be tried.

H Accordingly, I would dismiss this appeal. I must say that, in my judgment, the procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2, is most unsuitable for the purpose for which it has been used in this case. If recourse is to be had to that rule on the question whether or not words complained of in a libel action are capable of a defamatory meaning, it seems to me that the practice may grow up of splitting libel actions into two stages, the first being concerned with the aspect of the case with which we have been occupied today and the second being the trial of the case itself in the event of the defendant's failing to put a summary end to the proceedings on the preliminary issue with which we are now dealing. That appears to me to be a most undesirable practice, and, in my view, a question such as that now raised is not a proper subject for an application under the procedure prescribed by R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The matter is, I think, clearly stated in GATLEY ON LIBEL AND SLANDER, 4th ed., p. 126:

"In determining whether the words are capable of a defamatory meaning the judge will construe the words according to the fair and natural meaning which would be given them by reasonable persons of ordinary intelligence, and will not consider what persons setting themselves to work to deduce some unusual meaning might succeed in extracting from them."

Like JENKINS, L.J., I also think that great assistance is derived from the passage ([1950] 1 All E.R. 454) in the speech of LORD PORTER in Turner (otherwise Robertson) v. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures, Ltd. (4). It seems to me that, in deciding at this stage whether or not the words are capable of a defamatory meaning and whether or not the action should go forward for trial, we are entitled to have regard to facts and events which are of general and ordinary knowledge and to the general and ordinary understanding of words which are in common use. I agree with JENKINS, L.J., that the test is whether or not a jury could reasonably come to the conclusion that the words are defamatory. I have no doubt, speaking for myself, that the words are capable of a defamatory meaning, and the result is that the case goes forward for determination whether the words bear the alleged, or any, defamatory meaning. I, therefore, agree that this appeal fails. I would also add that I am in further agreement with what JENKINS, L.J., and LORD GODDARD, C.J., in the court below, have said with regard to procedure.

Appeal dismissed.

BOARLAND (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. MADRAS ELECTRIC SUPPLY CORPORATION, LTD. (In Liquidation).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), November 23, 24, 25, December 9, 1953.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Wear and tear—Balancing charge—Sale of undertaking to the Crown—Undertaking carried on by Crown—"Person [who] succeeds to any trade"—Inclusion of Crown—Assessment as if trade "discontinued"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 11 (2), as substituted by Finance Act, 1926 (c. 22), s. 32 (1)—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 17 (1).

A company sold its undertaking to the Crown, which carried it on so that the trade was not discontinued. The company was assessed to income tax for the period terminating on the date of the sale in the sum of £850,000 in respect of balancing charges under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, arising on the sale of machinery and plant included in the transaction.

HELD: the Crown was a "person" within the meaning of r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918 (as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)), and, therefore, a person had succeeded to the trade within the meaning of the rule, the company was liable to be assessed as if the trade had been discontinued under the rule, and the balancing charges were properly made under s. 17 (1) of the Act of 1945.

Decision of UPJOHN, J. ([1953] 1 All E.R. 467), affirmed.

D APPEAL by the company against an order of UPJOHN, J., dated June 18, 1953, and reported ([1953] 2 All E.R. 467) allowing an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, and holding that balancing charges in the sum of £850,000 had been properly made on the company under s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, on the sale of its undertaking, including machinery and plant, to the Crown. The company contended that the Crown was not a "person" within the meaning of r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918; that that rule, requiring E the tax on the company to be computed as if the trade had been discontinued, did not apply; and that the company could not be assessed, therefore, under the sub-section.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9. The following judgments were read.

G SINGLETON, L.J.: The Madras Electric Supply Corporation, Ltd., the company, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-1900, on Jan. 27, 1906, with the object of carrying on in India the business of an electric light and power undertaking in all its branches. The undertaking was carried on under three licences granted by the government of Madras. Particulars of the licences are set out in paras. 6, 7 and 8 of the Case. Under the first two licences the local authority, with the sanction of the local government, had an option to purchase such portion of the undertaking as was in the area for which it was constituted, and a similar option was given to the local government if the local H authority did not elect to purchase. Under the third licence the Governor-General in Council had the option to purchase. The option was exercisable in each case on Aug. 29, 1947. The company carried on its business until that date. Notices to exercise the options were duly given.

On Aug. 27, 1947, an agreement was entered into between the government of Madras and the company, the effect of which is stated in para. 11 of the Case:

"... it was declared and agreed (inter alia) as follows:—1: that the government of Madras and the company agreed to entrust the valuers with the work of valuation of the physical assets to be purchased by the government and to be sold by the company; 2: that the valuation to be made by the valuers should be in conformity with the first proviso to s. 7 (1) of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910. For the removal of doubts, it was declared that the company should not be eligible for any solatium to be added to such valuation in accordance with the second proviso to the said s. 7 (1) for determining the purchase price; . . . 7: that the company should hand over the undertaking to the government and the government should take over the undertaking from the company at the commencement of Aug. 29, 1947 . . .”

There followed a supplemental agreement of Aug. 29, 1947, by which it was witnessed:

“(1) that the company had on the date of execution of these presents handed over physical possession of the lands, buildings, works, materials and plant suitable to and used by the company for the purpose of the said undertaking . . . (2) the company hereby acknowledges to have received [certain moneys] (being a payment on account of the purchase price, provided for in the principal agreement of Aug. 27, 1947): (3) that the company undertook to execute and register in favour of the government of Madras a proper deed of conveyance and assignment of the lands, buildings, fixed machinery and plant.”

In due course the valuation forming the measure of the purchase price was agreed at Rs. 215 lakhs, excluding the sum to be paid to the company for service lines paid for by consumers (the valuation of which was reserved for arbitration). The sterling equivalent of this sum of rupees was £1,612,500, and the amount actually received by the company (due to exchange rates) was £1,611,437. On Sept. 29, 1950, the company went into voluntary liquidation. On the date of the sale, Aug. 29, 1947, the company ceased to trade. Its former undertaking continued to be carried on without interruption in Madras under the management of a department of the Madras government. Substantially all the company's former staff continued to work in the undertaking. On Mar. 30, 1951, the company made a formal conveyance and assignment of lands, buildings, fixed machinery and plant to the government of Madras.

It is claimed by the Crown that the circumstances give rise to an assessment to income tax in the sum of £850,000 in respect of balancing charges under Part II of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The claim is made in this way. Rule 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides that, if any person succeeds to the trade which until that time was carried on by another person, the tax payable for all the years of assessment by the person succeeding shall be computed as if he had set up or commenced the trade at that time, and the tax payable for all the years of assessment by the person who until that time carried on the trade shall be computed as if it had then been discontinued. It is said that on Aug. 29, 1947, the government of Madras succeeded to the business which the company had carried on until that time.

The next step leads to consideration of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945:

“Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not . . . and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act referred to as ‘a balancing allowance’ or ‘a balancing charge’) shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis period for which that event occurs."

The reason for the introduction of this section is, I think, fairly clear. Under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, a trader is allowed a deduction each year on account of wear and tear of machinery. He may sometimes be allowed less than he ought to be allowed: in other cases he may be allowed more than is warranted. If he continues in trade the matter may adjust itself in course of time. On the other hand, if he sells the plant or machinery before the trade is permanently discontinued there may arise a balancing allowance to him or a balancing charge against him, and the section is intended to provide for adjustment accordingly. We are not concerned with figures. It is sufficient to say that the claim of the Crown is that something in the neighbourhood of £850,000 falls to be included as a balancing charge in the company's assessment to tax.

It was common ground between the parties:—(i) that by reason of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, the balancing charges forming the subject of the assessment under appeal fell to be made on the company (if at all) for the year of assessment in the company's basis period for which the sale of its plant and machinery occurred; (ii) that for the purposes of the said Act such sale occurred on Aug. 29, 1947; (iii) that, by reason of s. 57 (2) of the said Act, the company's basis period for the year of assessment 1947-48 was the period on the profits or gains of which income tax for that year fell to be computed under Case I of sched. D in respect of its trade. The contention put forward on behalf of the company is that r. 11 (2) does not apply to the facts of this case and that no balancing charge can be made on the company. This is based mainly, if not wholly, on the submission that the sale of plant, etc., was a sale to the Crown, and it is claimed that the Crown is not a "person" within the meaning of that word in r. 11 (2). This contention was accepted by the Special Commissioners, from whom UPJOHN, J., allowed the appeal of the Crown. The company appeals to this court.

Counsel for the company drew our attention to s. 175 (2) of the Government of India Act, 1935, under which it is provided:

"All property acquired for the purposes of the federation or of a province . . . shall vest in His Majesty for those purposes."

He appeared to seek to draw a distinction between this case and other cases in which the State acquires property for the benefit of subjects. I do not see that any such distinction can be drawn. The undertaking was, undoubtedly, acquired for the public good and it vested in His Majesty for the purpose for which it was acquired. The options to purchase were exercised by the government of Madras. The two agreements of Aug. 27 and Aug. 29, 1947, were made between the government of Madras and the company—and the conveyance was to the government.

Learned counsel submitted that the Crown acquired the undertaking of the company and that r. 11 (2) has no application to such a case. He put his submission in this way. "The Queen is the monarch legislating with the other estates. The Finance Acts are all addressed to subjects, and charging orders cannot include the Crown itself. Therefore, the word 'person' in a charging order, or section, will not include the Crown. The Crown does not impose a tax on itself." He drew our attention to the preamble to the Finance Act, 1947:

"Most Gracious Sovereign, We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled . . . have freely and voluntarily resolved to give and grant unto Your Majesty the several duties hereinafter mentioned; and do therefore most humbly beseech Your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows—"

Counsel for the company added that sched. D was a charging schedule and the rules under it were charging rules, and it would not be right to read "person" in r. 11 (2) in two different ways. In other words, it could not include the Crown.

The old form of preamble is preserved. It is, however, recognised that the freedom of the monarch from taxation arises by virtue of the prerogative. In R. v. Cook (1) LORD KENYON, C.J., said (3 Term Rep. 522):

"Now although there is no special exemption of the King in this Act of Parliament, yet I am of opinion that he is exempted by virtue of his prerogative, in the same manner as he is virtually exempted from the 43 Eliz. and every other Act imposing a duty or tax on the subjects."

In Coomber v. Berks. JJ. (2) LORD BLACKBURN (9 App. Cas. 66) cited the words of LORD KENYON and referred (ibid.) to

"... the exemption, by virtue of the prerogative, of property actually occupied or enjoyed for the Crown."

Now, the Crown is a "person": see the Magdalen College, Cambridge, Case (3) (11 Co. Rep. 70a):

"And, first, it was resolved, (a) that the general words of the Act extend to the Queen, for the words are, 'To any person or persons, body politic or corporate;' and without question the Queen was a person, as it is said in 10 H. 7, 18a."

Indeed, it has not been disputed that the monarch is a person, but it is said that he (or she) is not a person within the meaning of that word in the Income Tax Act, 1918, or at least for the purposes of sched. D. It appears to me that this reasoning fails to draw a distinction between the word "person" and a "taxable person". I cannot see why we should not give the ordinary meaning to the word "person" when considering the provisions of r. 11 (2). Of course, the Crown is not chargeable under sched. D. That follows from the exemption arising from the prerogative. I draw attention to the words of WROTTESELEY, J., in A.-G. v. Hancock (4) ([1940] 1 K.B. 435):

"Section 1 of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1914, begins with the words: 'From and after the passing of this Act no person shall ...' Pausing there, [counsel for the defendant] said, and everybody, I think, must agree with him, that the word 'person' clearly can include the Crown, and it is for that reason that it has been necessary from time to time for the courts to remind themselves of the rule with which I am dealing."

It would be strange, indeed, if the provisions of r. 11 (2) were not to apply if the purchaser of a business—the one who succeeded to the trade—was the Crown or a department of State. It is difficult to think of any reason for any such distinction. And when one comes to apply s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, it is worth noticing that there may be a balancing allowance or a balancing charge. It matters not who the purchaser is so long as the event in question happens before the trade is permanently discontinued.

Counsel for the company cited the words of LORD MACMILLAN in Income Tax Comrs. v. Gibbs (5) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 425):

"The important thing to ascertain is the meaning of the word 'person' in the vocabulary of the Income Tax Acts. The word constantly occurs throughout the Acts, and I think that it is most generally used to denote what may be termed an entity of assessment, i.e., the possessor or recipient of an income which the Acts require to be separately assessed for tax purposes."

No question such as the present was under consideration, and I do not think that the citation carries us any further unless the submission is that the word “person” throughout means taxable person—and counsel for the company did not make that a part of his case.

The contentions of the Crown are set out in para. 18 of the Case stated by the Special Commissioners. The submission of the Attorney-General was that the word “person” must be given its ordinary meaning apart from some compelling reason to the contrary, and that “person” includes the Crown and servants of the Crown. He argued that there is no difference for the purpose of r. 11 (2), whether the successor is the Crown, or the British Transport Commission, or the Post Office, or another company, or an individual, and, relying on the authorities I have mentioned, he submitted that the word “person” includes the Crown though the Crown is immune from taxation by reason of the prerogative. Junior counsel for the Crown, who followed, spoke of the Income Tax Acts as regulating the position between the Crown (a person) and other persons. The Crown, he said, is bound by the Income Tax Acts, but by virtue of its prerogative does not pay tax. He drew our attention to the use of the word “person” in the Act of 1918 as meaning a person other than a person taxable, e.g., s. 116, s. 132 (2), s. 133 (1) (b), s. 166 (10) and s. 190—and there are others.

It appears to me that the contention put forward on behalf of the company fails. I can find nothing to justify the giving of a limited meaning to the word “person” in r. 11 (2). It must, I think, be read in the ordinary way. I agree with the conclusion of UPJOHN, J., and I would dismiss the appeal of the company. I do not think that it is necessary for me to add anything to that which was said by UPJOHN, J., in relation to two cases recently before the Court of Session* except that counsel for the company desired to keep open the position arising on them.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of my Lord which has just been delivered. I have also had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment which is about to be delivered by HODSON, L.J., and with that judgment I also agree. In those circumstances I do not desire to add a judgment of my own.

HODSON, L.J.: The main question in this appeal is whether in r. 11 (2) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918 (as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)), the word “person” includes the Crown. If the word “person” includes the Crown the appellant company, it is conceded, is liable to certain balancing charges, since the Crown has succeeded to its trade within the meaning of the rule. The balancing charge is borne by the company and the identity of the successor has no effect financially or otherwise. UPJOHN, J., held that, as a matter of construction, there was no ground for placing any limitation on the ordinary natural meaning of the word, and that in r. 11 (2) the word “person” includes the Crown, persons resident abroad, charity trustees and others who for different reasons may be found to be exempt from tax. I agree with his judgment and with the reasons given in support of it.

The appellant company bases its argument on the admitted fact that the purchaser of its undertaking was the Crown, and refers in particular to the Government of India Act, 1935, s. 175 (2), which came into force (other than Part II) by Order in Council on Apr. 1, 1937. The wording of this sub-section has been slightly varied by another Order in Council, but the material words remain:

“All property . . . shall vest in His Majesty for those purposes.”

The argument, accordingly, is restricted to this narrow proposition, that, the successor to the company being His Majesty in person, the word “person” in the charging sections of the Income Tax Acts cannot be construed as including His Majesty. It is said that it is not necessary to examine the nature of the royal prerogative which includes exemption from taxation, but that the company is entitled to say that the word "person" in r. 11 (2) cannot, as a matter of construction, include the Crown in its personal capacity.

* Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr (8); Inland Revenue Comrs. v. West. Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Reid (9).

The court was reminded of the constitutional position set out by PROFESSOR HEARN in his GOVERNMENT OF ENGLAND at p. 18:

"The law places no restriction upon the extent of the royal power but rigorously defines the manner in which the several branches of that power may be exercised. In every part of public affairs the expression of the royal will is conclusive; but in each case the royal will must be stated through the appropriate channel."

Thus, in theory in the making of a statute

"The King is pars agens, the rest [Lords and Commons] are but consentientes", per St. John arg. in Hampden Ship Money Case (6) (3 St. Tr. 863). Emphasis was placed on the preamble to the taxing Acts, which is set out in full in the judgment of UPJOHN, J. ([1953] 2 All E.R. 471), as showing that, having regard to the language of this preamble, the Crown, as grantee of the taxes, cannot be a person for tax purposes, and that, in the charging provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, "person" cannot sensibly include the Crown.

On the other hand, it is to be observed that, in numerous places in the Income Tax Act, 1918, the word "person" is used to include others than taxable "persons", or, to borrow the language of LORD MACMILLAN in Income Tax Comrs. v. Gibbs (5) ([1942] 1 All E.R. 425), "entities of assessment". This is the sense in which, as LORD MACMILLAN said, the word "person" is most generally used throughout the Income Tax Acts. Some dozen examples were given in argument on behalf of the Crown of places in the Acts where the word "person" does not denote an "entity of assessment", and as a pure question of construction I see no reason why the word "person" in a charging section also should not include the Crown. No question of taxing the Crown arises, so that there is no invasion of the Crown's prerogative by construing the word "person" in its natural and ordinary meaning. That the word "person" in an Act of Parliament is apt to include the Crown there is no doubt. The Crown is a corporation sole, and, therefore, a person: see s. 19 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. The authorities are all one way, the earliest cited being the Magdalen College Case (3) (11 Co. Rep. 70a), where the Year Book, 10 Hen. 7, 18a, is in turn cited for the sentence: "Rex est persona mixta." One of the latest cases cited was A.-G. v. Hancock (4), where WROTTESELEY, J., stated ([1940] 1 K.B. 435): "the word 'person' clearly can include the Crown".

The company perforce contended that the authorities drew a distinction between the Crown in its personal capacity and the Crown in its capacity as part of the constitution. In order to mark the distinction reference was made to 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 88, s. 6, which provided that Crown lands when bought by private funds of the King are liable to parliamentary and parochial rates, and reference was made to the Crown Private Estates Act, 1862. I can, however, find no justification for the distinction between the Crown in its personal capacity and the Crown in the constitutional sense which the company seeks to draw.

The Crown usually can act only through its servants, and this consideration must apply to His Majesty as referred to in the Government of India Act, 1935, to which I have already referred. Thus, there is here no practical distinction between the Crown and Crown servants. There are a number of authorities where the claim for exemption from taxation of Crown servants has been considered. This claim has always been based on the royal prerogative that the King is exempted from taxation by virtue of his prerogative. In R. v. Cook (1) it was decided that the posthorse duty imposed by 25 Geo. III, c. 51, was not to be paid for horses employed for forwarding public expresses on the service of government. It was decided that the King was exempt from tax by virtue of his prerogative. The Attorney-General pertinently observed that, if the contention of the company were correct, the proper question for argument would appear to have been, not: "Was there an exemption on the ground of prerogative?" but: "Were the horses 'royal horses'?" R. v. Cook (1) was considered in the House of Lords in Coomber v. Berks. JJ. (2), per LORD BLACKBURN (9 App. Cas. 71), who in connection with taxation spoke of "an implied exemption on the ground of prerogative".

A These principles were applied by the Court of Appeal in Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford (7). The actual decision there was that the office of Custodian of Enemy Property was not such as of itself to confer on its holder the immunity from tax belonging to the Crown, but there was an elaborate discussion on Crown immunity in the judgments, which proceeded on the basis that the Custodian was a person within the orbit of the charge created by sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. The question was answered adversely to the claim for immunity. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 969):

B "... the commonly used formula that the Income Tax Acts do not bind the Crown conceals the true principle, which is that, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, the Crown and the rights of the Crown are not thereby prejudiced."

C There is no prejudice to the Crown in this case in construing the word "person" in r. 11 (2) so as to include the Crown, and, as I have already indicated, I cannot distinguish the instant case from Slatford's case (7) by drawing a distinction between the King in person and servants of the Crown. The reasoning of all the judgments in Slatford's case (7) appears to me to be inconsistent with the claim
D put forward by the company that the Crown is immune, not because of the prerogative, but because it is not as a matter of construction covered by the word "person" in the charging sections of the Income Tax Acts. The common law rule as to the prerogative must be applied, but the Act must first be construed in the ordinary way. When the Act has been construed the Crown is entitled to set up its right against the construction if prejudiced thereby, and the construction will, when necessary, yield to the prerogative. There is nothing in r. 11 (2) which interferes with the rights of the Crown, so that there is no conflict between the statute and the prerogative. On the contrary, the Crown is relying on the section, as it is entitled to do.

E In my opinion, the word "person" is a general word which is apt to include the Crown, and it is, as the Attorney-General contended, a question of construction of the Act as a whole whether, in a particular case, the Crown is entitled to claim exemption by prerogative.
F

As to the subsidiary point taken by the company in reliance on the decision of the Court of Session in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barr (8), the report of that case appears to show that the concluding words of s. 17 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, were overlooked by the court. Counsel for the company recognised this and found difficulty in supporting this decision by independent reasoning. We
G were informed that Barr's case (8) is now under appeal to the House of Lords. In the circumstances I am content to say that, as at present advised, I can find nothing useful to add to what UPJOHN, J., has said on the subsidiary point. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. COOK.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Stable, J.), November 16, 17, 1953.]

Criminal Law—Carnal knowledge—Procuring of mental defective girl—Girl under statutory supervision—Mental Deficiency Act, 1913 (c. 28), s. 56 (1) (a) (b).

By s. 56 (1) of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913: “Any person—(a) who unlawfully and carnally knows . . . any woman or girl under care or treatment in an institution or certified house or approved home, or whilst placed out on licence therefrom or under guardianship under this Act; or (b) who procures . . . any woman or girl who is a defective to have unlawful carnal connection . . . with any person or persons . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . .”

P., a certified mental defective, was not in an institution or certified house or approved home, or on licence therefrom, or under guardianship, but she was under the statutory supervision of a mental health social worker who boarded her out with the defendant's wife at the defendant's house. Evidence was given that while P. was at the house the defendant one morning asked her to go back to bed, followed her, and there had carnal connection with her. On a charge against the defendant under s. 56 (1) (b),

HELD: the facts alleged did not show that the defendant had procured P. to have the carnal connection with himself.

Per curiam: It was nowhere provided in the Act that it was an offence for a person to have unlawful carnal knowledge with a mentally defective female who was not in one of the categories mentioned in s. 56 (1) (a).

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Mackenzie & Higginson, (1910), 75 J.P. 159; 6 Cr. App. Rep. 64; 15 Digest 849, 9329.
- (2) R. v. Christian, (1913), 78 J.P. 112; 23 Cox, C.C. 541; 15 Digest 850, 9330.

TRIAL before STABLE, J., and a jury.

The defendant was charged with the procuring of a mental defective girl to have unlawful carnal connection, contrary to s. 56 (1) (b) of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, the particulars being that between Apr. 12 and May 21, 1953, he procured Jean Pearson, a girl aged seventeen years, who was then a defective, to have unlawful carnal connection with himself.

The facts proved by witnesses for the prosecution were that on Jan. 15, 1951, the girl Pearson was certified as, and had ever since that date been, a feeble-minded person under the Mental Deficiency Acts. She had not been placed in any institution, certified house, or approved home, or placed out on licence therefrom or under guardianship, but she had been placed under the supervision of a Miss Appleyard, a mental health social worker, under the Mental Deficiency Acts. In April, 1953, Miss Appleyard boarded Pearson out with Mrs. Cook, the wife of the defendant, at the defendant's house. While Pearson was living at the house the defendant one morning asked her to go back to bed. She went and the defendant there had carnal connection with her. The defendant had carnal connection with her in similar circumstances on two subsequent occasions.

A. M. Hurwitz for the prosecution.

Dodson for the defendant submitted that there was no case to answer.

STABLE, J.: Members of the jury, a very odd situation has arisen here. Where a criminal charge is brought against a man, the obligation on the Crown is to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that an offence has been committed, and that an offence has been committed by the man against whom the charge is brought. This particular case arises under an Act of Parliament, and that Act of Parliament, very properly, is intended to protect from the lusts and desires of the opposite sex women who are mentally defective and are not responsible for the control of their own actions and behaviour. It is a very delicate and difficult problem to say at what point the State can step in and say that sexual intercourse with a willing female becomes a criminal offence. There is nothing in the world more difficult than to define or to describe in words the degrees or gradations of personal character, whether one is seeking to describe intellectual ability or whether one is dealing with the emotional side of a human personality, but Parliament has to make the attempt and Parliament has created a class of person who is described as a "mental defective". It is a different class from that which we used to call lunatics—insane people. Parliament has created categories of mental defectives covering a pretty wide field of mental deficiency, and when a person has been certified by a medical officer as being a mental defective a number of things can happen. If it is a bad case the patient can be put into an institution, where he, or she, is deprived of his, or her, liberty and freedom. If he, or she—we will call it "she" for the purposes of this case—benefits from treatment, that girl may be let out on licence to see how she fares when she is landed in the rigour of the free world. Alternatively, a patient may be put, not in an institution, but under guardianship. Short of that the patient can be put under what is called "statutory supervision", which means that she is not put into a home nor put under the guardianship of anybody, but people like Miss Appleyard keep a watchful eye on her. The situation of this girl was that she was under the supervision of Miss Appleyard.

There is no doubt that Mr. Cook ought to be thoroughly ashamed of himself. He had intercourse with this girl while she was lodging in his house. But he is charged with a criminal offence, the offence being that he procured this girl to have intercourse with him. When we examine the Act of Parliament that makes such an act a criminal offence the first thing that strikes the eye is that Parliament says it is an offence to have intercourse with a mental defective who is in an institution, who has been in an institution but is out on licence, or who has been placed under a guardianship order (Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 56 (1) (a)). It definitely does not say that it is a criminal offence to have sexual intercourse with a girl who is merely under statutory supervision, as this girl was. Therefore, the act of intercourse with this girl was not a criminal offence. If she had been under guardianship or if she had been an inmate of one of these homes it would have been an offence unless the defendant could have satisfied you that he did not know and had no reason to suspect that she was a defective, but Parliament has definitely refrained from making it a criminal offence to have intercourse with a girl in this girl's situation. Therefore, these acts of intercourse, however morally reprehensible, were not criminal offences.

To get over that difficulty the defendant is charged under another paragraph of the sub-section which makes it an offence to procure a defective girl to have sexual intercourse with a man. If the procuress is a woman who persuades a girl to the paths of immorality—it may be that she coaxes her away from home, holds out all sorts of glittering prospects and prizes—and procures the girl to go down the wrong road, that is another matter. It is not very easy to define what procurement amounts to, but we probably all more or less have a pretty good idea in our minds what it is. There is not a shred of evidence here that this man ever procured anybody. He did not get the girl to come into his house. He did not get her away from her mother. Nobody suggests that the admirable Mrs. Cook was a procuress, getting hold of this girl for immoral purposes. Inasmuch as the Act has most specifically refrained from making the act of intercourse itself a criminal offence, there is no evidence before you on which you can convict this man of an offence under it. You may think there is a defect in the law, but you have no alternative but to return a verdict of Not Guilty against this man.

Verdict: "Not Guilty."

EASTBOURNE CORPORATION v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), December 8, 9, 10, 11, 1953.]

Entertainments Duty—Exemption—"Recitation"—"Music hall or other variety entertainment"—Humorous "patter" with music—Light musical concert—Performance dominated by variety performer—Finance Act, 1946 (c. 64), s. 8 (1)—Finance Act, 1952 (c. 33), s. 3 (1).

B

A local authority arranged a series of entertainments on premises belonging to them. The entertainments were presented on an open stage without scenery, and comprised mostly musical performances, vocal and instrumental. The entertainments fell into three groups: (a) those which, although largely musical, included performances partially musical and partially consisting of monologue and the telling of humorous stories, or dialogue, of amusing character, described as "patter", given by artistes well-known in the field of variety, light entertainment and the music hall; (b) those wholly musical, which could be described as light musical concerts, and which did not include a performance which could be called a variety or music hall act; and (c) those dominated by a well-known performer in the variety theatre, doing the act which he or she gave in the variety theatre. The local authority claimed exemption from entertainments duty in respect of the entertainments.

HELD: (i) the non-musical parts of entertainments (a) did not constitute "recitation" by the performers within the Finance Act, 1946, s. 8 (1), and, the non-musical parts not falling within any other head of s. 8 (1), the local authority was not entitled to exemption in respect of those entertainments.

(ii) entertainments (b) were not "music hall or other variety entertainment" within the Finance Act, 1952, s. 3 (1), and, therefore, were not by that sub-section excluded from the operation of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1946, which accordingly exempted them from duty.

F

(iii) entertainments (c) were variety entertainments within s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1952 and no exemption was due in respect of them.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.), Viscount Hailsham, Q.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the Commissioners of Customs and Excise:

A DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an action brought by Eastbourne Corporation against the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. The action relates to five concerts which were put on by the corporation in a place called the Winter Garden, which is the property of the corporation. The concerts were given without any stage scenery on an open stage, without any drop curtain, but merely side curtains which were drawn across the stage at the beginning and at the end, and in the course of the first part of the entertainment. A claim for entertainments duty has been made by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, and the corporation seek to establish that they are entitled to exemption

B from that duty under the Finance Act, 1946, s. 8 (1).

It will be convenient first to refer to the relevant statutes. The duty in question was imposed by the Finance (New Duties) Act, 1916, which provides, by s. 1 (1):

C "There shall . . . be charged, levied and paid on all payments for admission to any entertainment as defined by this Act an excise duty (in this Act referred to as 'entertainments duty') . . ."

at certain rates. "Entertainment" is defined in s. 1 (6) in these words:

D "The expression 'entertainment' includes any exhibition, performance, amusement, game or sport to which persons are admitted for payment; and the expression 'admission to an entertainment' includes admission to any place in which the entertainment is held."

It is, perhaps, worth while also to refer to s. 1 (5), which has been partially repealed (by the Finance Act, 1946, s. 8 (2)), but which is not without interest. That sub-section provided:

E "Entertainments duty shall not be charged on payments for admission to any entertainment where the commissioners are satisfied . . . (b) that the entertainment is of a wholly educational character (any question on that point to be determined in case of difference by the Board of Education); or . . . (d) that the entertainment is provided for partly educational or partly scientific purposes by a society, institution or committee not conducted or established for profit, or is provided by any such society or

F institution, which has been founded with the object of reviving national pastimes, in furtherance of that object."

The Finance Act, 1935, s. 1 (3), as amended by the Finance Act, 1946, s. 7 (2) and s. 8 (3), provides for duty at reduced rates in certain cases:

G "The said duty shall be charged at the reduced rates set out in sched. I to this Act in a case where all the performers whose words or actions constitute the entertainment are actually present and performing, and the entertainment consists solely of one or more of the following items, namely, a stage play, a ballet (whether a stage play or not), a performance of music (whether vocal or instrumental), an eisteddfod, a lecture, a recitation, a music hall or other variety entertainment, a circus, a travelling show, a menagerie or any game or sport other than the racing or trial of H speed of animals, vehicles, motor vessels or aircraft."

The Finance Act, 1946, s. 8, introduced a provision which is of immediate concern in this action:

"Entertainments duty on certain entertainments provided by bodies which are not profit making. (1) Entertainments duty within the meaning of s. 1 of the Finance (New Duties) Act, 1916, shall not be charged on payments for admission to any entertainment which consists of one or more of the following items, that is to say—(a) a stage play; (b) a ballet (whether a stage play or not); (c) a performance of music (whether vocal or instrumental); (d) the exhibition of a cinematograph film; (e) a lecture; (f) a recitation; (g) an exhibition of artistic work; (h) an industrial exhibition; (i) an eisteddfod, where the commissioners are satisfied that the entertainment is provided by a society, institution or committee which is not conducted or established for profit and that the aims, objects and activities of the society, institution or committee are partly educational.”

A

There are two comments to be made in regard to that Act before I pass on. First of all, from the nature of the performances with which I am concerned, it is plain that there are only two provisions in sub-s. (1) which are capable of applying to the performances in question: “(c) a performance of music (whether vocal or instrumental)” and “(f) a recitation”. Secondly, one has to observe that the test of the nature of the society, institution or committee which is essential for the purposes of exemption from duty is left to the decision of the commissioners, and the objection has been taken (and in the circumstances it seems to be a sound objection) that it is not open to me to decide whether or not the Eastbourne corporation is a society, institution or committee of the kind which is there mentioned. There may be other proceedings in which that point may be brought to the decision of the court, and the decision arrived at by the commissioners may possibly be questioned in that way. But so far as relief in this action is concerned, it is clear to me that I am severely handicapped by these provisions which fetter my jurisdiction. The present form of action, therefore, is not particularly convenient for dealing with the questions which the parties wish to have decided, and for that reason I was not much attracted by a suggestion which arises out of the defence, that the number of cases which I shall have to consider in the ambit of the questions to be decided should be enlarged by reference to a number of other entertainments.

D

Another thing to observe in regard to s. 8 is this. Apparently the legislature has changed its mind as to the way in which the claim for exemption shall be dealt with, because, whereas under the Act of 1916 the exemption depended, to some extent at any rate, on the educational nature of the entertainment which was presented, under the provisions of this Act of 1946 the requirement of educational character is removed from the entertainment itself and is transferred to the body which is putting on the show. In other words it is not for me to consider (and, indeed, it is immaterial) how great or how little is the educational value of the entertainment which is provided.

E

The remaining statute to which I have to refer is the Finance Act, 1952. Section 2 of that Act provides for three scales of entertainments duty, the lowest of which is obviously intended to apply to performances which are performed by living and acting performers in view of the audience. The next highest scale is one which applies to games and sports and such matters, and the highest scale, the third, applies, for instance, to cinematograph performances. Section 2 (2) provides that the first scale, i.e., the lowest,

G

“... shall be applicable in the case of any entertainment where all the performers whose words or actions constitute the entertainment are actually present and performing and the entertainment consists solely of one or more of the following items, namely—(a) a stage play, (b) a ballet (whether a stage play or not), (c) a performance of music, (d) an eisteddfod, (e) a lecture, (f) a recitation, (g) a music hall or other variety entertainment, (h) a puppet or marionette show, (i) a circus, a travelling show or a menagerie.”

H

So it is to be observed there that a music hall or other variety entertainment which may not qualify as including solo items which fall within item (e) and item (f), i.e., “a performance of music” or “a recitation”, may qualify for duty at the lowest rate.

With those observations, let me turn to the important provision which is s. 3 (1). This sub-section provides:

"An entertainment consisting of one or more of the items specified in s. 8 (1) of the Finance Act, 1946 (which sub-section exempts an entertainment consisting of one or more of certain specified items which is provided by a body not conducted or established for profit whose aims, objects and activities are partly educational), shall be treated as not falling within the said sub-s. (1) if it is a music hall or other variety entertainment."

That completes the statutory provisions with which I am concerned. It is plain that, in order to come within the provisions relating to exemption in these statutes, first, the individual items contained in the programme of the entertainment must fall within one or other of the items specified in s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1946 and further, taken together, they must no amount to either "music hall or other variety entertainment" whatever that may mean.

The action in this case, so far as the statement of claim is concerned, relates to five concerts—to give them the term which is used by the plaintiffs—taking place on five dates in 1952, i.e., July 20, 21, 28, Aug. 28 and Oct. 30. The common feature of all those entertainments is that they consist of a number of items, the greater part of which, at any rate, are of a musical nature, either vocal or otherwise, but, in some cases, an item is included which is not of a musical character. In those cases (and also in the case of one concert which is entirely, I think one would gather, of a musical character) one or more items consisting of a performance by a greater or less well-known variety performer is included.

I turn now to the individual concerts in question, and I will deal first with the concert of July 20, 1952, which was a Sunday. That contains a number of musical items, and an item or two items which are only partly musical given by well-known variety performers principally known, I should say, in respect of broadcasting, Mr. Richard Murdoch and Mr. Kenneth Horne, whose performance, it appears, consisted at least in part of what is called "patter", and, no doubt, was of an extremely amusing character.

In the second concert, that of July 21, 1952—which was a Monday, and not a Sunday—and those on subsequent days with which I am not concerned, there were again turns or performances of a musical character, but there was introduced a compère known as "Flotsam", who is very well-known in the broadcasting world, who introduced the various items, and there was a performer included whose name is Tommy Fields and who is described in the programme as "the world famous light entertainer". He is very well known, it would appear, in the variety world. On July 28, in addition to the musical items, there was a very well-known variety entertainer who has also been described as "the spirit of the old music hall", Mr. Robb Wilton ("Mr. Muddlecombe, J.P."), who gave a monologue and told stories of an amusing character.

I will deal first with those three concerts because, as it seems to me, they have similar elements contained in them. Putting on one side the musical items in each of those entertainments, one finds that there was given, in each case, by one or more persons, a performance which included, in addition in two cases to singing, either considerable monologue or dialogue which was not of a musical nature; and it appears, therefore, that, if those items are to qualify for the purpose of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1946, it is necessary to find that they, to that extent at any rate, amounted to a recitation. The word "recitation", according to the dictionary, it would appear, has a meaning of this kind: "The act of reciting that which is recited", and then under "recite" is: "To repeat, deliver or rehearse as something already prepared, written down, committed to memory, or the like". Those definitions I have taken from WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY, but I think they are very similar to those which are to be found in other dictionaries.

It is contended that these performances in question, which I have just mentioned, do fall within the terms of those definitions because the artists concerned carefully prepared their various (apparently impromptu) observations, and learned them by heart before they gave the performance, and, therefore, it is said, they were reciting something which they had already learned. That would be, no doubt, from the point of view of the plaintiffs, of course, a convenient and easy way of reaching the result. Unfortunately, dictionary definitions do not always present the living picture of the act or matter which they are describing, and it is necessary to use what LORD GODDARD, C.J., has called in Barnes v. Jarvis (1) ([1953] 1 All E.R. 1063) one's common sense in regard to these matters. In my view, if one applies one's common sense to the word "recitation" in the context of these particular Acts, one cannot come to the conclusion that the legislature had in mind something of the nature of the monologue given by that very excellent comedian Mr. Robb Wilton, or, indeed, the sparkling entertainment given by Messrs. Richard Murdoch and Kenneth Horne, or the bright entertainment provided by Mr. Tommy Fields. It is not necessary for me to consider whether "Flotsam" was reciting or not, because I do not think that is really material for the purpose of this case. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that, in each of the three concerts of July 20, 21, and 28, 1952, there was an element which cannot be brought within any of the heads contained in the Finance Act, 1946, s. 8 (1). That is enough to dispose of those three concerts, but, for reasons which I will discuss in a few minutes, I think that they also fail to qualify for exemption from duty on another ground.

The fourth concert was that of Aug. 28, 1952, and that appears to have been wholly musical in its composition. There was no variety performance of any sort introduced that really matters, and the witnesses for the commissioners did, indeed, say that, in their opinion, it was a light musical concert, and was not a variety entertainment. It seems to me that that was clearly the case, and, indeed, the contrary was not pressed against the plaintiffs by the commissioners. Accordingly, in my view, it is plain that the entertainment of Aug. 28, 1952, consisted entirely of performances of music, either vocal or instrumental, and was not a "music hall or other variety entertainment".

I now come to the entertainment which to me is the most difficult of all to decide on, and that is the entertainment of Oct. 30, 1952, which appears to have been one of a series of entertainments included in what is called by Mr. Harold Fielding, the producer, "Gracie Fields' Concert Tour", and consisted of an overture and incidental music played by Ron Millington at the organ, "Singing songs from the shows" by a singer called John McHugh, "Canada's harmonica virtuoso, Tommy Reilly", another performer called Stephane Grappelly from "The Hot Club of France", and finally in two parts a performance by Miss Gracie Fields. Miss Gracie Fields, I was told, sang as many as twenty-six songs. She interposed a short speech describing her pleasure at having returned to Eastbourne, and she made some jokes or other observations in between her songs. It was clear that the songs which she sang, although they were not all of a humorous nature, were very much the same as those which she had sung on other occasions on the variety stage. I do not think that the interposition of a speech by the performer to her audience, or some incidental jokes, prevent the performance being a performance of music, but it is plain that the presence of Miss Gracie Fields dominated the whole of this entertainment.

I was provided with a great deal of evidence. A number of experts (or persons who were termed experts) gave evidence on each side as to the nature of a variety entertainment, and the question is one of considerable difficulty in some circumstances. In my view, the evidence of Mr. Macqueen-Pope came closest to a picture of the true situation when he said that an entertainment given in conditions such as those which prevailed in the case of these five entertainments became a variety entertainment if it was dominated by a well-known variety performer doing the act which he or she did in the variety theatre or in a recognised variety performance. It seems to me that the first three concerts on July 20, 21 and 28, 1952, were dominated and coloured by the presence of variety entertainers, and they plainly became variety entertainments. Though I think the matter is, perhaps, somewhat more difficult in the case of the concert of Oct. 30, 1952, because it is conceivable that a variety performer might so alter his or her style that he or she might appear in another entertainment in, perhaps, quite a different character, it cannot be said that the performance by Miss Gracie Fields on Oct. 30, 1952, was of such a different nature from the normal performance which she would give in an ordinary variety entertainment. Therefore, the conclusion which I reach in the case of this entertainment also is that it was dominated by a variety performer, and became a variety entertainment.

I have not troubled to consider very carefully the meaning of "music hall" in the context of the statute because the term seems to have become rather obsolete for the purposes with which I am concerned. I was told, indeed, that "music hall" has been superseded by "variety entertainment". It is sufficient, therefore, I think, if I consider the matter from the point of view of variety entertainment, and on that issue the conclusion which I reach is that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in regard to the entertainment of Aug. 28, 1952, but they fail in their claim in respect of the other four entertainments mentioned in the writ.

In the case of the entertainment of Aug. 28, 1952, I am prepared to make a declaration that the entertainment at the Winter Garden, Eastbourne, Sussex, on Aug. 28, 1952, consisted of one or more of the items referred to in the Finance Act, 1946, s. 8 (1), and that the said entertainment was not "a music hall or other variety entertainment" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1952, s. 3. Otherwise, in my judgment, the action fails.

Judgment accordingly.

Re OLD SILKSTONE COLLIERIES, LTD.

November 30, December 1, 2, 1953.]

Company—Reduction of capital—Extinguishment of preference stock—Colliery undertaking—Assets transferred to National Coal Board—Voluntary liquidation intended later—Creation of special rights in favour of preference stockholders on previous reductions of capital—Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 25 (1).

On Jan. 1, 1947, the company's colliery undertaking vested in the National Coal Board under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, and, as the company had no other commercial activities, it was its intention to go into voluntary liquidation when all the compensation payable under the Act was received. From 1948 to April, 1953, it was the declared policy of the directors that they would defer consideration of any adjustment scheme under s. 25 of the Act of 1946 until all questions of compensation had been settled. In 1950 the company's issued paid-up capital was £556,414 5s., divided into £198,780 six per cent. cumulative first preference stock, a similar amount of five per cent. non-cumulative second participating preference stock, and £158,854 5s. ordinary stock. On a winding-up, the first preference stockholders were entitled to repayment of their paid-up capital in priority to all other stockholders, and the second preference stockholders in priority to ordinary stockholders, and neither class of preference stockholders had a right to any further participation in the company's surplus assets. By art. 6 of the company's articles of association (which was made applicable to stock as well as to shares) the special rights attached to any class of shares might be modified or abrogated only with the consent in writing of the holders of three-fourths of the issued shares of the class, or with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of such holders. By art. 48, the company was empowered to reduce its capital by special resolution. By art. 65, the first preference stockholders were not entitled to receive notice of or attend or vote at any general meeting unless their preference dividend was in arrear or unless the business of the meeting included a resolution "directly and prejudicially affecting the special rights" attached to their stock. By July, 1950, a certain amount of compensation had been received, and, by a circular dated July 28, 1950, the directors proposed to apply some of the money, for which the company then had no use, in reducing the capital by £198,780, by returning to the preference stockholders half of their paid-up capital. As it was apprehended that the repayment was not strictly in accordance with the first preference stockholders' rights under the articles, the proposal was first sanctioned at extraordinary general meetings of each class of preference stockholders, and, on Aug. 22, 1950, at an extraordinary general meeting of the whole company at which all the stockholders were enabled to vote, a special resolution for the reduction was passed. After the provisions dealing with the reduction of the two classes of preference stock by paying back to the holders of each class half of the capital then paid up thereon, the resolution contained the following proviso: "but so that notwithstanding such reduction of capital the holders of the said first preference stock, second participating preference stock and ordinary stock shall respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect." On Oct. 16, 1951, after separate extraordinary meetings of each class of preference shareholders, a special resolution was passed for a further reduction of capital by a repayment of 5s. to each preference stockholder for every 10s. of such stock held by him. This resolution contained a proviso in practically the same terms as that in the resolution of 1950. Both these reductions were confirmed by the court. On Apr. 24, 1953, the directors issued a circular in which they said, inter alia, that they and their professional advisers were of the definite opinion that the rights of the preference stockholders under s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1946 were of no monetary value, and, accordingly, they proposed to repay the preference stockholders at par. They went on to say that their proposals had been submitted to two named associations for the protection of the interests of shareholders, who were "recommending their interested members to vote in favour of the resolutions to be proposed at the extraordinary general meeting and to take no part in promoting or supporting any proposal for an adjustment scheme." The two associations referred to had, in fact, only a very small interest in the company. On May 19, 1953, at a meeting to which only the holders of second preference stock and of ordinary stock were summoned, the company purported to pass a special resolution for the reduction of capital by returning the whole of the capital paid up on the first and second preference stocks and cancelling those two classes of stocks. On a petition to the court for an order confirming the reduction, a number of the preference stockholders contended (a) that the special resolution of May 19, 1953, had not been validly passed, and, alternatively (b) that, in the circumstances of the case, the reduction was not fair or equitable.

HELD: (i) the provisos to the special resolutions of Aug. 22, 1950, and Oct. 16, 1951, respectively, were not merely declaratory of an existing statutory right which was common to all classes of stockholders, but gave contractual effect, as between the members of the company, to a right which formerly existed purely as a statutory right, and, by way of contract between the members, they conferred, by reference to s. 25 of the Act of 1946, a right which could not exist by the unaided operation of the section itself; in any adjustment proceedings, the expectations of the different classes of stockholders had to be measured, not on the footing of the paid-up capital as it existed on Jan. 1, 1947, but according to their amounts as existing at the date of adjustment, but the proviso to the resolutions of 1950 and 1951 entitled a preference stockholder to make the same claim under s. 25 as he could have made if the reductions of 1950 and 1951 had not been effected; and, therefore, as a result of the resolutions of 1950 and 1951 a special right, within the meaning of art. 6 and art. 65, was attached to each class of preference stock; the effect of the special resolution of May 19, 1953, was to modify or abrogate that right, and, therefore, as the requirements of art. 6 and art. 65 had not been complied with, the resolution was not validly passed, and the court could not confirm the reduction.

(ii) the proposed reduction operated unfairly to the preference stockholders, who had agreed to the earlier reductions on the understanding that they would remain entitled to claim, in adjustment proceedings under s. 25, the same adjustments as they could have claimed if those reductions had not been made, and, therefore, assuming that the resolution of May 19, 1953, was validly passed, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would not confirm the reduction as it was unfair and inequitable.

APPEAL by preference stockholders from an order of VAISEY, J., dated July 13, 1953, confirming a proposal by a colliery company to reduce its capital by repayment of the whole of its preference capital which had not already been repaid, and CROSS-APPEAL by the company from a proviso to the order. C

On the transfer of the company's colliery undertaking to the National Coal Board on Jan. 1, 1947, under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the commercial activities of the company came to an end and its intention was to go into voluntary liquidation when the compensation payable under the Act was received. The issued capital of the company, which was fully paid-up, was divided into six per cent. cumulative first preference stock, five per cent. non-cumulative second participating preference stock, and ordinary stock. On a winding-up the preference stockholders were entitled to repayment of the capital paid up on their stock in priority to the ordinary stockholders (the first preference stockholders having priority over the second preference stockholders), and to no further participation in the company's surplus assets. In 1950 the company passed a special resolution for the reduction of its capital by returning to the two classes of preference stockholders 10s. for each £1 of such stock held by them, with a proviso that they should respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Act of 1946 if the reduction had not taken effect. In 1951 a special resolution was passed for a further reduction of capital by returning to the preference stockholders 5s. for each 10s. of such stock held by them, with a proviso in similar terms to that contained in the resolution of 1950. These two reductions were sanctioned by the court. On May 19, 1953, the company passed the following resolutions: (i) for the reduction of the capital by returning the whole of the capital paid up on the preference stocks; (ii) for payment of the dividends on those stocks from Jan. 1, 1953, to the date when the reduction should take effect; and (iii) amending the articles in regard to capital. Some of the holders of each class of preference stock contended that the court should not confirm the proposed reduction (a) as it had not been validly passed, and (b) as it was not fair and equitable. In support of contention (a) they claimed that special rights, within the meaning of the company's articles, had been conferred on them by the provisos to the earlier resolutions for reduction of capital, and that the provisions of the articles in regard to the modification or abrogation of special rights had not been complied with. VAISEY, J., confirmed the reduction subject to a proviso that any rights which the preference stockholders might have under s. 25 of the Act of 1946 should not be prejudiced by the reduction and that, for the purpose of s. 25, they were to be deemed to be in possession of their respective holdings notwithstanding that the whole of the capital paid up on such holdings had been returned. D E F G H

J. G. Strangman, Q.C., and P. R. Oliver for the objectors.
Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., and P. J. Sykes for the company.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal from an order made by VAISEY, J., on July 13, 1953, whereby he confirmed a reduction of the capital of the Old Silkstone Collieries, Ltd., to the extent stated in the order, but subject to the following proviso:

A “Provided that such reduction of capital is to be without prejudice to such (if any) rights as the first preference stockholders and second participating preference stockholders respectively of the company have or would have had under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the reduction of capital hereby confirmed had not been effected and so that for the purpose of the said section and for that purpose only the holders of the said preference stocks at the date of this order their executors administrators and assigns are to be deemed to be and to continue to be in possession of their respective holdings of such preference stocks respectively notwithstanding that the whole of the capital paid up on such holdings shall have been returned by virtue of the said resolution and this order.”

 C In reference to that proviso, the language used in his judgment by the learned judge was as follows. After saying that there was great force in the objections which had been put forward on behalf of the preference stockholders, he continued:

D “I should be extremely reluctant, and, indeed, should probably refuse to confirm this reduction, if the result were to be what the objectors anticipate, but I have come to the conclusion that it is possible to deal with this case in a way which will obviate the difficulty altogether.”

The way in which he dealt with it (and which, he hoped, would obviate the difficulty) was by adding the proviso which I have read. Counsel for the objecting preference stockholders contended that the proviso inserted by the learned judge would be ineffective to achieve the end intended, because the extinction of any stockholding in the preference stockholders at the time when any application under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, was made would disable them from having any locus standi before the tribunal. Counsel for the company agreed that the proviso on which the learned judge pinned such hopes would be ineffective. We have, therefore, unfortunately had to consider this matter on the footing that that is so. From the short passage which I have read from the judgment of VAISEY, J., it is, at the very least, doubtful whether he would have confirmed the reduction if he had been of opinion that he could not, as he said, obviate the difficulty, and it has become necessary, accordingly, for this court, in the light of the concession made by both sides, to consider what ought to be done.

 G Two quite distinct points have been raised by the objectors. The first is of this nature. It is said that, as a result of certain previous reductions of capital, there was created in favour of each class of preference stockholders a special right within the meaning of the company's articles of association, so that, by the terms of the articles, it was incompetent for the company effectively to resolve on the now proposed reduction of capital save, inter alia, with the assent of separate meetings of the classes of preference stockholders concerned. If that view is right, it is not in doubt that this petition must be refused, since there were no such separate meetings of the two classes of preference stockholders. Secondly, the objectors contended that, even if no such special rights were created, still, in all the circumstances of this case, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, ought to refuse its sanction to this proposal on the general ground that it is not fair or equitable as between the classes of stockholders concerned. As the learned judge in the circumstances expressed no concluded view on either point, we have thought it desirable that we should express a view on both points, though it is our view that the objectors are entitled to succeed on the first point, and, therefore, it is not, strictly, necessary to express any view on the question of fairness. Still, it may be desirable in the interests of the company itself that we should give reasons for a conclusion on both matters so that they may regulate their affairs hereafter in accordance with our view.

The Old Silkstone Collieries, Ltd., is a company which, as its name implies, was, before the coming into effect of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, concerned with the business of coal mining. Its commercial history shows that, until shortly before that Act came into operation, its success had not been of an outstanding character, a fact illustrated by the circumstance that during 1944 and 1945 none of its shares ever stood on the Stock Exchange at a price equivalent to par. But towards the end of its commercial life the company had begun to work on profitable seams of coal so that its prospects from the commercial point of view had become much more promising. But whatever might have happened to this commercial adventure had it not been for the Act of 1946, the coming into operation of that Act put an end altogether to the company's commercial activities. It is not suggested that the company proposes, or has ever proposed, to continue in business in some other form. In other words, this is a case in which, when all the compensation has been received, the company will go out of existence, and all its surplus assets will be divided among its stockholders. It was in anticipation, therefore, of that final demise that in the summer of 1950 the company put forward the first of its reduction proposals. The proposal was introduced to the stockholders by a circular dated July 28, 1950. At that time the issued paid-up capital of the company consisted of £198,780 of first preference stock, an exactly similar amount of second participating preference stock, and £158,854 5s. of ordinary stock. There was, in addition, a considerable amount of nominal but unissued capital, and for the purposes in hand it is not necessary to take up time by referring further to that nominal capital. The rights of the respective classes of stockholders had been varied to some extent from time to time, and in July, 1950, the rights of the first preference stockholders under the articles were these. They were entitled to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend of six per cent. on the amount paid up (or credited as paid up) on the stock, but to no further right of participation in the company's profits. They were entitled on a winding-up to repayment of the capital paid up in priority to all other stockholders, but to no further participation in the surplus assets of the company. Their voting rights were strictly limited by the amended art. 65, which was to the effect that they were not entitled to attend and vote at general meetings of the company unless the preferential dividend was in arrear to the extent there stated, or unless the business of the meeting included the consideration of a resolution "directly and prejudicially affecting the special rights" attached to that stock. The second preference stock carried the right to a five per cent. non-cumulative preferential dividend ranking after the preferential dividend on the first preference stock, but with a further right to participation in the profits of the company, pari passu with the ordinary stockholders, up to but not beyond a further five per cent. on the paid-up capital on the second preference stock. The second preference stockholders, like the first preference stockholders, were not entitled in a winding-up to any participation in the surplus assets of the company beyond the amount required to repay the paid-up capital on their stock, to which they were entitled in priority to the ordinary stockholders. Their voting rights were more extensive than those of the first preference stockholders in that there was no limitation to their right to attend and vote at ordinary meetings of the company. There was, however, an article in the form usually met with in limited companies and described as a modification of rights clause. That is art. 6, which provided:

"If at any time the capital of the company is divided into different classes of shares, the special rights attached to any class may either with the consent in writing of the holders of three-fourths of the issued shares of the class, or with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of such holders (but not otherwise), be modified or abrogated . . . ”

A The article was made applicable in the case of stock as well as of shares. I pause to note that the phrase “special rights” is the same as is found in art. 65. Article 48, the terms of which need not be otherwise noticed, contains a power to reduce the capital of the company by special resolution. The only other matter which I will mention is that on occasions on which all the stockholders would be entitled to vote, each preference stockholder was entitled to one vote for every £1 of his stock, whereas each ordinary stockholder was entitled to one vote for every one shilling of his stock.

B Before I read the circular of July, 1950, to which I have referred, it will be convenient to refer to s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, which plays a very important part in the special circumstances of this case. Section 25 (1) is as follows:

C “Provision shall be made by regulations for due regard being had, as between classes . . . of members . . . of a company being an owner of transferred interests, to what their relative expectations of income yield from their respective interests in the company would have been if this Act had not been passed, and for that purpose the regulations shall provide facilities for adjusting the respective interests of such classes in the company’s assets as affected by the substitution of the compensation under this Act for the transferred interests of the company so as to give effect, so far as may be, on the one hand to the said expectations and on the other hand to the rights of priority conferred on such classes respectively by . . . the memorandum and articles of association of the company.”

E The vesting date for the purpose of the Act of 1946 was Jan. 1, 1947. By July, 1950, the recovery by the company of the compensation for the transfer of its coal mining undertaking to the State had advanced a certain stage, but not far. The total amount of compensation payable to the company has not yet been settled. What it may ultimately amount to is, obviously, a matter of some doubt. The claims put forward by the directors of the company on the company’s behalf so far appear to have exceeded by a large amount the figures which the National Coal Board have intimated as the sum properly payable, or (at least in one case) F which the valuers appointed under the Act have been disposed to award. If the estimates put forward by the company were eventually to prevail, it seems reasonable to suppose that there would be a substantial distributable surplus in the hands of the company after the paid-up capital had been repaid, whereas, if the more gloomy prognostications of the National Coal Board were to prevail, G the total available surplus would be of a much reduced character.

It was in those circumstances that the circular of July 28, 1950, was sent. In that circular the late chairman thus expressed himself to all the stockholders:

H “You will recollect that in my statement, circulated May 1, 1950, with the 1949 accounts, I stated it was the intention of the board to submit to stockholders a repayment of capital scheme. The company has substantial liquid funds which have accumulated from cash received for compensation in respect of stocks of stores, wagons, etc. Additionally, a substantial loan from the parent company to a wholly owned subsidiary has been repaid. Your board has therefore decided to recommend that in the interests of the company and the stockholders the moneys for which the company has no present use shall be applied to the repayment of 10s. to the first preference stockholders and second participating preference stockholders for every £1 of such stock held by them. Section 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, provides for the adjustments of rights as between the holders of preference and ordinary stocks. It is your board's intention that any rights stockholders may have under s. 25 shall be retained until the amount of compensation payable to the company is determined. Whilst the proposal to repay 10s. per £1 of stock to both classes of preference stockholders is not strictly in accord with the rights of first preference stockholders under the company's articles of association, in that they are entitled to prior repayment of capital, your board draw attention to the fact that if the whole of the first preference stock was repaid, these stockholders would be deprived of any rights which they may have under s. 25 as the stock would cease to exist. The funds which will be available for stockholders on determination of final compensation will be such that no prejudice can result to the priority rights of the first preference stockholders by the scheme now submitted. The proposals involve a payment of £198,780 which is available . . . "

Inclosed with the circular were notices of extraordinary general meetings, first, of the first preference stockholders, secondly, of the second participating preference stockholders, and, finally, of the company. Since it was apprehended (and, I doubt not, rightly) that the repayment was otherwise than in strict accordance with the stockholders' rights under the articles, the terms of art. 6 made it necessary that the proposal should have the sanction of extraordinary resolutions of both classes of preference stockholders. The resolution for reduction which was to be submitted to the extraordinary general meeting of the whole company (and, having regard to what I have said, all the stockholders, preference and ordinary, were treated as entitled to vote at it) took the form: "That the capital of the company be reduced . . . " I then pass over the figures, for I need only re-state that each class of preference stockholders suffered a fifty per cent. reduction of the capital paid-up on that stock. Then there follow these highly pregnant words:

" . . . but so that notwithstanding such reduction of capital the holders of the said first preference stock, second participating preference stock, and ordinary stock shall respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect."

That reduction of capital was duly confirmed by the court.

I now pass over a period of slightly more than a year when the second stage in what, I think, must plainly be treated as a gradual process of total liquidation was reached. The present chairman, who had become chairman on the death of the previous chairman, then sent to the stockholders a circular following, in some respects, the circular which had been sent by his predecessor. It is dated Sept. 21, 1951, and opens thus:

G

"Further proposed part repayment of capital. You will recollect that following the authority of class meetings of first preference stockholders and second participating preference stockholders held Aug. 22, 1950, a repayment of 10s. to the first preference stockholders and second participating preference stockholders for every £1 of such stock held by them on Oct. 31, 1950, was made on Nov. 1, 1950."

H

After stating that the company had now received £100,000 Treasury Stock in part satisfaction of compensation, the chairman went on to say:

"Your board has decided to recommend that in the interests of the company and the stockholders, the money for which the company has no present use shall be applied to the repayment of 5s. to the first preference stockholders and second participating preference stockholders for every 10s. of such stock held by them."

Then follows this reflection of what had been said on the previous occasion:

- A “Section 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, provides for the adjustment of rights as between the holders of preference and ordinary stocks. It is your board’s intention that any rights stockholders may have under s. 25 shall be retained until the amount of compensation payable to the company is determined. Whilst the proposal to repay 5s. per 10s. of stock to both classes of preference stockholders is not strictly in accord with the rights of the first preference stockholders under the company’s articles of association, in that they are entitled to prior repayment of capital, and therefore requires consent of class meetings, your board draw attention to the fact that if the whole of the first preference stock was repaid, these stockholders would be deprived of any rights which they may have under s. 25 as the stock would cease to exist.”

B The chairman then refers to the notices enclosed and says in regard to them:

- C “These, [the resolutions] preserve the rights (if any) of preference stockholders under s. 25, cover the necessary alterations in the company’s articles of association regarding capital, and preserve the existing voting power of stockholders.”

- D Again, having regard to the fact that the proposals departed from the strict rights inter se of the stockholders, art. 6 was regarded as applicable, and separate extraordinary meetings were held of each class of preference stockholders. The form of resolution proposed for the company followed in form almost identically the form on the previous occasion. The result was to reduce the preference stock by fifty per cent. of what remained, i.e., to twenty-five per cent. of what it had originally been. Again, at the end of the essential resolution was the sentence:

- E “. . . but so that notwithstanding such reduction of capital the holders of the said first preference stock and second participating preference stock shall respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect.”

- F It will be noticed that in the proviso in this case there is omitted any reference to the ordinary stockholders, as occurred in the first resolution, but counsel have agreed that nothing relevant to this appeal turns on that fact. That reduction of capital, like its predecessor, was duly confirmed by the court.

- G The first question, therefore, which the court has to decide is: Did those resolutions have the effect of creating in favour of each class of preference stockholders a special right, something which they had not got before, and a right peculiar to their stocks respectively, for, if so, it is conceded that the total elimination of the preference capital was incompetent without the approval of the preference stockholders under art. 6. In my judgment, that was their effect. But, before I state my reasons, I should lay a foundation to what follows, both on this point and, in some measure, on the second point of general fairness, by a reference to Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1) and, immediately following, Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (2). Those were cases in which schemes for reduction of capital came before the House of Lords, in the first case from the Inner House of the Court of Session and, in the second case, from this court. In each case the argument for the objectors was, inter alia, that a reduction scheme involving total repayment to the preference shareholders would disqualify them from any right to make a claim for adjustment under s. 25 of the Act of 1946, and, therefore, the proposal was unfair and inequitable. The House took the view that those objections were unfounded. In the course of the speeches in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (1), expression fell from all their Lordships which must have somewhat dashed the hopes which preference shareholders may have entertained that some considerable fruit was necessarily to be gathered from the provisions of s. 25 and the regulations made thereunder. But I think it would be going far too far to suggest that their Lordships indicated that, in such a case as the present, preference stockholders could in no circumstances have any valid expectation of recovering any compensation or adjustment under the section and the regulations made thereunder. If they had so indicated, it seems to me that they would have rendered Parliamentary intention, as expressed in s. 25, almost wholly nugatory. What, I think, fairly summarises the views which their Lordships expressed is to say that the expectations which may be entertained by preference stockholders (or, indeed, any class of members of a company) under that section must be, at the present time, at any rate, doubtful and speculative. I take as an example the language of LORD NORMAND at the end of his opinion in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (1), where he said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1084):

"If that section [s. 25] opens to the preference stockholders a prospect of advantage, of which they could be deprived only by a reduction of capital involving the extinction of their shares before liquidation, I would be prepared to hold that the reduction was unfair. But neither s. 25 nor the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2360), which have been made under it since this case was before the Court of Session, justify any firm expectation of advantage to the preference stockholders. How the regulations will be applied by the tribunal is a matter of doubtful speculation."

He then went on to say that in that case he thought the ordinary stockholders were not bound to await the operation of the regulations before exercising the powers which they had under the articles of the company in question.

In the present case, it is the substance and gist of the contention of counsel for the company on this point that the provisos to the resolutions of 1950 and 1951 introduced by the words "but so that" serve, at most, as a mere declaration of the existing statutory right, whatever it is, and speculative as it certainly is (according to the speeches in the House), arising out of s. 25. But I think that that contention overlooks, first, that, whatever might be the nature and value of the statutory right, the incorporation of these terms into the resolution makes it, in effect, a special right attached to the preference stocks. Whether that alone would suffice for the purposes of the present appeal, it is unnecessary to state. For, in my judgment, the words which have been used go further. I think it impossible to read those words as meaning otherwise than that, notwithstanding the reduction, the preference stockholders are entitled to make their claim on the footing that they are still proprietors of the amount of stock which they would have held had there been no reduction of their capital. Indeed, counsel for the company, as I followed him, expressly so conceded. Taking, by way of illustration, the case of the first preference stockholders, the material words are:

"... but so that notwithstanding such reduction of capital the holders of the first preference stock . . . shall respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 [of the Act of 1946] if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect."

After the 1951 resolution the holdings of the first preference stockholders had been reduced to twenty-five per cent. of their original amount, but I read the proviso as stating that, notwithstanding that reduction, for the purposes of making their claim under s. 25 and vis-à-vis the ordinary stockholders, they are entitled to present that claim on the footing that they hold four times the amount of the stock which at the material date they would, in fact, hold. Put another way, it would be equivalent to saying that, for the purposes of such an application, they would be holders of first preference stock carrying the right to a fixed preferential cumulative dividend at the rate, not of six per cent., but of twenty-four per cent. What effect that would have, in the circumstances of the case, on the mind of the tribunal which is given the task of deciding the question posed in s. 25, it is not necessary to decide, but I find it impossible to reject the view that, by being given that special right or privilege, the preference stockholders have had created in their favour a "special right" within the meaning of art. 6 and art. 65 of the company's articles of association. It was contended by counsel for the company that, assuming, as he concedes, the meaning of the resolution to be as I have stated it, still it is merely declaratory of the words of the section, but with that contention I am unable to agree. I agree with counsel for the company that, having regard to the terms of s. 25 (1), the estimation of expectation of income is to be made as though the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, had not been passed, that is to say, by having regard to what those expectations would have been on Jan. 1, 1947. But I am unable to go on from that to hold that a stockholder, who between Jan. 1, 1947, and the date of his application has suffered a reduction by payment off of his capital by seventy-five per cent., is, by the section, entitled to prefer his claim on the footing that no such reduction had taken effect. It seems to me not in doubt that, in order to qualify any stockholder as an applicant under the section, he must be a member of the company at the time of his application and a holder of shares of the class in respect of which the application is made. For that reason, it is conceded here that the proviso which the learned judge introduced into his judgment would not be effective, because (it is said) the proviso could not make into members persons who had ceased to be members. But it does not seem to me to follow that the claimant is to be treated as though he held the amount of stock which he happened to hold six years ago and before any reduction took effect.

Some argument was also addressed to us about the meaning of the word "relative" in the phrase "their relative expectations of income yield" in s. 25 (1), but it does not seem to me that anything turns on it. It seems clear that the function of the tribunal is to attempt, so far as may be (to use the language of the sub-section) to give effect as between the competing claims of two classes of shares, on the one hand, to their respective or relative (and it may be the words are synonymous) expectations of income yield and, at the same time, to their respective or relative rights under the articles in regard to repayment of capital and otherwise. One final point may be mentioned. It was said by counsel for the company that, assuming everything else to be against him, still the last words in the resolution did not import any such permanence in their effect as to give any special right—in other words, that they merely said, in effect, that the rights of the preference stockholders would be as stated until such time as the company, in exercising its power aliunde in the articles, chose to put an end to them. I doubt whether that helps the company's argument, because, if I am right so far, so long as they remain, these are special rights which can only be taken away under the articles by observing the restrictions of art. 6. But I also think, as JENKINS, L.J., observed during the argument, that in its context the word "remain" should fairly be construed as meaning "should remain either until such time as the compensation or adjustment under the Act of 1946 has been paid or until the time for applying under the Act has expired."

For those reasons, then, I am of opinion that the effect of the resolutions in 1950 and 1951 was to create special rights. If that view is correct, then, as counsel for the company concedes, the only course open to this court is to refuse the petition. But we have heard full argument on the other and more general matter, and, for reasons which I have already given, I think it right to express my view also on the general question of fairness of the proposed scheme. In approaching that matter, I have in mind again what was said in the House of Lords in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (1) and the Prudential Assurance Co. case (2), and the somewhat nebulous character of the rights which this section has been apt to confer, and, in proceeding to deal with this matter, I do so on the assumption, of course, that the terms of the two resolutions in 1950 and 1951 were, contrary to the view which I have expressed, not apt to create any special rights at all. I also accept the view which found support in those two cases, and for which counsel for the company contended, that the onus in this matter lies on those who seek to establish that the scheme ought to be rejected as unfair. One other matter must be stated, and stated in no uncertain terms, as a prelude to my judgment on this part of the case, and that is that no kind of imputation whatever is made in this case against the absolute good faith and impartiality of the directors. It does, indeed, so happen that the three directors hold small quantities only of the stocks of all three classes. It is, therefore, quite plain on the facts that the directors had no personal interest in the matter which would be in the least likely to conflict with their duty to do the best they could for their company and for the stockholders in it. For some reason, at which it is possible to hazard a guess but which is quite immaterial, it is, I think, quite clear that the view now taken by the board of the possible benefits which classes of stockholders generally, and preference stockholders in particular, might derive from the operation of s. 25 and the regulations made thereunder has undergone a change. It is impossible to read the earlier circulars, or the references in the chairman's speeches four and five years ago or even less, and conclude otherwise than that the directors then thought that there was some substance in the prospects tendered by s. 25 of the Coal Act. I will make reference to the chairman's observations in one or two of the early reports of the directors. In the report which accompanied the accounts for the year ended Dec. 31, 1948, the chairman stated, under the heading of "Coal Industry Nationalisation Act", the condition of affairs which then existed in regard to the award and distribution of the £164,000,000, odd which had been set apart for the former proprietors of the coal industry. He stated that the interim income which was payable under the terms of the Act "is the main and in some cases the only source of revenue in many colliery undertakings", and he expressed the doubts which he entertained for the prospects of the stockholders if that interim income ceased to be payable or did not amount to a large enough sum to discharge the various income obligations of the company. He said:

"Your directors feel that no adjustment scheme can be usefully contemplated until the amount of compensation falling to the company is known."

That statement was made after a reference to s. 25 in which he stated that provision is there made "for the adjustment of interests of different classes of debentures and shares in attachment to distribution of final compensation."

He was, therefore, making clear that his board's policy was to postpone consideration of any adjustment scheme until the compensation payable to the company had been paid in full. Again, in 1949, he drew attention to the same point. He referred to the compensation procedure and to its partial satisfaction, and said:

"It is obvious that the reduced interim revenue payments will not enable us to meet outgoings and maintain present dividends on our present issued capital over the years pending finality of compensation payments."

He concluded by saying:

"I am impelled to warn stockholders that unless present procedure re valuations is speeded up, we shall not, in my opinion, reach finality before 1954, if then. This is an additional and cogent reason for proceeding with our 'repayment of capital scheme'".

In the light of that state of affairs, these schemes for repayment were put forward, and it is, in my judgment, essential not to lose sight of the fact that the company was not proposing to continue in business. From what I have read, it is manifest that, as occasion offered and the compensation was payable, the directors intended gradually (in effect) to liquidate the company, but to await the receipt of final compensation before embarking on any adjustment scheme. It is in the light of that essential matter of fact, as I think, that one must interpret the true inference and effect of the statements in the circulars of 1950 and 1951. The vital words—and I repeat them, though the whole passages which I have earlier read ought to be borne in mind—are:

- A "It is your board's intention that any rights stockholders may have under s. 25 shall be retained until the amount of compensation payable to the company is determined."

That must also be read together with the forms of resolutions which accompanied the circulars, including the provisos, which, of course, on this view, did not operate to confer special rights, but did plainly operate to emphasise in no uncertain terms the statement already read, viz., that the board's intention was to keep alive the interests of the preference stockholders at least to an extent sufficient to enable them to avail themselves of whatever rights, effective or otherwise, s. 25 offered to them.

- C So I come to the proposals which led up to the passing of the resolution for reduction which is now before the court, reduction involving, essentially, the total extinction of the preference stockholders as classes and, therefore, as is conceded, complete elimination of any right which they might have to make application under the section. It is, I think, not unimportant to bear in mind that, although the payment of final compensation has not occurred, still there is a right, as I read the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948, for these classes of stockholders to initiate proceedings themselves at any time, if the company on its part does not think fit at this time, or at any time, to put forward what is called an adjustment scheme. Counsel for the company frankly admits that between 1951 and the spring of 1953 the directors had suffered a change of heart or mind in this matter. The circular of Apr. 24, 1953, which accompanied the notice of meeting and the form of resolution for the third reduction of capital, is, obviously, framed to make clear the view of the directors that these rights of the preference stockholders, which, according to the earlier circulars, the board had intended to preserve, were, in fact, of no value whatever. In the light of what had gone before, it is, perhaps, startling to find that the proposal to eliminate altogether both classes of preference stockholders was regarded as not requiring a special meeting of either class, and even as not requiring or enabling the first preference stockholders to attend and vote at the general meeting. But, startling though it appears, that view is, of course, correct, unless it is postulated that the resolution did involve a modification or abrogation of special rights attached either to the first preference or the second preference stockholders. The circular states, among other things:

- H "Your directors and their professional advisers have given very careful consideration to the terms of repayment of the preference stock. The company's articles of association specifically provide for repayment at par. The previous capital repayments preserved the rights (if any) of the preference stockholders under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946."

That section is then set out and a reference is made to the regulations made under it. There is then a statement showing the actual dividends paid in the years 1938 to 1946 inclusive on all three classes of shares. They show that the first preference shares received altogether over those years 58½ per cent., the second preference shares received approximately fifty per cent., including their further participation, and the ordinary stockholders twenty-four per cent. Then comes this passage:

"Your directors and their professional advisers are therefore of the definite opinion that no monetary value can be attached to the first preference stock and second participating preference stock as to any right which may exist under s. 25 (1) of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946. Accordingly, they propose repayment at par. These proposals have been submitted to and discussed with the Association of Investment Trusts and the British Insurance Association Investment Protection Committee who are recommending their interested members to vote in favour of the resolutions to be proposed at the extraordinary general meeting and to take no part in promoting or supporting any proposal for an adjustment scheme. The use of an adjustment scheme would only invoke long delay and expense and in view of the foregoing it is hoped that the preference stockholders will accept the proposed repayment terms."

The board, then, were expressing the hope that both classes of preference stockholders (though, as I have said, the first preference stockholders were not entitled to attend and vote at the meeting which was being summoned) would accept the advice tendered and would refrain from exercising the one right which, in the circumstances, they had, viz., the right to make an application for an adjustment scheme or to serve notice on the company to do so.

The question then is posed: In view of what the directors stated, is it shown to be unfair or inequitable—I state it thus because of the onus of proof—now to propose to the preference stockholders their own total extinction? I must say that I have felt doubt about it, partly because of a fear that the view that there was here unfairness or inequity might be thought to reflect in some measure on the good faith of the directors. I have already said that no such reflection can possibly be made. After some vacillation in my own mind, I have come to the conclusion that this is a scheme which, in the circumstances, the court ought not, in its discretion, to sanction, and that it is not, according to the ordinary common sense of this matter, fair or equitable. I follow the force of the contention of counsel for the company that the earlier circulars did no more than state the intention of the board at the time, and, if that is a fair reading of them and no more, that any sensible stockholder should say to himself: "Well, that is what they think now, but there is no reason why they should not change their minds, and, indeed, they cannot bind themselves and their successors not to change their minds". But my view is that, in the circumstances of the case, so clear and unequivocal an expression of the board's intention does mean, and would reasonably be taken to mean, something more than that. The earlier reductions were but stages in the final liquidation and distribution of the company's assets, and, where the chairman twice makes it plain that it is part of the board's policy to postpone any consideration of an adjustment scheme and to retain for the preference stockholders these rights, whatever they might be, and where on both the first two occasions the two classes of preference stockholders were invited to support the reductions on that footing expressly—and I pause to note that the first preference stockholders particularly were asked to accept that statement of policy as the justification for a departure from strict rights—when all that is done, I think there is here such a representation of policy on the part of the board that it is not fair or equitable for them now to say to the preference stockholders: "Well, we have changed our minds and that which was held out to you as the chief inducement to assent before is now to be taken away altogether". It seems to me the matter is one to be judged by ordinary common sense. It is not to be forgotten that the ordinary shareholders obtained an advantage as a result of the earlier reductions. As the chairman had rightly pointed out, as matters then stood, the income available was not likely to be sufficient to maintain existing dividends if all the capital remained outstanding. Therefore, there was to be this reduction and a consequent relief of the charges against income for the benefit of the ordinary stockholders.

Counsel for the objectors referred us to the well-known passage in the judgment of BOWEN, L.J., in Birmingham & District Land Co. v. London & North Western Railway Co. (3), where the learned lord justice used the following language (40 Ch.D. 286):

"The truth is that the proposition [stated by LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in Hughes v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (4) (2 App. Cas. 448)] is wider than cases of forfeiture. It seems to me to amount to this, that if persons who have contractual rights against others induce by their conduct those against whom they have such rights to believe that such rights will either not be enforced or will be kept in suspense or abeyance for some particular time, those persons will not be allowed by a court of equity to enforce the rights until such time has elapsed, without at all events placing the parties in the same position as they were before. That is the principle to be applied. I will not say it is not a principle that was recognised by courts of law as well as of equity."

That passage was cited and approved by MACKINNON, L.J. ([1942] 1 All E.R. 463), in a characteristic judgment in Salisbury v. Gilmore (5), where the learned lord justice observed the distinction validly to be drawn between the Birmingham & District Land Co. case (3), on the one hand, and Jorden v. Money (6), on the other. The rights of the different classes of stockholders in a company are contractual rights derived from the company's articles of association. But I need not go so far as to say that this case necessarily falls within the exact terms of the language used by BOWEN, L.J. That language seems to me sufficient, at any rate, to justify the view that, looking at this matter from a common-sense man-of-the-world point of view (if I may use those phrases), it was inequitable, after so much had been said and such promises had been given, and after such statements of policy on the part of the board had been made, for the board to turn round and reverse all that had gone before.

It is always the function of the court to look with care at (as it is said, to scrutinise closely) schemes of this character or, at any rate, complicated schemes. No one would call this case complicated, and, therefore, all that MAUGHAM, J., said in Re Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd. (7), is not necessarily applicable to a simple and straightforward case like this. I have in mind the criticisms which MAUGHAM, J., then made of a statement in a circular before the court to the effect that the trustees of certain debenture stockholders had approved the scheme and recommended its acceptance. It turned out that the trustees were a bank who had a very strong interest in another capacity, seeing that they were at the time owed as bankers approximately one and a half million pounds. Our attention in this case has been drawn forcibly by counsel for the objectors to the passage in the circular of Apr. 24, 1953, starting with the words: "These proposals have been submitted to . . .". So far as the facts are concerned, it appears that there were three stockholders of the company who were members of the Association of Investment Trusts. Of those three, one of them, Electrical and Industrial Investment Co., Ltd. held approximately the same amount, and not a large amount, of each stock. The other two, according to the evidence, never received any recommendation on the matter from the association, and one of them is an objector to the scheme. Three stockholders of this company were members of the British Insurance Association. One of them held only ordinary stock, and another, Royal Exchange Assurance, held such small amounts of each stock that it obviously had little or no substantial interest in the matter. We have been told that the reason why the three members of the first association did not receive any recommendation from their association was that, unhappily, the association had not available a register showing the relative holdings which was sufficiently up to date. But whether or not individual members of the association were, in fact, informed, matters, perhaps, not so much. The effect, the meaning, the sting, as it has been said, of the sentence in the circular is obvious. The persons to whom it was addressed, particularly the two classes of preference stockholders who were asked to accept the proposed repayment, plainly were being told: "It is really no good your pinning any hopes on your rights, if any, under s. 25 of the Act of 1946. As you see, these very important bodies are of opinion that there is nothing to be obtained under the section, and they will give you no support". I should have thought it obvious that any stockholder, who had been a little inclined to stand up for his own rights, would (to say the least) be greatly discouraged on reading that sentence. But his discouragement would, I should have thought, have been much mitigated had he known the slight interest which the members of these high-sounding bodies really had in this company. I think, therefore, that a statement of this kind, without any further explanation of the extent and character of the interests which are involved, does have so important an effect on the mind of the ordinary individual stockholder that the use of such argument in a circular is undesirable, prima facie, without sufficient explanation to give it its true significance. In saying that, I gather from counsel for the objectors that I am repeating what I myself said as a judge of first instance in Re Selfridge's (Holdings), Ltd. (8), when my observations were approved afterwards in this court. It is, again, only just to the directors to state that the form of words which they put in was a form settled for them by the representatives of these two bodies, who are in the happy position of being able to suggest forms of words for which afterwards they bear no responsibility whatever. But I do not think, in the circumstances, that anything really is added by this circumstance. However much one might regret the insertion of this kind of statement, it seems to me that the real question of fairness or unfairness falls to be determined by reference to what had gone before, though I do not minimise the point that, had it not been for that statement, an individual might have had sufficient confidence in his rights under s. 25 to have made an application, or to have served a notice on the company that he wished to make an application, under the section. For the reasons which I have stated, my view (which I believe to have been the view which VAISEY, J., was inclined to entertain) is that, if I am wrong on the first point, then I think that this is a case in which the court, in its discretion, should not have confirmed this proposed reduction. But it is sufficient, having regard to the view which I take on the first point, to say that, the resolutions not being properly passed, the proper course for this court is to refuse the petition and to allow the appeal.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The first question which this court has to decide is whether the special resolution purporting to have been passed on May 19, 1953, for the reduction of the capital of the company by returning the whole of the capital paid up on the first preference and second participating preference stocks, and cancelling those two classes of stock, was validly passed.

The articles of association of the company contain in art. 6 the following provision in regard to modification of rights:

"If at any time the capital of the company is divided into different classes of shares, the special rights attached to any class may either with the consent in writing of the holders of three-fourths of the issued shares of the class, or with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution passed at a separate general meeting of such holders (but not otherwise) be modified or abrogated . . ."

Article 65 contains provisions as to voting to which I need not refer except to note that they include this proviso:

"Provided that the first preference stock and shares shall not entitle the holders to receive notice of or attend or vote at any general meeting unless either (a) . . . ”

Then there is provision for the case of the preference dividend being in arrear, which does not arise in this case—

“ . . . (b) the business of the meeting includes the consideration of a resolution directly and prejudicially affecting the special rights attached to the first preference stock or shares.”

A To the meeting of May 19, 1953, there were summoned only the holders of second preference stock and the holders of ordinary stock, the view taken by those responsible for convening the meeting being to the effect that the resolutions proposed to be passed did not involve any modification of rights within art. 6, and, further, did not involve any prejudicial effect on the special rights of the first preference stock under art. 65, so that it was neither necessary to summon the holders of the first preference stock to the meeting nor to hold separate meetings of the two classes of preference stock. Apart from the two special resolutions by which the two earlier reductions of capital were effected, it is not suggested that there was any special right of either class of preference stock which would be in any way affected by the proposed resolutions. These two

C classes rank immediately after each other for repayment of capital in a winding-up with no right to participate in surplus assets, and, accordingly (apart from those two special resolutions), a reduction which provided for paying off the whole of the capital paid up on the first preference stock and the second participating preference stock in that order would have been a reduction in accordance with strict legal rights.

D But it is claimed that the two resolutions by which the two previous reductions of capital were effected did attach special rights to each of these two classes of preference stock, and that those rights were modified or abrogated or prejudicially affected by the third resolution for reduction, inasmuch as it had the effect of extinguishing them altogether, thereby putting an end to the special rights said to have been created by these two special resolutions. The provision relied on

E for that purpose in the first special resolution for reduction (No. 1 of Aug. 22, 1950) follows the provisions dealing with the reduction of the two classes of preference stock by paying back to the holders of each class half of the capital then paid up thereon, and is in these terms:

F “ but so that notwithstanding such reduction of capital the holders of the said first preference stock, second participating preference stock and ordinary stock shall respectively remain entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect.”

G A corresponding provision, in almost exactly the same terms, appears in the second special resolution for reduction (No. 1 of Oct. 16, 1951) with this difference, that, whereas the proviso in the earlier resolution had included a reference to the ordinary stock, the proviso in the later one refers only to “ the said first preference stock and second participating preference stock ”.

H The question, therefore, is whether the provisions to which I have referred, and in particular the provision occurring in the second of the two special resolutions, i.e., the resolution of Oct. 16, 1951, confer special rights on the holders of the first preference stock and second participating preference stock respectively. In my opinion, the provisions in question do have that effect. They declare that the holders of these classes of stock shall respectively remain “ entitled to claim the same adjustment of their interest as could have been claimed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, if the said reduction of capital had not taken effect.”

To my mind, the words "shall respectively remain entitled" are clearly words apt to confer a right, and, in my view, that which is conferred by those governing words is plainly capable of subsisting as a right. Moreover, I think the right is conferred as regards each class as a right peculiar to that class of stock, and is, therefore, a special right within the meaning of the articles. Counsel for the company maintained, first, that the provisions in question do not confer any right at all, inasmuch as any adjustment must be effected on the footing of the paid-up capital as it existed on Jan. 1, 1947, the vesting date under the Act. I cannot accept that proposition. It seems to me, with all respect to counsel's argument, quite plain that in any adjustment proceedings, the expectations of the different classes of stock must be measured according to their amounts as then existing. Next it is argued that in any case the provisions in question are only declaratory of an existing statutory right which is common to all classes of stockholders, and subsists, not by virtue of the articles or any special resolution, but by virtue of s. 25 of the Act. Again, I cannot accept that argument. In the first place, in my view, these provisions give contractual effect as between the members to a right which formerly existed purely as a statutory right. Furthermore, it seems to me that, again, by way of contract between the members, they confer by reference to s. 25 of the Act a right which could not exist by the unaided operation of the section itself. In my opinion, a preference stockholder before the passing of the first of these resolutions could accurately have said: "I am entitled, or will in due course be entitled, to claim an adjustment under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act by virtue of the provisions of that Act." It appears to me that in order to be accurate in stating his position after the special resolution had been passed, he would have had to say: "By virtue of the special resolution passed on" such and such a date "I am entitled to make the same claim under the provisions of s. 25 of the Act as I could have made if the reduction effected on" such and such a date "had not been effected". In other words, it is not an accurate description of his position, after the passing of the resolution, to say that he has no more than the ordinary statutory right. Accordingly, I am of opinion, as regards the first question, that, on the true construction of the two reduction resolutions of 1950 and 1951, a special right of the nature I have endeavoured to describe was attached to these two classes of preference stock. It follows that such special right was modified or abrogated—clearly, the more appropriate word would be the latter—by the third reduction resolution, which purported to extinguish those classes of stock by paying back the whole of the capital paid-up thereon, and, furthermore, that such reduction did directly and prejudicially affect a special right attached to the first preference stock. In order, therefore, validly to carry out this reduction it was necessary to hold a general meeting to which would be summoned not only the holders of the ordinary stock and second participating preference stock, but also the holders of the first preference stock, and, in addition, it was necessary to put the proposals to separate meetings of the holders of those two classes of stock in accordance with art. 6, and to procure the respective approval of those two classes of stockholders to the proposals by the requisite majority.

As SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., has said, the result of that view on the first question is that the second question strictly does not arise, but I will follow his example and add very briefly some observations of my own on the question whether, on the footing that the disputed resolution for reduction was validly passed, the case, is, nevertheless, one of those in which the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should decline to confirm the reduction on the ground that, in all the circumstances of the case, it operates unfairly to the objectors. It is to be observed that from, at least, 1948 until the time when the scheme for the final repayment of the whole of the capital remaining paid up on the two classes of preference stock was mooted, the declared policy of the directors of the company was consistently to the effect that they would defer consideration of any adjustment scheme under s. 25 of the Act until all questions of compensation had been finally cleared up. In the statement accompanying the accounts for the year ended Dec. 31, 1948, the chairman said:

A “Under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, and the regulations attached thereto, provision is made for the adjustment of interests of different classes of debentures and shares in attachment to distribution of final compensation. Your directors feel that no adjustment scheme can be usefully contemplated until the amount of compensation falling to the company is known.”

B Consistently with that policy, the first of the three reductions was so arranged that any rights which there might be to adjustment under s. 25 should not be disturbed. If I may be excused for reading again the most relevant passages from the circular of July 28, 1950, issued in connection with the reduction of Aug. 22, 1950, in that circular the chairman said:

C “Section 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, provides for the adjustments of rights as between the holders of preference and ordinary stocks. It is your board’s intention that any rights stockholders may have under s. 25 shall be retained until the amount of compensation payable to the company is determined. Whilst the proposal to repay 10s. per £1 of stock to both classes of preference stockholders is not strictly in accord with the rights of first preference stockholders under the company’s articles of association, in that they are entitled to prior repayment of capital, your board draw attention to the fact that if the whole of the first preference stock was repaid these stockholders would be deprived of any rights which they may have under section 25 as the stock would cease to exist . . . Your directors consider that it is in the interests of all classes of stockholders to make the repayment of capital now proposed and recommend the scheme submitted for your consideration and acceptance. Enclosed please find notices calling the various class meetings together with the resolutions to be submitted. These preserve the rights (if any) of preference stockholders under s. 25, cover the necessary alterations in the company’s articles of association regarding capital, preserve the existing balance of voting between classes of shares . . . ”

F It appears to me that this circular, particularly the passages from it which I have read, taken in conjunction with the proviso to the first of the special resolutions of which notice was enclosed, could not fail to convey to any preference stockholder reading it that he was being asked by the directors of the company to suffer a reduction by way of repayment of capital of 10s. in the £ of his holding of stock on the understanding that he would remain entitled to claim in due course, in adjustment proceedings, the same adjustment as he could have claimed if there had been no such reduction. Counsel for the company said that G no such effect can fairly be attributed to the circular because the contemplated retention of any rights of stockholders under s. 25 of the Act until the amount of compensation payable to the company was determined was described as a matter of the board’s intention—“It is your board’s intention that . . .”. Counsel contended that an intention is an intention and nothing more, that a man may genuinely intend one thing one day and another the next, and that the H directors and the company and the ordinary stockholders were not to be handicapped by a mere expression of what may have been the intention of the board at that particular time. For my part, I cannot give the use of the word “intention” in this context the qualifying effect suggested by counsel. In my view, that passage in the circular might, without changing the meaning, have been expressed in these words: “Your board has decided that any rights that stockholders may have . . .”. Of course, the board, having decided one thing one day, might be able to decide something else the next, but it does not follow that they could alter their decision, or alter their intention (if that word is used) after the decision or intention once expressed had been acted on. The circular which accompanied the notice of meeting and the form of special resolution for the second of the three reductions contains passages to a similar effect, and, in my judgment, the effect of that circular, read as a whole, again was in effect to ask the preference stockholders to submit to a further reduction of their holdings by a repayment of fifty per cent. of the then remaining paid-up capital on the understanding that they were to remain entitled to claim in due course in adjustment proceedings on the basis of the amount of their respective holdings as they stood before the first reduction. The representations in those circulars having been acted on by the two classes of preference stockholders in submitting to the reductions effected in accordance with the two earlier schemes, it was, in my view, impossible, consistently with good faith, for the company then to propose a further reduction which would bring about the total extinction of the capital paid up on the preference stock and by such extinction destroy the right to claim adjustment under s. 25 which had been so jealously preserved down to that point, and which had been, I think, an essential element in all previous proposals. When I say "consistently with good faith", I am not intending to use that expression in any sense which would cast any reflection on the probity of the directors. The directors of the company, I have no doubt, are doing their best in the interests of all the stockholders. They have no particular axe to grind, having only insignificant holdings of stock of the various classes. But it does seem to me, though, no doubt, the directors acted with the best intention throughout this matter, that the third reduction of capital, resolved on by the special resolution of May 19, 1953, would, if given effect to in accordance with its terms, amount to something which I can only describe as a breach of faith. A B C D

Furthermore, in my judgment the circular of Apr. 24, 1953, is open to some criticism in the respects which the Master of the Rolls has indicated. In effect, it told the holders of the first preference stock and second participating preference stock that, after all, the rights of adjustment of which so much had been heard in the past were entirely valueless. It tells them further: E

"The use of an adjustment scheme would only invoke long delay and expense, and in view of the foregoing it is hoped that the preference stockholders will accept the proposed repayment terms."

It tells holders of first preference stock that they are being informed "as a matter of courtesy and for information only", and that "they are not entitled to attend or vote at the extraordinary general meeting". It further states: F

"These proposals have been submitted to and discussed with the Association of Investment Trusts and the British Insurance Association Investment Protection Committee who are recommending their interested members to vote in favour of the resolutions to be proposed at the extraordinary general meeting and to take no part in promoting or supporting any proposal for an adjustment scheme." G

It appears to me that this circular, taken as a whole, is telling these two classes of preference stockholders that their rights in respect of adjustment are, after all, valueless, that there is nothing that they can do about it, that it is no use their proposing or supporting any proposal for adjustment, and that, in effect, they have no alternative but to accept the scheme. The second participating preference stockholders were entitled to vote, although their vote could not, on any view, have been effective. The first preference stockholders did not even have the satisfaction of being able to cast an ineffective vote. In my view, this last circular and the present reduction resolution, considered in the light of what had previously passed, involve a volte face of which these two classes of stockholders can legitimately complain as amounting to a breach of faith, and I H also think that, unwittingly, no doubt, the circular of Apr. 24, 1953, was couched in language calculated to stifle any question or criticism on the part of the two classes of preference stockholders. Counsel for the company contended that the result at which we have arrived bears hardly on the ordinary stockholders, for, he says, it means that they will be saddled, until nobody knows when, with two classes of high dividend preference stocks dividends in respect of which are not now being fully earned. I am not satisfied that the position is so difficult as counsel

- A would have us believe, for I see no reason why it should not be perfectly possible, while avoiding the disadvantage of paying high preferential dividends on substantial quantities of stock, to preserve the rights of those stockholders by the simple expedient of a scheme of reduction under which the capital paid up on their holdings would be reduced to a purely nominal sum, with a proviso preserving their rights in regard to adjustment as if none of the reductions so far
- B made had been made, thus carrying out to its logical conclusion the policy which was followed on the first two occasions. I will not take up more time in discussing the matter further, but will content myself by saying that for the reasons which SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has given, and those which I have endeavoured to add, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

- C MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. In his speech in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), LORD SIMONDS said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1077) that, important though the task is to see that the procedure by which a reduction is carried through is formally correct, the court has the further duty of satisfying itself that the scheme is fair and equitable between the different classes of shareholders. He went on to say that what is fair and equitable must depend on the circumstances of each case. It is conceded here that the procedure
- D of the reduction was not formally correct if there were special rights attached to the preference stocks. Class meetings were not held to comply with art. 6, and the first preference stockholders were not invited to attend the extraordinary general meeting of May 19, 1953. I am clearly of the opinion that the provisos to the special resolutions passed on Aug. 22, 1950, and Oct. 16, 1951, did give to the preference stockholders special rights. I am in full agreement with, and do
- E not repeat, the reasons which my Lords have expressed in support of that view. But, further, while no reflection on the good faith of anyone is implied, it seems to me that it would not be fair and equitable to sanction the proposed reduction, having regard to the terms of the two circulars of July 28, 1950, and Sept. 21, 1951. In my view, they contained a clear invitation to all concerned to act on
- F the basis that a right to take action under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, was being and would be preserved. It does not seem to me that it comes very happily from the company, or from the ordinary stockholders, at a later time to say that there had merely been an empty and valueless preservation, or, indeed, to seek to put the preference stockholders to proof that s. 25 could fruitfully be invoked.

- G Counsel for the company referred to a passage in VISCOUNT MAUGHAM'S speech in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (1), where he said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1074):

- H "On the other hand, I think that those who oppose the reduction by founding their argument on the provisions of s. 25 are bound to indicate how the section, or the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948, on any reasonable view of probability can operate in this case to give the preference shareholders any rights to share in the assets beyond those they now possess under the articles of association."

It seems to me that the position in the present case differs from the position in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (1). Here the preference stockholders are opposing the reduction by saying that all concerned were invited to act and to proceed on the basis that the company would not reduce by repaying the whole of the preference stockholders until the value, if any, of the claim under s. 25 could be ascertained. Counsel for the company also cited a passage from LORD SIMONDS' speech in Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (2). In reference to the facts of that case, LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 1099):

"It is, therefore, to put it at the lowest, so unlikely that the preference shareholders can get anything more than the full amount of their capital returned to them, that the court should not depart from its well-known and familiar practice in dealing with a petition to confirm a reduction of capital."

In the present case, in the circular of Apr. 24, 1953, there is set out the experience over the period of ten years before the vesting date of the first and second preference stockholders and of the ordinary stockholders. The figures having been set out, referable to the years and to the classes of members, the circular proceeded to say:

"Your directors and their professional advisers are therefore of the definite opinion that no monetary value can be attached to the first preference stock and second participating preference stock as to any right which may exist under s. 25 (1) of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946."

I can neither form nor express any sort of opinion with regard to a claim under s. 25, but it seems to me that the recital of the figures set out in the circular does not inevitably, as is rather suggested by the word "therefore", rule out all the prospects of any claim for adjustment that might be made.

R. v. MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Ex parte CORPORATION OF LONDON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), November 25, 26, December 15, 1953.]

Town and Country Planning—Purchase notice—"Owner" of land—Person entitled to receive rackrent—Grant by freeholders of long lease—Confirmation of purchase notice—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 19 (1), (2), s. 119 (1).

In 1873 freehold premises were leased for eighty years at a rent of £350 per annum. In 1922 a sub-lease of the premises was granted at £1.136 per annum. In 1925 the freeholders leased the premises to the sub-lessees for seventy-five years at a rent of £750 per annum, subject to, but with the benefit of, the lease of 1873. In 1940 the sub-lease of 1922 and the lease of 1925 were transferred to H. & Sons, Ltd. In 1942 H. & Sons, Ltd. acquired the residue of the lease of 1873. During the war of 1939-45, the premises were totally destroyed by enemy action. In 1950 H. & Sons, Ltd., applied to the Corporation of London, as the planning authority, for permission to develop the site by re-building the premises, and, on permission being refused, they served a purchase notice on the corporation under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 19 (1), requiring the corporation to purchase their leasehold interest in the site. The Minister confirmed this notice and the leasehold interest of H. & Sons, Ltd. was assigned to the corporation. In 1952 the freeholders applied to the corporation for permission to develop the site, and, on permission being refused, they appealed to the Minister under s. 16 (1) of the Act. The Minister disallowed the appeal, and the freeholders then served a purchase notice on the corporation under s. 19 (1) of the Act, requiring the corporation to purchase the fee simple. On Dec. 31, 1952, the Minister confirmed this notice. On an appeal by the freeholders from a decision of the Divisional Court quashing the order made by the Minister,

- A HELD: the freeholders were an "owner" of land for the purposes of s. 19 (1) of the Act of 1947, either because the context of s. 19 (1) required that meaning (so as to exclude the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) of that Act); or (per DENNING and ROMER, L.J.J.) because, in the circumstances of this case, the words "if [the land] were so let" in s. 119 (1) meant "if it had been so let", and, consequently, the freeholders were persons who would be entitled to receive the rackrent of the land if it "were" let at such a rent, and so were an "owner" as defined by s. 119 (1); and, therefore, the Minister had been right in confirming the purchase notice.

Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerslake ([1894] 2 Q.B. 774), considered.

Decision of the DIVISIONAL COURT ([1953] 2 All E.R. 80), reversed.

- B Quaere whether a rent negotiated as less than rackrent can, by change of circumstances, become a rackrent.

J. P. Ashworth for the Minister of Housing and Local Government.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15. The following judgments were read.

- G SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court quashing an order made by the Minister of Housing and Local Government. The applicants were the Corporation of London. The order of the Minister confirmed, or purported to confirm, a purchase notice served under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 19 (1), in respect of the fee simple in No. 69, Ludgate Hill. The present appellants, the owners of the fee simple, opposed the application. Section 19 deals with cases in which, as a result of a refusal of permission to develop, either absolute or conditional, land is incapable of reasonably beneficial use. In such cases it gives any owner the right to serve a purchase notice on the council of the county borough or district. If this is confirmed by the Minister, as here, the council are deemed to be authorised to acquire his interest in the land compulsorily.

The only question before us is whether the appellants, the freeholders of the premises, are "any owner" within the meaning of s. 19, the relevant parts of which I will now read:

"(1) Where permission to develop any land is refused, whether by the local planning authority or by the Minister, on an application in that behalf made under this Part of this Act, or is granted by that authority or by the Minister subject to conditions, then if any owner of the land claims—
 (a) that the land has become incapable of reasonably beneficial use in its existing state . . . he may, within the time and in the manner prescribed by regulations made under this Act, serve on the council of the county borough or county district in which the land is situated a notice (hereinafter referred to as a 'purchase notice') requiring that council to purchase his interest in the land in accordance with the provisions of this section. (2) Where a purchase notice is served on any council under this section, that council shall forthwith transmit a copy of the notice to the Minister, and subject to the following provisions of this section the Minister shall, if he is satisfied that the conditions specified in para. (a) to para. (c) of the foregoing sub-section are fulfilled, confirm the notice, and thereupon the council shall be deemed to be authorised to acquire the interest of the owner compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of Part IV of this Act, and to have served a notice to treat in respect thereof on such date as the Minister may direct . . ."

In 1873 the then freeholders leased the land to T. for eighty years at £350 per annum. This was, we were told, a ground lease. At some date before 1925, the present freeholders acquired the freehold reversion. In 1922, T. having died, T.'s trustees sub-let to W. at £1,136 a year for the remainder of the term less seven days. By a lease of June 23, 1925, between the freeholders and W., the sub-lessee, the premises were let for seventy-five years at £750 a year. This was said to be concurrent with and with the benefit of the original lease which at that date had some twenty-eight years to run. The result was that T.'s trustees paid £350 to their sub-lessee; W. got an extension of his lease and would pay £400 more during the period of the 1873 lease, that is, the sub-rent less £350 plus £750. After 1953 he would pay £750 only. The premises were completely destroyed by enemy action in May, 1941. W. had by this time assigned to Hamptons, who continued to pay the £750 rent. In April, 1942, Hamptons obtained an assignment from T.'s trustees of the original leasehold interest. Thereafter there were two parties only, the freeholders and Hamptons, the lease of 1873 being formally deleted from the register by the Land Registry in 1951. Under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 12, permission to develop has to be obtained from the planning authority—in this case the Corporation of London. On Feb. 9, 1950, Hamptons applied for such permission, the development being the re-building of the destroyed premises. On May 2 this was refused, the reason being that under the Corporation's plan for this area the site in question was to be part of a roundabout. Hamptons thereupon served a purchase notice, undated, which was forwarded to the Minister on Aug. 21, 1950. On Sept. 22 the Minister caused a letter to be written to the town clerk of which I will read the second paragraph:

"The Minister is satisfied that the land has become incapable of reasonably beneficial use in its existing state, and, having regard to the fact that it is situated within the boundaries of the City of London declaratory order, and is affected by proposals for the comprehensive re-development of the surrounding area of extensive war damage, including the provision of a roundabout at Ludgate Circus, he does not consider that he would be justified in reversing the Common Council's decision of May 2, 1950, whereby permission to re-build was refused, or in directing that permission should be granted for any other development."

The writer went on to say that, unless any of those entitled wished to be heard, he would confirm the notice, which he did on Nov. 9, 1951. The freeholders had no notice of these various steps. Hamptons' interest was ultimately purchased for £71,000. On Nov. 27, 1951, a notice of retention under the Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Act, 1939, s. 10, was served by Hamptons on the freeholders. The effect of such a notice under s. 10 is to relieve the tenant of rent and to impose on him a covenant to reinstate. It gives the landlord a right to claim

- A the rent in whole or in part if the tenant fails to reinstate when it is practicable for him to do so. The notice of retention was served, according to the evidence, on the procuration of the Corporation of London. The corporation are, as will be seen, using their statutory powers to make the fulfilment of the covenant illegal. Whether in these circumstances they can maintain the non-payability of rent is not before us. It would seem a remarkable contention. On Mar. 24, 1952, the freeholders asked for planning permission to erect a building similar to that destroyed. This was refused and the freeholders appealed to the Minister against this refusal and the appeal was dismissed. On Sept. 1, 1952, the freeholders served a purchase notice. The corporation, the respondents to this appeal, contended that the freeholders were not owners. The freeholders submitted to the Minister, but do not submit to us, that the Minister was not concerned with the question of ownership. The Minister, one imagines, gratefully accepted this submission and on that basis confirmed the notice.

If the freeholders are "any owner" within s. 19 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, then the confirmation stands. If, as the Divisional Court have held, they are not, it is a nullity. "Owner" is defined, unless the context otherwise requires, in s. 119 (1) of the Act:

- D " 'owner', in relation to any land, means, . . . a person other than a mortgagee not in possession, who, whether in his own right or as trustee or agent for any other person, is entitled to receive the rackrent of the land or, where the land is not let at a rackrent, would be so entitled if it were so let . . . "

- E Section 119 (1) also provides:

" 'land' means any corporeal hereditament, including a building as defined by this section, and in relation to the acquisition of land under Part IV of this Act includes any interest or right in or over land."

It was submitted to the Divisional Court and to this court that the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) does not apply to s. 19 (1) because the context otherwise requires. The Divisional Court held that it did apply, and, as I have said, quashed the Minister's order. The definition, or a definition on similar lines, is to be found in other Acts. It has come before the court before. Its obscurity and difficulty is always common ground between the parties inter se and the court. I will give an illustration. A. the freeholder lets to B. at a rent below the full value. B. may be an old servant or an impecunious friend. The lease is a quarterly one and there is no prohibition against sub-letting. In Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerslake (1), premises were let and sub-let at a rent below the rackrent. The sub-lessee was held to be the owner under a definition similar to that with which we are concerned. KENNEDY, J., said ([1894] 2 Q.B. 778):

- H "The words of the section in our judgment, in the case of there being no one who in fact receives a rackrent from the actual occupier, designate as 'owner' the person who 'rebus sic stantibus', that is to say, with the interests in the premises as they then are, would, if they were let to an occupier at a rackrent, receive that rackrent."

If that case is right, then in the case I have put B. is the owner and A. is not. The leases in the Truman case (1) were longer, but the decision was not based on this, and there is nothing in the definition to indicate that, if actual leases are to be regarded, their length is material. This case may well not be of general application, but it illustrates the difficulty of construing the definition. If, in the case I have put, there had been a prohibition against sub-letting, counsel for the Corporation of London admitted that on his construction of the definition there would be no owner. In Truman's case (1) the owner as defined was for the purpose of serving a notice of nuisance.

In Rawlence v. Croydon Corpn. (2), where the subject-matter was similar, Truman's case (1) was doubted. I am quite clear that if Truman's case (1) is right the definition cannot apply to s. 19 (1). If Truman's case (1) is wrong it must be on the basis that one does not ordinarily at any rate consider the de facto lease or chain of leases. In the instance put above, the landlord is the person who would be entitled to receive the rackrent if he had not chosen to let below it. One would, therefore, disregard actual leases, and in the case of ordinary leases there is no difficulty. It is, however, I think, clear that the definition is intended to bring in a ground lessee. The position there is different. The ground lessee has himself created the value, i.e., the house, which is the major ingredient in the rackrent. It is logical, therefore, that he should, for certain purposes at any rate, be treated as owner. He is often so described. Is it possible, however, so to read the definition as to disregard existing leases other than ground leases, but to have regard to ground leases? I think not. On this view, although the formula may be appropriate in certain contexts, I am clear that it is not appropriate for s. 19 (1). That section requires that "any owner" should include the person or persons the value of whose ownership is damaged by the sterilisation. This clearly covers the freehold reversioner, in this case the appellants, whose interest is plainly affected. It may, I think, also cover a ground lessee in certain cases—if, for example, the land was sterilised before the building had been erected. Fire or war damage might also cause him to be affected.

The case was put alternatively on the basis that the £750, whatever its nature in 1925, was now a rackrent, in that it represented the full value of the derelict and sterilised site. If this were right, the land would now be let at a rackrent and the freeholders would be owners under the early part of the definition. It was suggested this was inconsistent with Borthwick-Norton v. Collier (3). That case was concerned with a similar definition applicable to an owner as the person entitled to receive compensation for damage to land under requisition. The land had been let in 1934 for a sum held to be a rackrent at that date. When the compensation became payable in 1947, it had, it was said, ceased to be a rackrent owing to a change in value. HILBERY, J., had decided that the relevant date was the date when the lease was negotiated and that was affirmed by this court. It would be absurd if any rise in rental values turned a rackrent lessee into an owner. It is said that the converse follows and that a rent negotiated as below a rackrent cannot by change of circumstances or planning restrictions become a rackrent. I do not find it necessary to decide this point, so I will only say that I do not think the decision in Borthwick-Norton's case (3) is fatal to the argument. I look forward to the day when this definition may be replaced in the various Acts which contain it by some more intelligible formula. I would allow the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: On May 10, 1941, a building near Ludgate Circus was destroyed by the enemy. It was owned by the Jones' trustees who were the freeholders, but it was leased to Hamptons at £750 a year on a long lease expiring in 1999. (There were other interests subsisting in 1941, but they were got in by Hamptons in 1942 and are not now material.) Hamptons for many years did not give a notice of disclaimer or a notice of retention under the Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Act, 1939. They simply paid the £750 a year to the freeholders and relied on the provisions of the Act exempting them from any obligation to re-build. In 1950 Hamptons applied to the Corporation of London for permission to re-build. The corporation refused because they wanted to throw the site into the highway so as to make a roundabout at Ludgate Circus. There-upon Hamptons, under statutory authority, called on the corporation to buy their interest in the site. The corporation did so. They bought the remaining forty-seven years of Hamptons' lease for £71,250. This price was fixed on the hypothesis that the premises had been re-built, and, therefore, I presume on the basis that a rent of £750 a year was payable by Hamptons for their lease. (I cannot believe that the corporation would pay Hamptons on the hypothesis that the premises had been re-built without taking into account that a rent of £750 a year was payable for it when re-built.) But the singular thing is that shortly before the purchase was completed steps were taken by Hamptons to avoid payment of the £750. They did this at the instance of the corporation. They served a notice of retention on the freeholders which automatically suspended the rent of £750 a year until the premises were re-built. By serving this notice, Hamptons avoided payment of the rent, but they came under an obligation to re-build as soon as reasonably practicable. Once re-built, the rent would again become payable, but inasmuch as the corporation had decided never to allow any re-building on the site, it would never be reasonably practicable to re-build, and the rent would, it is said, never become payable again, though I am not so sure about this. Anyhow, it looks as if, by this notice of retention, Hamptons—and the corporation as their successors—may have evaded paying the rent of £750 a year for the rest of the term, and yet the corporation paid a price fixed on the footing that the rent was payable. The net result is that the corporation have bought from Hamptons on the footing that £750 a year was payable, but, nevertheless, they can turn round to the freeholders and say that £750 is not payable. The freeholders are unwilling to submit to this state of affairs, and one can hardly be surprised at it. They have countered by saying to the corporation: "You have bought out the interest of Hamptons. You must buy us out also. We also are owners and thus entitled by statute to insist on your purchasing our interest on the footing that the premises have been re-built, that is, on the footing that £750 a year is payable to us". The corporation say to them: "You are not entitled to insist on this because you are not owners within the meaning of the statute."

The rights of an owner in this respect are given by s. 19 of the Act of 1947, and the question is whether the freeholders are owners within that section. The fact that Hamptons are owners does not exclude the possibility of the freeholders being owners also, because that Act contemplates that there may be more than one "owner" of land at one and the same time. That is shown by the phrase "any owner" (not the owner) in s. 19 (1) and "a person" (not the person) in s. 119 (1). Section 119 (1) contains a definition of "owner" which is to be applied except so far as the context otherwise requires. I propose, therefore, to consider first whether the freeholders are owners within s. 119 (1). In some instances there is not much difficulty in applying the definition in s. 119 (1), for instance, when the land itself was originally let at a ground rent and subsequently buildings have been erected on it and the whole is let at a rackrent. The ground lessee is certainly an "owner", for he is a person who is entitled to receive the rackrent. So also when there is a series of leases and sub-leases of the building, each of which was let at a rackrent when it was negotiated. Each person who receives a rackrent would seem in that case to be an "owner". The difficulty arises when we come to cases where the land and buildings are let at more than a ground rent but less than a rackrent; and the difficulty arises from an ambiguity in s. 119 (1). The words "if it were so let" may mean either (i) "if it were to be so let", or (ii) "if it had been so let". I think that the words should be given either or both of those meanings according to the circumstances of the case. This can best be shown by some illustrations. Take, first, a case where a house is not let at all. The freeholder is certainly an "owner"; and the reason is because he comes within the first meaning. He is a person who would be entitled to the rackrent if it were to be let at a rackrent. Take next a case where there is no ground rent and a house is let by the freeholder, at less than a rackrent, on a short-term tenancy or a periodic tenancy. The freeholder is certainly then an "owner" and the reason is because he comes within the second meaning: he is a person who would have been entitled to the rackrent of the land if it had been in the past let at a rackrent. Thus, when a freeholder lets a house to a friend or a servant at less than a rackrent, he is an "owner" of it: see Rawlence v. Croydon Corpn. (2).

Take now the present case, and it will be found, I think, that both Hamptons and the freeholders are "owners". First, Hamptons. They had a lease with nearly fifty years to run and they were paying £750 a year to the freeholders. That was more than a ground rent, but less than a rackrent. If the premises in 1951 were to be let at a rackrent, they would be the persons entitled to it. They come within the first meaning and are "owners" accordingly. Next, the freeholders. They were not in 1952 receiving a rackrent, but that was only because the premises had not been let at a rackrent. The freeholders were the people who would have been entitled to the rackrent, if it had been let at a rackrent. They come within the second meaning and are "owners" accordingly. I do not see any reason why we should not give the words of s. 119 (1) this twofold meaning. In Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerlake (1), the court seems to have thought that the words "if it were so let" meant in all cases "if it were to be so let". That may have been the proper meaning to adopt in that case, but it is not so in this case. I think that the freeholders here were "owners" within s. 119 (1) and entitled accordingly. If the freeholders are, however, not owners within s. 119, then I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that the context of s. 19 "otherwise requires". It requires that the freeholders should be owners for the purposes of s. 19. The section is dealing with land which has been rendered, by executive action, for ever sterile. Parliament must have intended that the freeholders should have the right to insist on being bought out.

I agree, therefore, with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed and the order of the Minister upheld.

ROMER, L.J.: The question for our decision is whether the appellants, the freeholders, were "owners" of No. 69, Ludgate Hill, for the purposes of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 19, on Sept. 1, 1952, when they served on the city corporation a purchase notice under that section in respect of the said premises. The freeholders' position on that date was, as it still is, that they were the freeholders of the property subject to a lease which was and is vested in the corporation for a term which will expire on Sept. 29, 1999.

Before considering what the word "owner" in s. 19 means, it is convenient, I think, to consider whether it is referable to only one person in relation to any particular property or whether it may refer to more than one. In my opinion, the section contemplates that there may be more than one owner of land in respect of which development permission is refused. In the first place, the phrase in s. 19 (1) is "any owner" and not "the owner", which appears to me to be in itself almost decisive of the question. But in addition to this the section refers to "the interest in the land" of any owner who serves a purchase notice, and in s. 19 (2) to "the interest of the owner", language which seems to be indicative of the existence of other owners' interests as well. I think, therefore, that the existence of relevant interests other than that of the owner who serves a purchase notice is within the contemplation of the section. It is to be presumed, however, that such other interests are intended to remain unaffected by the service of such a notice, for only the person who serves it is to be notified of subsequent ministerial action. On the assumption, then, that there can be more than one "owner" of land who may be entitled to serve a purchase notice under the section, the next question to resolve is who can qualify under that description? The problem is, to my mind, an exceedingly difficult one, if only for the reason that according to ordinary conceptions there cannot be two different owners of the same property, unless one separates legal from beneficial interests, which there is no reason to suppose that the legislature had in mind.

- Before turning to the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) of the Act, it would be convenient to consider whether any light is thrown on the meaning of the word by other sections in the same Part of the Act. The corporation relied on the fact that in certain sections (for example, s. 21, s. 22, s. 23, s. 24, s. 26, s. 27, A s. 28, s. 29, s. 32 and s. 33) the word "owner" is coupled or contrasted with the occupier, other persons interested in the land, and (in some instances) other persons "affected". This difference in language was noted by the Divisional Court, and the corporation contends that it suggests, as a matter of reasonable inference, that the legislature in s. 19 was dealing with owners of land alone and not with persons who can claim to possess any kind of interest therein. It is B true, I think, that the difference in language does indicate that s. 19 was dealing with a narrower class of persons than that to which the other sections are directed, and that an occupier of land, for example, cannot serve a purchase notice under s. 19 (1) in his capacity as such. But the owner of land is none the less the owner because he occupies it himself and the only assistance that I derive from the difference of language in the sections is the negative guidance that a tenant or C other person interested in land (for example, a person who is entitled to a rent charge), cannot proceed under s. 19 (1) unless he is an "owner" of the land as well.

- The next question is whether the definition of "owner" in s. 119 (1) applies to the word as used in s. 19 (1) and (2). In considering this it is necessary, I think, to presume that either it applies universally to the section or it does not D apply at all, for it does not seem to me to be a tenable proposition that it should be held applicable to some ownerships of land in connection with the service of purchase notices, but not to others. If this be right, there is strong ground for the view that the context of s. 19 (1) "otherwise requires" so as to exclude the definition in s. 119 (1). I will give two examples to demonstrate its inapplicability. (i) A., the owner of land in fee simple, lets to B. for a term of three years E in consideration of a premium, but at a low rent. B. sub-lets to C. at a rackrent. If the definition applies, B., and not A., is the owner of the land even when only a week or two remain of the term. (ii) A., the owner as before, lets the land for twenty years to B. at less than a rackrent. B. sub-lets to C. for the residue of the head term less the last day at a rackrent and three more similar sub-leases subsequently follow, each at a rackrent. Under the definition, B., and each of F the other sub-lessors, are "owners", but A. is not; and the only interests in the sterilised land which the local planning authority could be compelled to purchase would be the nominal leasehold reversions. I cannot believe that the definition is applicable to such cases as these, and, if not, it is not, in my judgment, applicable to s. 19 (1) at all. It might be suggested, further, that the definition is only apt in cases where land is in the ownership of one person and not more, and that for G this reason also it is inapplicable to s. 19, which envisages land which has more than one owner. I do not, however, think on the whole that this view is right. It is true that the words "is entitled to receive the [not 'a'] rackrent" seem to indicate the payment and receipt of one rackrent and no more, but, on the other hand, it is "a person" and not "the person" who is in contemplation as receiving rackrent. In my opinion, accordingly, the definition cannot be regarded as ousted H from s. 19 by this consideration alone.

If, then, the definition which is furnished by s. 119 (1) is to be disregarded, it is necessary to ascertain from other sources the meaning which "owner" was intended to have in s. 19. On the views which I have already expressed, (i) there may be one or more "owners" of the same land, and (ii) an occupier, or a person having some other limited interest in the land, is not, as such, an owner for the purposes of s. 19; and, therefore, a tenant is not, merely by virtue of his tenancy, an owner. Apart from these guides to the legislature's intention in speaking of owners in the section, there is the further consideration that s. 19 is dealing with "sterilised" land. Taking these matters into account, it seems to me that, whoever may or may not be an owner in special circumstances, the person in whom land is vested for an estate in fee simple subject only to a lease is prima facie "an" owner of the land. He is, indeed, according to the ordinary signification of the term, "the" owner of the land, for, although a lessee is the owner of a legal interest in the land demised, namely, a term of years, he is not the owner of the land itself. There is nothing surprising in the owner of the freehold of land that has become sterilised being within the purview of the section, for in the general run of cases he is the person primarily affected by a refusal of permission to develop, and he is the only person affected in all cases in which he not only owns the land, but occupies it himself. It may be that in the early days, at all events, of a long lease the lessee is "an owner" of the land demised and entitled as such to serve a purchase notice; but even in such a case the freehold reversioner is still the owner of the land, and I can see no reason why he should be excluded from a provision which exactly describes him merely because the lessee is also given (on the suggested hypothesis) a similar status, and an equivalent right, himself. I am, therefore, of opinion that the freeholders, who were in fact the owners of No. 69, Ludgate Hill, on Sept. 1, 1952, were also "owners" for the purposes of s. 19 of the Act, and were entitled to serve their purchase notice accordingly.

I would add that I think the result would be the same even if one resorted to the definition of owner in s. 119. On the assumption that the land was not let at a rackrent on Sept. 1, 1952, the "owner" as defined by s. 119 (1) would be the person who would be entitled to receive the rackrent of the land if it were let at such a rent. The phrase "if it were so let", if taken by itself, appears to me to be at least as susceptible of meaning "if it had been so let" as "if it were to be so let". In Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co. v. Kerlake (1), the court adopted the latter construction, but I cannot accept that decision as deciding that it should be adopted in all cases, and I agree with the observations which my brethren have made on that decision in their judgments in the present case, and in Rawlence v. Croydon Corpn. (2). In any event, I am of opinion that, in their application to sterilise land, the words "if it were so let" can only reasonably mean "if it had been so let", for a future letting of such land at a rackrent (as ordinarily understood) would obviously be impracticable. If, on the other hand, the words do in fact mean "if it were to be so let" this would afford a further reason for rejecting the definition as being inapplicable to s. 19.

Having regard to the views which I have indicated it is not necessary to arrive at any definite conclusion on the alternative argument of counsel for the freeholders to the effect that the property in question was in fact let at a rackrent on the relevant date. I concur, however, in the views which my Lord has expressed on it. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

HAWKINS v. COULSDON AND PURLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), November 26, 27, 30, December 1, 2, 17, 1953.]

Licensee—Negligence—Knowledge by licensor of facts constituting danger—Reasonable appreciation of risk—Accident in dark—Risk not obvious to licensee—Defective steps of requisitioned house—Liability of requisitioning authority.

A

On Oct. 5, 1951, the plaintiff, after visiting an occupier of part of a house which had been requisitioned since 1946 by the defendants, fell and broke her leg while descending the steps from the front door after dark. One of the steps was broken, a fact of which the defendants had knowledge, and the court found that a reasonable man, having that knowledge, would have appreciated the resultant danger. The danger was not obvious to the plaintiff.

B

HELD: if a licensor had actual knowledge of the physical condition of his property and a reasonable man would have realised that it was a danger, the licensor was under a duty to use reasonable care to prevent damage from the danger unless it was obvious, and he could not escape liability by showing that he himself did not appreciate the risk involved; the plaintiff had discharged the burden of proof which was on her, and, therefore, she was entitled to damages against the defendants.

C

Per DENNING and ROMER, L.JJ.: When leaving the house in the dark, the plaintiff was entitled to assume that the steps were suitable for the purpose for which they were provided, and, therefore, the fact that the accident occurred during the hours of darkness was irrelevant.

D

Per DENNING, L.J.: The defendants, being an urban district council, were, of course, not the householder and could not be on the spot to warn visitors of the danger, but that does not rid them of their responsibility. It only means that, being unable to warn, they ought to have mended the step. They cannot shift their responsibility on to the occupants of the house for the simple reason that they retained the possession and control and are responsible in law. They cannot get rid of their responsibility by the plea that they are only a requisitioning authority. They ought to do whatever a reasonable man in their position would do, and that is, mend the step.

Per ROMER, L.J.: It is, in my judgment, open to this court to apply the objective test and to hold that, provided that actual knowledge of the source of a danger is brought home to a licensor, it is sufficient then, in order to fix him with liability, to show that a reasonable man would have appreciated the dangerous quality of that source, whether or not the licensor appreciated it himself. The objective test is, I think, preferable for at least two reasons. First, it dispenses with the need of inquiring whether in any given case a licensor did, in fact, know of the potentiality of danger—an inquiry which involves research into both the conscious and the sub-conscious mind. I say this because a man may well be said to "know" something that he has been told, even although he has forgotten it—for example, that an accident of a particular kind had happened on his property before it passed into his ownership. Secondly, the subjective test unduly favours the thoughtless or stupid man and puts an unwarrantable premium on carelessness.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of PEARSON, J., dated June 4, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 364.

A In August, 1946, a house, 2, Valley Road, Kenley, Surrey, belonging to a Mrs. Reddish, was requisitioned by the defendants, the urban district council of Coulsdon and Purley, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, for housing persons who were inadequately housed, a schedule of condition being prepared by an independent architect on behalf of the defendants, and signed by the defendants' surveyor and by Mrs. Reddish as owner. The schedule referred, inter alia, to the fact that the three stone steps of the front porch were worn and that one of them was broken at the corner. Between 1946 and 1951 the house was re-decorated and minor alterations and repairs were carried out in accordance with standards of repair laid down by the Ministry of Health, but nothing was done to the steps. No complaints were made to the defendants by the occupiers of the house about the condition of the steps. On Oct. 1, 1951, although the property was still requisitioned, the defendants allowed Mrs. Reddish to enter into occupation of the upper floor of the house. On the evening of Oct. 5, 1951, the plaintiff, Mrs. Hawkins, came to visit Mrs. Reddish. She had visited the house before the war, but not since the conclusion of hostilities. She left the house at about 8 p.m., when it was dark. As she was coming down the steps from the front door, she put her foot on the broken step which gave way beneath her and she fell and broke her leg. On the pavement outside the house there was a street lamp, but between the lamp and the front door there was a fir tree and on the night in question it was very dark and misty so that the lamp was not effectively lighting the doorway.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants, contending that by virtue of the requisition they were in occupation and/or control of the porchway steps and approaches to the house; that she used them on the evening in question as the defendants' licensee, being on a visit to the person occupying the upper floor of the house under an agreement with the defendants; that the defendants owed her a duty to take reasonable care to prevent her from suffering damage on the occasion of that visit from any hidden danger or trap in the porchway, steps or approaches of which they were aware; that the porchway and/or steps and/or approaches constituted at all material times a hidden danger or trap; that, as the defendants knew, they were unlit, the surface was worn, and a large portion of the lowermost step had been previously broken off and was missing; and in breach of their duty, and/or negligently, the defendants had failed to take reasonable care to prevent injury to persons using the steps. The defendants denied the allegations and contended that the plaintiff used the steps with full knowledge of their condition, and/or without keeping a proper look-out, and/or without due care for her own safety.

H PEARSON, J., finding that the defect was not obvious to the plaintiff and was not reasonably to be expected by her, held that a licensee moving in the dark did not in all cases take the risk of any danger which in daylight would be obvious. He held further that to entitle the plaintiff to succeed it was enough for her to show that the defendants knew the facts constituting the danger; that a reasonable man, having that knowledge, would have appreciated the risk involved; and that she need not show that the defendants, in fact, appreciated that risk. Holding that the plaintiff had discharged the burden which was on her, he gave judgment in her favour.

F. Whitworth for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: The plaintiff was a licensee of the defendants, and to succeed she must establish a breach of the duty owed by a licensor to a licensee. Without begging the question of law which arises, the duty of a licensor is to warn licensees of any unusual or concealed danger of which he knows and which would not be obvious to a reasonably careful person. Apart from that, the licensee takes the premises as he finds them. There are, no doubt, cases in which a licensee in the dark will be presumed to be aware of what can be seen by daylight. In other cases, as here, a licensor must contemplate that those whom he is impliedly licensing, e.g., callers on the occupants of No. 2, Valley Road, may come and go in darkness. [His LORDSHIP mentioned the illumination provided by the street light and continued:] The learned judge found that the defect in the stone was a concealed danger to the plaintiff and that she was not careless of her own safety. I will set out three of his findings in paras. (h), (i) and (j) of the judgment ([1953] 2 All E.R. 367):

“(h) The physical facts constituting the danger, namely, the badly broken step and the deficiency of light, were known to the defendants through their officers concerned with the condition of the requisitioned property. (i) A reasonable man, having the defendants’ knowledge of the physical facts, would have appreciated the risk involved. (j) It was not proved, and I do not consider there are sufficient grounds for inferring, that the defendants appreciated the risk involved. If they had, they would, presumably, have incurred the small expense necessary to remove the danger by cementing in the broken pieces.”

The learned judge in earlier findings [paras. (e) and (g)] speaks of the “concealed danger”, but I think in those passages he is using the word “danger” to express the fact that the defective step caused the accident. It proved to be a danger, but would not be a danger within this branch of the law unless a reasonable man, seeing the physical state of the step, would have appreciated the risk. It is at this stage of the argument that I have had the greatest difficulty. The defendants employed a repairing surveyor who had seen the premises, and their rent collector called regularly. There is evidence that complaints made by the occupants were attended to, and no complaint had been made of this defective step as dangerous. It would only have cost a small sum to repair. To take words from LORD MACNAGHTEN’S speech in Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (1) ([1909] A.C. 234), does not the learned judge’s finding involve that all these people were without common sense and ordinary intelligence? In other words, may he not have applied a higher standard than that of the reasonable man in deciding that there was a concealed danger at all? On the other hand, it may be that in the special circumstances affecting this house each side may, to some extent, have relied on the other. The defendants, in minor matters of this kind, may have left it to the occupants to complain. The occupants may have felt it was for the local authority to do what was necessary and proper to the premises. A better test, perhaps, is to consider a host showing off a guest who had arrived, as the plaintiff did, at dusk and who was leaving in the dark. Having seen photographs, I think that the reasonably careful host would have given a warning that that end of the step was broken, and this may be sufficient to support the finding. I would, however, like to express a warning as to the danger of endowing the reasonably careful man with attributes which properly belong to a person of exceptional perspicuity and foresight.

That being so, the main question of law which was argued before us arises: Can the defendants escape liability by not appreciating the risk involved although a reasonable man would have done so? In the ordinary case of concealed dangers or traps, the danger is obvious to anyone who knows of the physical conditions—who has seen the trap—and the point cannot arise. There is, however, a borderland in which, for one reason or other, a defendant may be able to satisfy the court that his common sense and intelligence quoad this particular matter is below the average. The alternative tests have been described as subjective and objective, and the terminology is convenient. The learned judge proceeded on the basis that WILLES, J., in his well-known judgment in Gautret v. Egerton, Jones v. Egerton (2), was saying that the subjective test must in all cases be

A applied. This was the basis of the argument of counsel for the defendants, but I do not accept it. Counsel rightly relied on the statement in the judgment of WILLES, J. (L.R. 2 C.P. 375) that there must be “something like fraud on the part of the giver”. This occurs in that part of the judgment where WILLES, J., is finding an analogy in the law as to gifts. In the same passage he says that the giver must know the gift’s “evil character at the time” and fail to caution the donee. Later he says (ibid.):

B “Every man is bound not wilfully to deceive others, or do any act which may place them in danger.”

In the ordinary case where danger exists there would, of course, have been something like fraud and wilful deception. The question is whether in the borderland in which the present argument moves WILLES, J., is intending to lay down the subjective test. I find in the judgment indications that he had in mind the objective test. This can, I think, be gathered from the words (ibid.) “or do any act which may place them in danger”. That was, I think, the view of those words taken by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R. (11 Q.B.D. 514), in Heaven v. Pender (3). WILLES, J., just after the passage which I have quoted, refers to Corby v. Hill (4). In that case the plaintiff was a licensee, the defendant being, not the occupier, but there by permission of the occupier. The defendant had placed materials on the ground which caused the accident. Both COCKBURN, C.J., and WILLES, J., deal with the matter on the assumption that the obstruction had been placed there by the owner or occupier. COCKBURN, C.J., says (4 C.B.N.S. 563) that

E “. . . it was not competent to them to place thereon any obstruction calculated to render the road unsafe, and likely to cause injury . . .”

WILLES, J., in his judgment clearly applies the objective test as against the defendant. He states (ibid., 567) the form of declaration which he would have drawn in which he uses the words “likely to prove dangerous to persons driving along the road”. As I read it, he would have applied the same test if the F obstruction had been placed there by the owner.

On the assumption that I am wrong in the view which I take of the judgment of WILLES, J., I agree with PEARSON, J., that the decisions to which he refers in the House of Lords dealing with accidents to children [viz., Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (1); Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor (5), R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (6)] are authorities for applying the objective test

G in this case. Counsel for the defendants sought to distinguish those cases on the ground that they dealt with accidents to young children and had, indeed, been said to be in a class apart. They are, of course, in one sense in a class apart in that, for example, no adult who chose to play with a turntable would be able to recover damages if he injured himself. I agree with what the learned judge says in the following sentences ([1953] 2 All E.R. 371) and do not find it necessary

H to examine these cases in detail:

“It thus appears that in the case of a child licensee the ‘objective test’ is to be applied in deciding whether the licensor had knowledge of the danger. Is there any reason for applying a different test in the case of an adult licensee? There are possible differences between a child licensee and an adult licensee with regard to the inference of leave and licence, the existence of a trap, and the sufficiency of the warning. But I cannot see any reason why any different test should be applied in deciding whether the licensor had knowledge of the danger. Moreover, there is at least some indication of the 'objective test' applying to the case of an adult licensee in the passage which I have already cited from LORD SUMNER's speech in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (7), containing the words ([1923] A.C. 274): 'As usual in cases of duties of care, the reasonable man is the standard on both sides. The licensor must act with reasonable diligence to prevent his premises from misleading or entrapping a licensee, who on his side uses reasonable judgment and conduct under circumstances that can be reasonably foreseen'."

As I have already said, in most cases the risk is obvious to anyone who sees the place, and the two tests coincide. Undoubtedly, knowledge at any rate of the state of affairs was the basis and this explains the use of words appropriate to the subjective test. For example, counsel for the defendants relied on the way in which BUCKLEY, L.J., dealt with the matter in Lowery v. Walker (8) ([1910] 1 K.B. 190). In that case the danger was a vicious horse, and there was a finding of fact of the county court judge that the defendant knew that the horse was dangerous. Counsel further relied on words used in Coates v. Rautenstall Borough Council (9), Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (10), and Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (11). In those cases a somewhat different problem arose. For example, in Ellis's case (10) the plaintiff, a small boy, was cut by broken glass while paddling. The defendant, the local authority, did not know of the existence of the actual piece of glass which caused the injury, but, knowing of the possibility of its presence, they were found to have that actual knowledge of the danger which fixes the licensor with liability. That seems to me a different point, and in Pearson's case (11), ASQUITH, L.J., referred to the issue which has arisen in this case, but found it unnecessary to decide it. It was not suggested that there was any case which had turned on the applicability of the subjective as against the objective test in the circumstances as set out in the learned judge's judgment. In so far as the matter is to be considered apart from authority, I have no hesitation in adopting the objective test. There is no difficulty in a principle based on a defendant's knowledge of facts as, for example, in fraud. On the other hand, I can see difficulty as to the meaning of the formula "recognising the risk". How great a risk would have to be recognised? I can foresee possibilities of the reasonable man who had been expelled by one door returning in a somewhat different guise by another. For those reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: It is sometimes said that the duty of an occupier to a licensee is only to warn of dangers actually known to the occupier, whereas his duty to an invitee is to warn him, not only of dangers of which the occupier actually knows, but also of those of which he ought to know. This distinction is supposed to be found in the judgment of WILLES, J., in Gautret v. Egerton (2), as contrasted with his judgment in Indermaur v. Dames (12), but I do not believe the distinction is well founded. Take, first, the case where a licensee is injured by the negligent conduct of the occupier or his servants in the course of things which they are doing on the land. Suppose, for instance, that a sightseer is allowed into a private works and, whilst there, he is injured by the negligent driving of a vehicle or the negligent operation of a crane. He clearly has a cause of action today, but he would not have had one twenty years ago. The reason is because he would in the old days have been defeated by the doctrine of common employment, which, strangely enough, was applied, not only to servants, but also to licensees: Southeate v. Stanley (13); and volunteers: Degg v. Midland Ry. Co. (14). In the nineteenth century it was the fashion to put licensees and volunteers into the same category as servants and to hold that they had agreed to accept the risk of negligence on the part of the servants of the occupier. As recently as 1929 it was stated in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. 1, p. 863, [in the notes to Indermaur v. Dames (12)] that a licensee cannot sue for

"supervening negligent conduct on the part of the servants of the owner of the premises; for danger of injury from such negligence may be considered as bargained for and the risk thereof accepted by the licensee . . ."

A In 1948, however, the doctrine of common employment was abolished [by the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948], and with it must go this peculiar off-shoot in regard to licensees and volunteers. It is impossible to suppose that a licensee, any more than a servant, agrees to accept the risk of negligence. He can always sue for negligence in the course of things being done on the land. His disability, if any, is confined to the static condition of the premises, i.e., to dangers which have been there for some time: see Dunske v. Abbott (15).

B Let us consider, however, this question of the static condition of the premises. It is said that the licensee must take the premises as he finds them, but this is far from being correct. Take the case where a licensee is injured by the dangerous condition of the premises, a static condition, if you please, but the danger is due to a negligent act of commission, i.e., something done by the occupier or his servants on the land. Suppose, for instance, that the occupier negligently places
C a pile of slates on his private road in such a manner as to be likely to prove dangerous to persons driving along the road, and a visitor at night time drives into them and is injured. There is high authority for saying that the occupier is liable. It is not necessary for the injured person to show that the occupier actually knew the slates were dangerous, but only that he knew that people were likely to pass along the road. Once he has that knowledge he is liable for D his negligence in placing the slates there. In other words, he is liable for a state of affairs created by him—by an act of commission—which he knew or ought to have known was a danger. That appears distinctly from Corby v. Hill (4), decided in 1858, and, particularly, from the form of declaration suggested by WILLES, J. (4 C.B.N.S. 567), as paraphrased and explained by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R. (11 Q.B.D. 512), in his famous judgment in Heaven v. Pender (3),
E which was approved by the House of Lords in M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson (16). It is in Corby v. Hill (4) that we first find mention of a "trap". WILLES, J., said (4 C.B.N.S. 567): "The defendant had no right to set a trap for the plaintiff", meaning thereby simply that the defendant was not, by an act of commission, negligently to create a danger even for a licensee. SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., took the matter up in Heaven v. Pender (3). He said
F (11 Q.B.D. 509):

"To lay a trap means in ordinary language to do something with an intention. Yet it is clear that the duty extends to a danger the result of negligence without intention."

G Before leaving Corby v. Hill (4), it should be noted that COCKBURN, C.J., emphasised (4 C.B.N.S. 562) that the act complained of was an act of commission.

Turn now to acts of omission. Take a case where a licensee is injured by the dangerous condition of the premises, but the danger is due to a negligent act of omission by the occupier or his servants, such as a failure to repair or to light or to warn. Nearly one hundred years ago, when the point first arose for decision, the law said that the licensee was in the same position as a servant and could not
H sue at all. It was assumed without question that a servant could not sue for defects in the premises or plant. Hence a licensee could not sue. Thus in Southcote v. Stanley (13), which was decided in 1856, when a visitor was leaving a house, a piece of glass fell out of the door and injured him. It was due to a negligent omission by the occupier to inspect or repair. It was not an act of commission, as BRAMWELL, B., was careful to point out, but an act of omission. The court dismissed the claim on the ground that, as a servant could not sue for the defect, so a visitor could not. POLLOCK, C.B., said (1 H. & N. 250) that a visitor

“ . . . is in the same position as any other member of the establishment, so far as regards the negligence of the master or his servants, and he must take his chance with the rest.”

I need hardly say that that is not the law of master and servant today. A master must now take reasonable care to see that his plant and premises are safe for his servants. Within the short space of ten years, however, the courts, under the guidance of WILLES, J., abandoned the analogy of a servant and adopted the analogy of a gift. The reason is not far to seek. During those ten years the courts of this country had for the first time to consider the question of gifts of chattels which turned out to be defective, and it was said in Blakemore v. Bristol & Exeter Ry. Co. (17), which was decided in 1858, and in MacCarthy v. Young (18), decided in 1861, that a gratuitous giver or lender of a chattel is liable for its defective state if he actually knows of the defect, but not otherwise. Drawing on that analogy and applying it to acts of omission, WILLES, J., held that the occupier of premises was liable to a licensee if he actually knew of the danger and failed to give warning of it, but that, if the occupier did not actually know of the danger, he was not liable. Thus, in Gautret v. Egerton (2), the plaintiff was crossing a bridge in some dock premises when he fell into a cutting and was drowned. The complaint against the owners was for a negligent act of omission. The claim was dismissed. WILLES, J., said (L.R. 2 C.P. 375):

“ . . . a permission to use the way must be taken to be in the character of a gift. The principle of law as to gifts is, that the giver is not responsible for damage resulting from the insecurity of the thing, unless he knew its evil character at the time, and omitted to caution the donee.”

But WILLES, J., made it clear that the occupiers would be liable for a negligent act of commission. He quoted Corby v. Hill (4) and said that every man is bound not to do any act which may put others in danger.

It is as well to pause at this point and consider this analogy of a gift, for you will find that, just as the law of master and servant has changed in the last hundred years, so has the law of gifts. The decision of the House of Lords in Donoghue v. Stevenson (16) makes the earlier cases on gifts quite out of date. There can be little doubt that Blakemore v. Bristol & Exeter Ry. Co. (17) and MacCarthy v. Young (18), on which WILLES, J., relied, would be decided differently today. Let me give some modern instances. Suppose that the manufacturer of a special soap sends out samples by way of gift to members of the public, and owing to negligence in manufacture a user of the soap suffers from dermatitis. Surely there is a cause of action, even though the manufacturer did not actually know of its evil character at the time. Again, supposing that hospital authorities treat a patient negligently, they are liable, even though they give their services gratuitously. If they give him food which through their carelessness has been mixed with some injurious ingredient, are they not also liable even though they did not know of its injurious character? There is no difference in principle between such a case and the case where the driver of a car gives a friend a lift. I propose, therefore, to put the law of gifts on one side and to consider simply the law about licensees, and as to them I would suggest that there is no longer any valid distinction to be drawn between acts of commission and acts of omission. It always was an illogical distinction. Many acts of commission can be regarded as acts of omission and vice versa. It all depends on how you look at them. Thus, in Corby v. Hill (4), the negligent act was regarded as one of commission in placing slates on the road, but it might just as well have been regarded as an act of omission in failing to give warning of them at night by means of a red lamp. That is, indeed, how SCRUTTON, L.J., regarded it in Kimber v. Gas Light & Coke Co. (19). It seems to me that the real significance of an act of commission is that it means that the occupier must have actual knowledge of the state of affairs he has created. Taking that significant feature and applying it to an act of omission, you will find that liability depends on whether the occupier has actual knowledge of the state of affairs existing on the land, no matter whether he himself or someone else created it. Once he has that knowledge, then if he knows or ought to know that it is a danger, he is under a duty to use reasonable care to prevent damage from that

- A I realise that this means a departure from the principle stated by WILLES, J., in Gautret v. Egerton (2), but it is not a departure from the decision itself. The decision can be explained on the footing that the danger was obvious and known to the man who fell into the cutting. At any rate, the declaration did not assert that the danger was unknown to him, and that was a fatal flaw in it. WILLES, J., himself made that plain (L.R. 2 C.P. 373, 374). So did SIR B BALIOL BRETT, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender (3) (11 Q.B.D. 514) and LORD SUMNER in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (20) ([1923] A.C. 94). A licensee can never complain of dangers which are obvious or known to him.

In support of this departure from Gautret v. Egerton (2) I would point out that during the last fifty years there have been many cases which show that no distinction is now to be drawn between acts of commission and acts of omission.

- C In the first place there are the cases about children who have been allowed to come on to the land and have meddled with things there. They are licensees. The question in such cases is whether the occupier has actual knowledge of the state of affairs existing on the land and the tendency of children to meddle. Once he has that knowledge, then if he knows or ought to know that it is a danger, or will be a danger if they meddle, he is under a duty to use reasonable care to prevent damage from that danger, and this is so whether it arises from an act of omission or commission. That is, I think, fully established by Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (1) (failure to lock a turntable), and many cases in this court down to Pearson v. Lambeth Borough Council (11) (failure to padlock a grille). In each case the acts complained of were acts of omission. In the words of ASQUITH, L.J., ([1950] 1 All E.R. 687)

- E “ . . . a simple precaution was omitted which would have thwarted or rendered innocuous the possible action of third persons.”

The occupier negligently failed to take that precaution and was held liable. I do not think that there is any difference between a child licensee and an adult licensee except that a child will meddle where an adult will not, and this fact must

- F be taken into account in deciding whether the occupier has been negligent. In the second place there is the decision of the House of Lords in Fairman's case (20). The complaint there was of an act of omission. The stairs leading to some flats were worn away. The landlord had a caretaker living there who knew of this state of affairs. The landlord failed to repair the stairs and Miss Fairman, who was a lodger in one of the flats, was injured. The House of Lords held that she was a licensee and that the landlord was under an obligation not to lay a trap for her. They held that there was, in fact, no trap because Miss Fairman had lived in the flats a long time and the danger was obvious to her, but two of their Lordships went on to define what was meant by the obligation “not to lay a trap”. LORD ATKINSON said ([1923] A.C. 86) that the landlord was

- G “ . . . bound not to expose her, without warning, to a hidden peril, of the existence of which he knew, or ought to have known.”

H LORD WRENBURY used words to the like effect (ibid., 96). So did LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in Addie v. Dumbreck (6) ([1929] A.C. 365). It has sometimes been said, that those observations, by introducing the phrase “ought to have known”, were made per incuriam, but an explanation has been put forward which has been described by LORD GREENE, M.R., as “very attractive”: see Baker v. Bethnal Green Corpn. (21) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 140). It is this. If the occupier actually knows the physical condition of the premises, and a reasonable man would have realised that it was a danger, the occupier must be taken in law to have knowledge of the danger, because he ought to have realised it too. He ought to know what a reasonable man would know. I think that explanation is correct. It must be remembered that in Fairman's case (20) the landlord through his caretaker actually knew of the condition of the stairs but did not realise they were a danger. When the statements of their lordships are read against that background, it becomes clear that what they mean is this. Once an occupier has actual knowledge of the state of affairs existing on his land, then if he knows or ought to know it is a danger he is under a duty to warn a visitor of it unless, of course, the danger is obvious. A

Thus far I have considered only the authorities, but when we come to consider the matter on principle it is clear that there should be no difference between an act of commission and an act of omission. If an occupier actually knows of a state of affairs on his land which a reasonable man would realise was a danger, he should not be allowed to escape from his responsibilities on the plea that he was not a reasonable man and did not realise it. I ought to add that when I speak of the "actual knowledge" of the occupier of the existing state of affairs, I include also his presumed knowledge of it. As VISCOUNT MAUGHAM said ([1940] 3 All E.R. 353) in Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (22): B

"An absentee owner, or an occupier oblivious of what is happening under his eyes, is in no better position than the man who looks after his property" C

That was, it is true, a nuisance case, but in this respect nuisance is an identical twin with negligence. Thus, in Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council (10), there was broken glass in the paddling pool. The council did not actually know that the piece of glass was there. They hoped it had all been raked out, but owing to their negligence the rake was ineffective. They could not rely on their own negligence to excuse their want of knowledge. Therefore, knowledge was imputed to them. Similarly, if an occupier has once known of the state of affairs, but has temporarily forgotten it, his forgetfulness would not avail him. Counsel for the defendants said that if we affirm the judge's view of the law—as we do—there will be little difference left between an invitee and a licensee. I think that there is some truth in this, but it is not a matter for regret. It has all come about because the obligation to a licensee—commonly expressed in the phrase "not to lay a trap"—has now been interpreted so as to impose a liability for unusual danger due to the negligence of the occupier whether by an act of commission or omission. Meanwhile, the obligation to an invitee has been expressed in almost identical terms—a duty to use reasonable care to protect the invitee against "traps": see Hayward v. Drury Lane Theatre, Ltd. & Moss' Empires, Ltd. (23). per SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1917] 2 K.B. 914), that is, against unusual dangers which are not obvious or known to the invitee: see London Graving Dock Co., Ltd. v. Horton (24). LORD SUMNER himself anticipated this confluence when he said ([1923] A.C. 92), in Fairman's case (20), where a visitor was lawfully using a recognised way: D

"... it makes no difference to the liability whether she was the defendants' licensee or their invitee. Under the present circumstances the obligation was only not to lay a trap for her, and none was laid." E

In the result, it seems to me that nowadays, in the case of an unusual danger which is not obvious or known to the visitor, it can fairly be said that the occupier owes a duty to every person lawfully on the premises to take reasonable care to prevent damage. The duty is not to invitees as a class, nor to licensees as a class, but to the very person himself who is lawfully there. What is reasonable care in regard to him depends on all the circumstances of the case. The relevant considerations include all those facts which could affect the conduct of a reasonable H man and his decision on the precautions to be taken: see Paris v. Stepney Borough Council (25), per LORD NORMAND ([1951] 1 All E.R. 48). Much depends, therefore, on the nature of the land, such as whether it is waste land or a private road. Much, too, depends on the position and nature of the danger, such as whether it is an alluring turntable or a heap of stones. Much depends on the knowledge or means of knowledge of the occupier, the age of the visitor, and so forth: see Gough v. National Coal Board (26), per SINGLETON, L.J. ([1953] 2 All E.R. 1289). The circumstances vary so infinitely that no specific rules can be laid down. But there is one point I must mention. In Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (27), HAMILTON, L.J., said of licensees ([1913] 1 K.B. 411):

"In darkness where they cannot see whether there is danger or not, if they will walk they walk at their peril."

Again, in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (7), LORD SUMNER said of a licensee ([1923] A.C. 274):

"If he will walk blindfold, he walks at his peril, even though he is blindfolded by the action of the elements."

That may be generally true of waste land or open ground, but it is not, I think, true of roads, footpaths and steps. People who lawfully use a recognised way, whether as invitees or licensees, are entitled to be warned of any unusual danger which is not obvious or known to them, but of which the occupier knows or ought to know: see Fairman's case (20), per LORD ATKINSON and LORD WRENBURY ([1923] A.C. 86, 96).

This brings me at last to the facts of the case. This broken step was, I think, an unusual danger which was unknown to the plaintiff. It was not obvious in the dark. The danger was not, in fact, known to the defendants, but they ought to have known of it. They knew that the step was broken, and a reasonable man in their place would have realised that it was a danger. They were, therefore, under a duty to her to use reasonable care to prevent damage from it. The question is: Did they use reasonable care? Test the position by supposing that the defendants in this case, instead of being a council, had been a householder occupying this house. Would he have mended the step? I am not sure that he would have done so. But I am quite sure that, if he had invited a lady guest to the house and was seeing her out at night, he would have warned her about the broken step and told her to keep to the safe side of it. The defendants, being an urban district council, were, of course, not the householder and could not be on the spot to warn visitors of the danger, but that does not rid them of their responsibility. It only means that, being unable to warn, they ought to have mended the step. They cannot shift their responsibility on to the occupants of the house for the simple reason that they retained the possession and control and are responsible in law. They cannot get rid of their responsibility by the plea that they are only a requisitioning authority. They ought to do whatever a reasonable man in their position would do, and that is, mend the step. It seems to me, therefore, that the defendants did not use reasonable care. At any rate, it is a case where we ought not to interfere with the view of the trial judge unless we were clearly of opinion that he was wrong, and I am certainly not prepared to say that. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: PEARSON, J., in his helpful review of the authorities, said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 369):

"WILLES, J., in his judgment in Gautret v. Egerton. Jones v. Egerton (2) and also in the earlier judgment delivered by him on behalf of the court in Indermaur v. Dames (12) was plainly using 'the subjective test' and considered that it was necessary to apply 'the subjective test'."

In this I agree with the learned judge, and, having regard to the language in which WILLES, J., in each of those two cases, applied to licensees what he conceived to be the law relating to gifts, I find it difficult to arrive at any other conclusion. It appears to me, further, that this subjective approach receives support from decisions that are far more recent. For example, in Hayward v. Drury Lane Theatre, Ltd. & Moss' Empires, Ltd. (23), SCRUTTON, L.J. said ([1917] 2 K.B. 913):

"A bare or mere licensee, one who has no common interest with the owner of the premises but is there by the owner's permission, takes the premises as he finds them, with all their dangers and traps, a trap being a danger which a person who does not know the premises could not avoid by reasonable care and skill. The owner is under no liability as to existing traps unless he intentionally sets them for the licensee, but must not create new traps without taking precautions to protect licensees against them."

These observations were not only approved but accepted as a guide by ATKIN, L.J. ([1928] 1 K.B. 792) in Coleshill v. Manchester Corpn. (28). It is not easy to perceive how a licensor can "intentionally" set a trap for a licensee if he does not know that the state of affairs which he has brought about, or which exists, is dangerous. Intention can only derive from what the licensor himself knows, not from what a wiser or more thoughtful man than he would know. As against these considerations it is, I think, true that in Heaven v. Pender (3) SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., approached the relationship of licensor and licensee from an objective angle with regard to potentiality of injury, as also did WILLES, J., himself in Corby v. Hill (4). Further, the objective test has, undoubtedly, been applied by the House of Lords in the "children cases" from at least Cooke's case (1) onwards, and in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Procter (7), in which the licensee was an adult, LORD SUMNER said ([1923] A.C. 274), with reference to licensors and licensees generally:

"As usual in cases of duties of care, the reasonable man is the standard on both sides."

Finally, there are the much discussed observations of LORD ATKINSON in Fairman's case (20) ([1923] A.C. 86, 89), of LORD WRENBURY in the same case (ibid., 96), and of LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (6) ([1929] A.C. 365).

In these circumstances, and in the welter of other authority which was brought to our attention during the argument, it is, in my judgment, open to this court to apply the objective test and to hold that, provided that actual knowledge of the source of a danger is brought home to a licensor, it is sufficient then, in order to fix him with liability, to show that a reasonable man would have appreciated the dangerous quality of that source, whether or not the licensor appreciated it himself. If so, then, in my opinion, we should in fact so hold. The objective test is, I think, preferable for at least two reasons. First, it dispenses with the need of inquiring whether in any given case a licensor did, in fact, know of the potentiality of danger—an inquiry which involves, I suppose, research into both the conscious and the sub-conscious mind. I say this because a man may well be said to "know" something that he has been told, even although he has forgotten it: for example, that an accident of a particular kind had happened on his property before it passed into his ownership. Secondly, the subjective test unduly favours the thoughtless or stupid man and puts an unwarrantable premium on carelessness.

The next point to consider is whether the fact that the accident occurred in the darkness affords a defence to the plaintiff's claim. There are judicial observations on this subject which, if taken at their face value, would indicate that this question should receive an affirmative answer. In Latham's case (27) HAMILTON, L.J., said ([1913] 1 K.B. 411) with regard to licensees:

"In darkness where they cannot see whether there is danger or not, if they will walk they walk at their peril."

This observation of HAMILTON, L.J., was approved by VISCOUNT DUNEDIN ([1929] A.C. 371) in the Addie case (6). PEARSON, J., in his judgment said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 367) that “ . . . there is no absolute rule of law that in all cases a licensee moving in the dark takes the risk of any danger which in daylight would be obvious.”

A This statement is clearly correct and counsel for the defendants did not contend to the contrary. It seems to me that the question must depend on the circumstances of each particular case. As was pointed out by LORD WRENBURY ([1923] A.C. 96) in Fairman's case (20), there are some things which a licensee is entitled to assume, because they are things which every reasonable man would be entitled to assume and could not be regarded as negligent for assuming. So, in the present case the plaintiff, who had observed nothing unusual about the steps when she entered the house, was entitled to assume, when leaving in the dark, that they were unbroken and, therefore, suitable for the purpose for which they were provided, for such is the usual and common characteristic of doorsteps.

B In my judgment, accordingly, the fact that the accident occurred during the hours of darkness is irrelevant to the plaintiff's claim. There remains the question whether the defendants, who knew, on the judge's finding, of the defective condition of the step, ought reasonably to have foreseen that it was calculated to endanger licensees who used it for the purpose of entering or leaving the house. This question has caused me much difficulty, if only for the reason that several people did know of the defect in the step and yet took no measures to remedy it or to provide any kind of warning with regard to it, and, if the defendants are to be held liable, all these people must be regarded as falling short of the standard of the reasonable man. In cases such as the present there is a very real danger of being “wise after the event”, or (which comes to much the same thing) of endowing the ordinary reasonable man with the prophetic vision of a clairvoyant. If the learned judge had decided this issue in favour of the defendants, I for one should have been by no means surprised and his decision could not have been successfully challenged in this court. He decided it, however, in favour of the plaintiff and it cannot be said that there was no evidence to support his view. Moreover, I cannot but think that a man of ordinary prudence, who owned the house and was leaving it in the hours of darkness, would do so warily, knowing the “evil character” of the thing below, and, accordingly (as my brethren have pointed out), that he would be singularly failing in the duties of a host if he left an unsuspecting guest departing into the night to find the defect for himself by stepping into it. I, therefore, agree that the judge's conclusion on this point ought not to be disturbed. In the result, I am in agreement with my brethren that the appeal should be dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Lloyd-Jacob, J.), November 24, 25, 26, 27, December 16, 1953.]

Trade Mark—Registration—Distinctiveness—Deception—Mark registered for roses—Intended user as variety name—Trade Marks Act, 1938 (c. 22), s. 9 (1) (d), s. 11.

In 1948 a rose registration scheme was introduced which was accepted by the rose growing and rose selling trade. A society keeping the register compiled a list containing one identifying name in respect of each known variety, and undertook to register any new variety submitted for that purpose. The respondents, a firm of rose growers, registered eleven new varieties of roses with the society which they supplied to the public and other growers either in the form of trees or bushes or of buds for propagation, and they registered the designation of each variety as a trade mark. Each trade mark so registered consisted of a word which, prima facie, had no direct reference to the character or quality of the roses.

HELD: (i) the name by which each rose was designated signified a variety and was not capable of distinguishing between examples of the same variety coming from different trade sources; the trade marks did not consist of a word or words having no direct reference to the character of the goods; and, therefore, under s. 9 (1) (d) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, they were not registrable.

(ii) to persons acquainted with the rose registration scheme, the use of any name entered on the rose register as importing a reference to trade origin would inevitably cause confusion, and leaving the marks on the register of trade marks would impede the effort of other traders and embarrass them and their customers; and, therefore, by virtue of s. 11 of the Act of 1938, the marks were not lawfully registered and they must be expunged from the register under s. 32 (1).

FOR THE TRADE MARKS ACT, 1938, s. 9 (1) (d), and s. 11, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 1187, 1189.

MOTION by the Wisbech Plant Co., Ltd. under the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 32, for rectification of the trade marks register by the removal of eleven trade marks registered by the respondents, Wheatcroft Brothers, Ltd., on the ground that, having regard to trade usage, the trade marks were not distinctive under s. 9 (1) (d) of the Act, and their registration was prohibited by s. 11 of the Act as being deceptive and otherwise not entitled to protection in a court of justice.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16. LLOYD-JACOB, J., read the following judgment. By this motion, the applicants, Wisbech Plant Co., Ltd., seek the rectification of the trade mark register by the removal therefrom of eleven trade marks standing in the name of the respondents, Wheatcroft Brothers, Ltd., all of which were registered without proof of distinctiveness, five of which are entered on the register in respect of "roses, rose cuttings and rose trees" and the remaining six in respect of "rose plants". As the evidence disclosed, this variation in the classification of goods has no genuine significance in relation to the points for consideration, and it calls for no further mention. The locus standi of the applicants was admitted, and evidence and argument were directed to the issues of the propriety of the original admission of these marks to the register and of the continuance of the marks thereon since registration.

The applicants' statement of case, by para. 6, asserted a ground of objection under the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 15 (1) (a), but this objection, although retained by the applicants for future consideration should an opportunity arise on appeal, was not developed in argument, nor was I invited to deal with it. One other preliminary matter requires to be stated. The respondents did not attempt to support by evidence the contention particularised in para. 3 of their statement of defence that certain combinations of letters and figures, as therein set out, had come to be identified in the public mind with certain varieties of roses. This contention will not, therefore, qualify for further notice.

- A By the Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 49, the tribunal in a proceeding relating to a trade mark is required to admit evidence of the usages of the trade concerned. It will be convenient to summarise this evidence by way of introduction. There has existed, since 1876, an organisation called the National Rose Society, with a present membership exceeding twenty-five thousand, one purpose of the existence of which is to encourage and develop the cultivation of roses in this country.
- B Certain of the members of this society, being professional rose growers, are also members of the Association of British Rose Producers, and for convenience of reference these two organisations can be respectively termed the "Society" and the "Association". A new rose variety is developed as a consequence of experimentation by a "rose raiser" in the cross-fertilisation of existing varieties, and it would appear that only a very small percentage of the seedlings so produced are found to be sufficiently outstanding to justify introduction to the market.
- C When one such is developed and a sufficient stock of rose trees created therefrom by budding, the raiser, or an associate to whom he has entrusted the task of introducing the variety to the market, called the "introducer", will seek to procure publicity for the variety, in order that the purchasing public may be encouraged to buy and plant examples of it. For this purpose, an acceptable
- D designation of the variety is essential. The raiser or introducer may himself offer for sale and sell the new variety in the form of trees or bushes ready for planting, or he may dispose of buds of the new variety to professional rose growers for them to use in the development of trees and bushes. The designation chosen is referred to as the name of the rose, and it is the usual practice for rose growers to publish catalogues wherein the roses they offer for sale are
- E identified by name, and to guarantee that goods supplied in response to orders will be found to be true to name. They can secure supplies of a variety introduced by some other grower by direct purchase from him of trees and bushes or of buds for implantation into stock of their own choosing, or indirectly by acquisition of trees or bushes of the required variety from persons in possession of the same, which trees and bushes may provide a quantity of buds or grafts with which to
- F propagate further supplies. So this propagation may be effected so rapidly that by the time the merits of a new introduction and the publicity efforts of its introducer have operated to create a substantial public demand, rose growers other than the introducer will be possessed of supplies with which to satisfy the requirements of the public, and this even though the introducer, by refraining from supplying his competitors directly with either trees or bushes or buds, had
- G sought to maintain his exclusive dealing.

The evidence established that the identification of a variety of rose was in practice secured by examination of the blooms, and as these are produced from the budded or grafted portion of the tree or bush, the nature and origin of the root stock are of no particular significance for such identification, although they may vitally affect—as will the skill and effectiveness of the budding—the

H habit and strength of the tree or bush.

Difficulty in a number of instances appears to have been experienced prior to 1948 due to the use of a plurality of designations in respect of examples of a single variety of rose, and in that year the society introduced what was termed the rose registration scheme, whereby a list was compiled containing one identifying name in respect of each known variety, and the society accepted the responsibility of registering for the benefit of all concerned with roses the identification name attached by the introducer to any new variety of rose submitted for the purpose. The registration scheme secured the approbation of the association, which recommended its members not to use in their trade catalogues any identification name not recognised by the society. Amongst their other activities, the society maintains a trial ground, wherein rose trees submitted by members are planted and tended, and their habit and quality tested and noted. On the results of these trials certificates are granted for meritorious introductions, but only when an identifying name for the variety has been entered on the society's register. A

The rose registration regulations and the application form, the completion of which is an essential preliminary to the registration, are in evidence. In completing the application form, the introducer asserts the variety to be new and in this country previously unnamed, and must propose for registration the name he suggests for its future designation. The regulations include a provision that exhibition of a variety under a name other than the name registered shall render the exhibit liable to disqualification in any competition to which the powers of the society extend. Speaking generally, it is by exhibition at flower shows sponsored by the society and by the receipt of certificates, medals and the like awards given by the society, that an introducer may expect to bring his variety to the notice of the interested public. It is, I think, a fair conclusion on the evidence that at the present time an introducer could not expect to popularise a new variety without meeting the requirements of the society in respect of registration, and, if a member also of the association, it would be possible for him to commence to market supplies of it in the ordinary way of business under a name not registered with the society only by disregarding the association's specific recommendation. Indeed, as the respondents fairly acknowledged in evidence, it would be wholly impracticable to designate a rose in the course of trade by a name other than that under which the variety was registered with the Society, and they further acknowledged that, should this be attempted, chaotic conditions would result. B C D

It is against this background of trade usage that the particulars of the registrations in suit fall to be considered. The respondents, having accepted the task of introducing into the market in this country new varieties raised abroad, sought to carry out that task in such a way as to ensure, first, the availability of only satisfactory examples, and, secondly, a reasonable financial return to the raiser and his associates. In pursuance of these purposes, the respondents agreed with their principals abroad to follow a particular course of action, whereby the designation selected for a new variety was to be registered with the society, and as soon as reasonably possible thereafter registered as a trade mark. With two exceptions (registered trade marks No. 701, 611 ("Concerto") and No. 709,608 ("Festival")) this procedure was followed in respect of the trade marks in suit, and the exceptions in no way indicate any desire to modify the procedure in principle. In this way, it was hoped that the designation would, by reason of its registration with the society, become the means whereby the variety could alone be identified, and, further, by reason of its registration as a trade mark, be available to indicate a connection in the course of trade between articles so designated and the proprietors and registered users of the registered trade mark, so as to preclude unauthorised growers from offering supplies. E F G

The present proceedings are based on the provisions of s. 32 of the Act, which, shortly stated, permit the removal from the trade marks register of entries therein made without sufficient cause or which wrongly remain therein. So far as concerns each original entry, the applicants seek to establish that the statutory requirements contained in s. 9 of the Act were not complied with, and, so far as concerns each original registration and its continuing presence on the register, they contend that the provisions of s. 11 render both unlawful. H

The prerequisite for registration in Part A of the register as set out in s. 9 is distinctiveness, "distinctive" being defined in sub-s. (2) as meaning

“ adapted . . . to distinguish goods with which the proprietor of the trade mark is or may be connected in the course of trade from goods in the case of which no such connection subsists . . . ”

A Such distinctiveness may be established in the case of certain categories specified in the section merely by inference, and in other cases by affirmative evidence. All the registrations in suit were accepted as inferentially distinctive, on the ground that each consisted of a word having no direct reference to the character or quality of the goods. Seeing that the classification of goods in respect of which registration was sought was expressed broadly to cover all varieties of rose, there was, of course, no reason for the registrar to suspect that the averment that the mark was proposed to be used, as contained in the application form, was true only in relation to one particular variety of rose, and still less reason for him to be put on inquiry as to the characteristics or qualities possessed by such variety, so as to permit him to determine the absence of any direct reference in the mark propounded for registration.

B In the light of the evidence before me, it is clear that at the respective dates of application for each of these marks, the respondents intended only to use each mark in relation to one variety of rose, which variety, as they well knew and intended, either was or would be characterised by the same name recorded in the register of the society. Had the application form accurately reflected these intentions the registrar could not have regarded the mark proposed as inferentially distinctive. An intention to use the mark as the name of a variety appears to be wholly inconsistent with a bona fide intention to use it as signifying a connection in the course of trade with the supplier, for which purpose it must necessarily be capable of differentiating between examples of the same variety coming from differing trade sources. If the question be posed: Was the name intended for use to distinguish rose trees of the respondents' growing from rose trees of the same variety grown by others, or was it intended for use to distinguish one variety introduced by the respondents from the generality of roses, there can be only one answer, for the inevitable consequence of registration with the society was to give the name a variety status. The evidence which establishes this is not questioned, and the desire of the respondents to prevent other rose growers from offering supplies of any of these new varieties save under specific authorisation, even if successful, would not affect the intention as to use as such, but would merely condition the circumstances in which roses so named were dealt with in commerce. Once the respondents decided to invite the society to accept any particular name as an identification of the variety to which it was applied, they put it out of their power to intend the name only to identify such instances of the variety as they themselves had raised. If they can contrive some manner of monopolising the production of a particular variety, it is true that the variety name will not fall to be used save on their products. This possibility, although it might conceivably permit the respondents to create and acquire a secondary meaning for the original variety name, would certainly not justify a registration granted without evidence of distinctiveness.

G Now that the propriety of these registrations is called in question, I am satisfied that the court is entitled, and, indeed, bound, to examine the s. 9 objection in the light of all the evidence adduced. So examined, registrations Nos. 700,985 “Cocorico”, 701,614 “Pigalle”, 709,607 “Coppelia”, 709,605 “Magali”, 709,609 “Moulin Rouge”, 701,613 “Mascotte”, 700,984 “Tzigane” and 709,606 “Mahina” do not qualify under s. 9 (1) (d), and were, therefore, entered on the register without sufficient cause.

H Similar reasoning as to lack of distinctiveness likewise condemns registration No. B701,612 “Confidence”. With regard to Nos. 701,611 “Concerto” and 709,608 “Festival”, these marks were registered before any application had been made to the society for their entry as variety names. The precise reason for this inversion of the designed procedure was not specified in respect of No.

701,611 "Concerto", and was due, so far as concerned "Festival", to the circumstance that the originally designed name for the variety, "Cannes Festival", was in fact registered with the society as a preliminary to registration as a trade mark, but the requirements of the Trade Mark Registry caused the geographical reference in the name to be dropped at the application stage. As I am satisfied that in neither instance was any departure from the intended use proposed, these registrations are equally vulnerable with the others for the same reasons. A

Turning now to the s. 11 objection, the evidence satisfies me that, to the thousands of persons acquainted with the rose registration scheme of the society, the use of any name entered on that register as importing a reference to trade origin would inevitably cause confusion. Moreover, save on the footing that sellers other than the respondents will have no opportunity of meeting demands for these varieties when expressed in the only manner open to the buyer for the identification of his requirements, the inevitable result of leaving these marks on the register of trade marks would be to impede the efforts of such other traders and to embarrass both them and their customers. B

The evidence affords no grounds for assuming either a future inability on the part of growers to produce any of the varieties to which the marks in suit are assigned, or the absence of any public demand for their products under their variety names. It is, of course, true that production of such varieties will require for its inception the receipt of some supply of stock from the respondents' growing, but neither procurement of supplies nor production of stock therefrom need involve any unlawful act as the law now stands. If, therefore, it be right to postulate a state of affairs wherein willing sellers and willing buyers are minded to deal in these commodities, the imposition of a clog on their means of identifying the subject-matter of their dealing must operate in restraint of trade. In my judgment, s. 11 of the Act requires this court to safeguard the free operation of normal trade channels from such interference so far as it proceeds under the protection of trade mark registration. For this reason, the entries in respect of all the marks the subject of this motion wrongly remain on the register and must be expunged therefrom. C D E

It was strongly urged on me by counsel for the respondents that, having regard to the provisions of s. 15 of the Act, the objection that a trade mark is invalid because it is the descriptive name of an article falls to be determined according to the terms of that section, and not under s. 9 and s. 11. This submission must be rejected. With the exception of s. 15 (3) (which relates to chemical substances, and is, therefore, not in point) this section is concerned with what has developed after the date of registration. It cannot, therefore, operate to restrict or avoid the investigation into distinctiveness which by s. 9 is imposed on the registrar at the application stage, and the use of the expression "by reason only" in s. 15 (1) shows that no substitute for the s. 11 investigation was intended. If the legislature had intended to permit the continued registration of marks which in use were causing deception and confusion, much plainer direction would have been found in the statute. If the argument with regard to s. 15 be put somewhat differently and it be submitted that the section should be taken as a guide to the proper decision in cases where concurrent use as a trade mark and as a description was to be anticipated, the respondents would fare no better. If the whole of s. 15 be closely examined, it will be found that it contains a positive direction to deem as wrongly registered any mark which by reason of concurrent use in a descriptive sense could occasion deception or confusion, and this irrespective of the intentions of the registered proprietor as to its use. Where, as here, the respondents themselves promote and adopt the descriptive use, they cannot complain of the consequential effect on the validity of the trade mark. Having had the advantage of seeing and hearing Mr. Harry Wheatercroft in the witness box, it is only right to add that the F G H respondents appear to have intended no impropriety. Being convinced, as he was, that the welfare and prestige of British rose growers required the establishment of some control over the marketing of new varieties, this gentleman appears to have been assured that the registration of variety names as trade marks would create an opportunity, and the introduction into trade mark law of the registered user provisions would enable the respondents to authorise, under properly controlled conditions, the supply of their new varieties to the public by suitably qualified growers. I accept from him that the respondents desired to protect the public from obtaining poor examples of new varieties, and were wishful only to secure fair and equitable terms on which the industry could collaborate with them.

Although the respondents must bear the consequences of having failed to disclose to the registrar the correspondence they intended between variety name and trade mark (but for which failure the marks would never have been registered nor these proceedings been possible) I have no ground for attributing to them any personal knowledge of this default. What they were really seeking was a means or method of preventing the use of stock of their growing for the propagation of rose trees and bushes by unauthorised professional rose growers, such as is provided by the domestic patent law in some other countries. In so doing, they adhered to an earlier understanding in relation to the tenth commandment, and overlooked the modern gloss which A. H. CLOUGH felicitously expressed in "THE MODERN DECALOGUE" as "Thou shalt not covet, but tradition approves all forms of competition".

For the purpose the respondents had in mind I am satisfied that the registration of the trade marks in suit was of no avail, for they were not validly registered, nor can they properly remain on the register. Accordingly, I must direct the rectification of the register as prayed.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pearson, J.), November 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 30, December 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 10, 1953.]

Account—Action for—Defence—Account agreed and settled—Oral agreement as to final figure.

Limitation of Action—Postponement of limitation period—Action for relief from mistake—Claim for account—Underpayment of money due under contract—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 26 (c).

A

From 1938, when she was admitted a solicitor, until 1950, the plaintiff was in the defendant's service as his assistant under an oral agreement by which she received a basic minimum salary plus a yearly sum based on the annual net profit of the practice. In 1951 a dispute arose over the amounts which the plaintiff had been paid, and on Oct. 1, 1951, she issued a writ claiming an account from Apr. 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1950. At the end of each of those accounting years the defendant had orally informed her of the amount due to her, and she was then paid that amount. The defendant contended, inter alia, that for each of the years in question, the account between them had been agreed and settled, and he pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, which the plaintiff contended did not apply by reason of, inter alia, s. 26 (c) of that Act, which provides that the periods of limitation prescribed by the Act shall not begin to run in a case where the action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake until the plaintiff has discovered the mistake.

HELD: (i) a settled and agreed account might be constituted by the parties orally agreeing a final figure for the account as distinct from agreeing a written account, but on the facts of the present case there was no agreement, oral or in writing, of an account, and, therefore, no settled and agreed account.

(ii) section 26 (c) of the Limitation Act, 1939, applied only where the mistake was an essential ingredient of the cause of action, as, e.g., where money had been paid or a contract entered into in consequence of a mistake and appropriate relief was sought; the present action was for an account to ascertain the amount still due to the plaintiff and was not an action for relief from the consequences of a mistake within the meaning of s. 26 (c); and, therefore, the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (2), applied to bar any account in respect of any year before 1945-46.

ACTION for an account.

In 1923 the plaintiff was employed by the defendant, a solicitor, as a short-hand-typist. In 1934 she entered into articles of clerkship with him and in 1938 she was admitted a solicitor and became his assistant. At this time the parties came to an oral agreement as to the plaintiff's salary whereby she was to receive a basic minimum salary, plus an additional yearly sum based on the annual net profit of the practice. This was varied in 1948, and remained in force until the end of March, 1950, when the plaintiff became the defendant's salaried partner. She remained as such until 1951, when the partnership came to an end and the present dispute arose over the amounts which had been paid to her.

- A On Oct. 1, 1951, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming from the defendant an account in respect of the alleged under-payment of her salary by him from Apr. 1, 1938, to Mar. 31, 1950. The defendant pleaded, inter alia, that, for each of the years in question, the plaintiff, with knowledge of the defendant's accounts and of the net profit as so determined, agreed with the defendant's accountant, Mr. Catchpole, the amount payable to her and received payment of such amount in full satisfaction, and thereby each year the account between the plaintiff and the defendant was agreed and settled. The plaintiff denied this, and contended that, even if it were so, there was no consideration for the alleged agreements, and that, if there were such agreements, they were entered into under a mutual mistake of fact as to the true indebtedness of the defendant to her since the accounts contained serious errors as to the amount of the net profit and the proportion thereof payable to her. Further, the defendant pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939. The plaintiff contended that that Act did not apply by reason of s. 19 (1), s. 23 (4), or s. 26 of the Act.

- D Dec. 10. PEARSON, J.: The question whether there were agreed and settled accounts here can be dealt with fairly shortly. One possible answer is that, to constitute a settled account, you must have an account in the sense of a written document in which figures are set down, and that written account has to be agreed between the parties, and here there is no such settled account, E no document in writing. Regarding this matter certain passages were read to me from DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, 8th ed., at p. 418, and BULLEN & LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS, 10th ed., p. 510, footnote. I do not, however, propose to rely on that point because it seems to me that it would theoretically be possible for parties, without making any settled account in that sense, to arrive at an oral agreement which might have much the same F effect. If they were uncertain about a figure or did not wish to incur the expense of further investigations, they might meet and agree orally that a certain figure be deemed to be the right figure for the purpose, and the person to whom it was owing would not ask for any more and the person by whom it was owed would not seek to pay any less. That seems to me to be a perfectly possible oral agreement—an agreement of accord and satisfaction rather than by way G of settled accounts.

- The real point here, to my mind, is that there was no agreement. The evidence seems to be reasonably plain that the plaintiff, when the defendant and Mr. Catchpole had made their assessment of what was due to her, would be told either by Mr. Catchpole or the defendant: "This is what is owing to you, £100"—or £168, or whatever it was. They simply informed her that H that was owing to her. She was not asked to agree that it was right; she was not shown how it was arrived at; she was not asked to inspect the books or even Mr. Catchpole's working papers. She was simply informed that that was the sum which was due to her. She believed what she was told, and, in pursuance of that, she would normally draw the necessary cheque for signature by the defendant. But that was, in the minds of both parties, simply giving effect to what had gone before. It was not the making of any new agreement by the plaintiff, and to constitute a settled account there must be an agreed and settled account, and the ordinary principle of contract law applies that, unless there is an intention to agree, there is no contract. I hold that here there was no intention to agree, and, therefore, no contract, and no agreed and settled account. If that is not the right view on that question and if there was an agreed and settled account, I would hold without hesitation that there were very serious errors here which would make it necessary for such accounts as may exist to be re-opened.

I come now to the question which arises under the Limitation Act, 1939. In that Act, prima facie, s. 2 (2) and (7) apply here. If those sub-sections apply, I hold that they bar any account in respect of the years prior to the year 1945-46, but they do not bar an account in respect of that year 1945-46 because the liability to pay the supplemental salary and to furnish an account of the net profit and of the resulting total salary did not arise until after Mar. 31, 1946, and, therefore, did arise within six years before the issue of the writ in October, 1951. It was, however, contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the limitation was excluded or the period was extended by s. 19, s. 23 or s. 26 of the Act. Section 19 (1) provides:

"No period of limitation prescribed by this Act shall apply to an action by a beneficiary under a trust, being an action—(a) in respect of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was a party or privy; or (b) to recover from the trustee trust property or the proceeds thereof in the possession of the trustee, or previously received by the trustee and converted to his use."

But I hold, in the view which I take of the relevant salary agreement made between the parties in 1938, that there was no trust and no trust property and no fiduciary relationship.

Section 23 (4) provides:

"Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or other liquidated pecuniary claim, or any claim to the personal estate of a deceased person or to any share or interest therein, and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim or makes any payment in respect thereof, the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment or the last payment."

There the opening words are:

"Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or other liquidated pecuniary claim."

The claim must be a claim for a debt or other liquidated pecuniary sum and the acknowledgment must be an acknowledgment of that claim. I find that the defendant did not, by anything said in this case in the course of the correspondence or any other documents, acknowledge the plaintiff's right to recover any debt or other liquidated claim, nor did he (if this could be material in any way) acknowledge any liability to account to the plaintiff.

There is, however, s. 26, which is concerned with the postponing of the limitation period in the case of fraud or mistake. It is right in construing this provision to consider the pre-existing law, and a number of previously decided cases were referred to, including Brooksbank v. Smith (1), Denys v. Shuckburgh (2), Baker v. Courage & Co. (3), and Re Robinson (4). Reference was also made to a passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Re Diplock's Estate (5) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 343, 344). In the end it seemed to me that the previous law did not afford much help. The Act is not a mere consolidating Act, but (as appears from its title)

"An Act to consolidate with amendments certain enactments relating to the limitation of actions and arbitrations."

Section 26 (c), which is the material provision, effects at least one amendment because it overrides the decision in Baker v. Courage & Co. (3).

In construing the section it is to be observed that fraud and mistake are dealt with quite differently. The words of the section are, so far as material:

A "Where, in the case of any action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act, either—(a) the action is based upon the fraud of the defendant or his agent or of any person through whom he claims or his agent, or (b) the right of action is concealed by the fraud of any such person as aforesaid, or (c) the action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake, the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the fraud or the mistake, as the case may be, or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it."

B In regard to fraud, there is provision (a) dealing with an action which is based on fraud—for instance, if an action is to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, or (b), that very wide provision, dealing with where the right of action (which may be wholly independent of fraud) is concealed by the fraud of "any such person as aforesaid", that is to say, the defendant and people claiming through him, and so on. But there is not, in respect of mistake, any provision similar to (b). The section does not apply to the case of a right of action which is concealed from the plaintiff by a mistake. What, then, is the meaning of provision (c)?

C The right of action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake. It seems to me that this wording is carefully chosen to indicate a class of action where a mistake has been made and has had certain consequences and the plaintiff is seeking to be relieved from those consequences. Familiar mistakes are, (i) money paid in consequence of a mistake—the mistake is made, in consequence of the mistake the money is paid, and the action

D is to recover that money back; (ii) there may be a contract entered into in consequence of a mistake, and the action is to obtain the rescission, or, in some cases, the rectification, of the contract; (iii) there may be an account settled in consequence of mistakes, and, if the mistakes are sufficiently serious, there can be a re-opening of the account.

E In my opinion, the mere operation of the Limitation Act, unless excluded by this section, is not a relevant consequence for the purpose of this section. If it were, then any concealment of a right of action from the plaintiff by a mistake would be intended to be covered by this section, and the provision (b), in respect of fraud, should have been applied to mistake also. Moreover, I think it is right to say that if there would be no consequence except the operation of the Limitation Act and the operation of the Limitation Act is excluded, then

F there is no consequence at all. In this case the mistake, in my judgment, has had no relevant consequence for the purposes of this section. As the statement of claim shows, the plaintiff's claim is to recover moneys due to her under a contract, and the cause of action is the same as if she had sued for each unpaid balance on its due date. By reason of the mistake she failed to realise that the balance was due to her, and by that mistake the right of action was concealed from her. But that is not sufficient. Probably provision (c) applies only

G where the mistake is an essential ingredient of the cause of action, where the statement of claim sets out the mistake and its consequences and prays for relief from the consequences. In the present case the statement of claim sets out that sums became due and only a smaller amount was paid, and the prayer is for an account to ascertain the sum still due and for payment of them when so ascertained. This action is not for relief from the consequences of a mistake

H within the meaning of s. 26 (c).

No doubt there are certain anomalies which result. As counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, it is odd that a person who has by mistake paid too much can take advantage of the section, whereas a person who has by mistake received too little and made no protest cannot take advantage of the section. Also it is odd that a person who has by mistake merely received too little and made no protest should be in a worse position than a person who has by mistake taken the further step of agreeing and settling an account. But, in my judgment, the carefully chosen wording of provision (c) must have its proper effect notwithstanding those resulting anomalies. No doubt it was intended to be a narrow provision because any wider provision would have opened too wide a door of escape from the general principle of limitation by six years' lapse of time, which is, of course, a reasonable and normally salutary principle, as counsel for the defendant demonstrated by reference to this case where the parties' memories have grown dim as to long past events, and, possibly, some documents which might have been material have, in the course of time, perished.

NOTE.

LOVE v. PHARAOH AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), December 17, 1953.]

Practice—Chancery Division—Affidavit—Dates and sums of money to be in figures and not in words—Infringement of practice direction—Authority to masters to order affidavit to be taken off file on preliminary hearing—Costs of re-swearing and re-filing to be borne by solicitor.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

On Dec. 2, 1953, the summons came before WYNN-PARRY, J. As figures in the affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiff were set out in words, instead of in figures as required by the direction in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 683, in a note to R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 7, WYNN-PARRY, J., refused to hear the summons and adjourned it for the affidavit to be re-sworn and re-filed in proper form.

On Dec. 17 the summons came before HARMAN, J. Before dealing with the questions raised by the summons, HIS LORDSHIP said: There is a direction in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1953, p. 683, that dates and sums in affidavits should be expressed, not in words, but in figures. My predecessor, P. O. LAWRENCE, J., used to make solicitors pay personally the costs of any affidavits not complying with that direction. WYNN-PARRY, J., I gather, did not deal with any costs. Although I am informed by counsel of their understanding that the costs of the adjournment should be paid by the plaintiff, that does not preclude me from carrying out what I understand to be the learned judge's intention, namely, that the solicitors personally should pay. Be it known that hereafter the masters, on the preliminary hearing of adjourned summonses, will have authority to visit any substantial infraction of this direction by ordering that the affidavit be taken off the file and re-sworn at the expense of the solicitor who files it. In the present case, those costs will be the costs of and occasioned by the adjournment and of re-filing the affidavit. But I hope that in future the masters will deal with the matter at an earlier stage, so that it will not cause any delay.

JOHNSON v. CROGGON & CO., LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), December 3, 4, 14, 1953.]

Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Plaintiff in charge of steel erection—Duty to select gear delegated to plaintiff—Selection of defective ladder—Plaintiff injured in fall from ladder—Liability of employers and owners of ladder—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 29 (1), (8).

The plaintiff, who was employed by the first defendants as a steel erector, was in charge of work of erecting a steel roof on a refrigerated fruit store on the farm premises of the second defendants. The plaintiff had been told to obtain all the heavy gear (including ladders) needed for the work from P. & Co., who were the main contractors for the erection of the fruit store. He obtained certain equipment from them, but, having seen a number of fruit picking ladders on the premises, he obtained permission to use them and did not obtain building ladders from P. & Co. When the work was almost completed, the plaintiff was descending from the roof after clearing a fouled wire and he stepped on to the top rung of one of the fruit picking ladders which broke into three parts, and he fell to the ground and was injured. In an action for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty,

HELD: (i) the uprights of the ladder were not of "adequate strength" within the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 29 (1), and the first defendants were in breach of the obligation imposed by that provision; but those defendants had acted reasonably and in accordance with the practice in the trade in delegating (as they were entitled to do) to the plaintiff their statutory duty, and the accident was due wholly to the negligence and breach of statutory duty (under reg. 29 (8) of the regulations of 1948) of the plaintiff; and, therefore, applying the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio, he was not entitled to recover against the first defendants.

(ii) the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the second defendants on the ground that he was an invitee on their ladder, because they merely gave a general permission to use the ladders, without any guarantee or representation that the ladders were suitable, the selection being within the competence of the plaintiff alone, and, in selecting the defective ladder, he was solely to blame.

ACTION for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was a steel erector employed by the first defendants, Croggon &

Co., Ltd. The second defendants, Macey & Sons, Ltd., were fruit farmers of Sutton Valence, Kent, and were the owners and occupiers of the building on which the plaintiff was working at the material time. The second defendants employed Paddy & Co. to construct for them a refrigerated fruit store. Paddy & Co. sub-contracted the erection of the steelwork of the building (mainly consisting of a steel roof) to the first defendants. On Nov. 17, 1950, Paddy & Co. having erected the walls of the building, the plaintiff was sent to the second defendants' premises to erect the necessary steelwork, with an assistant, Bannister. It was known that the plaintiff would require heavy gear, such as derrick poles, blocks, tackles and ladders, for the erection, and it had been arranged by the first defendants that the gear should be provided by Paddy & Co. The plaintiff found on arrival that there was no heavy gear available and on instructions from the first defendants telephoned to Paddy & Co. asking them to supply the necessary gear, but he did not ask for any ladders. HIS LORDSHIP found as a fact that, before he telephoned to Paddy & Co., the plaintiff had seen and roughly tested a number of fruit picking ladders belonging to the second defendants and had been given permission by the second defendants to use them if he thought they would serve his purpose. The plaintiff had made up his mind to use these ladders.

On Nov. 24, 1950, when the work of erection was almost finished, the plaintiff ascended one of the fruit picking ladders to clear a wire which had become caught. On descending, he put both feet on the top rung of the ladder and the ladder snapped into three pieces, the plaintiff fell fourteen feet to the ground, and was injured. HIS LORDSHIP found that the ladder although, perhaps, suitable for fruit picking, was unsuitable and unsafe for building operations owing to the light nature of its construction; that the plaintiff was an experienced steel erector and competent to decide whether any ladder would be suitable for a particular purpose; that it was the custom of the trade to delegate to the foreman on a particular job the duty of selecting the right gear for the job; that in the case in question this duty had been delegated to the plaintiff and that he understood the position; that it was within the scope of the plaintiff's authority to obtain builder's ladders from Paddy & Co.; that no indication was given to the first defendants that fruit picking ladders were being used; and that in cases where steel erectors were sent to distant and remote places (the work was being done seventy miles from the first defendants' place of business) it was reasonable that choice of gear should be left to the foreman of the job, who would normally acquire it locally.

Pensotti for the plaintiff.

J. W. Russell for the first defendants.

M. J. Morris for the second defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14. PILCHER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: Smith v. Baveystock (1) shows quite clearly that in an appropriate case an employer may delegate his statutory duty to a competent employee. In Smith v. Baveystock (1) the employer was held entitled to delegate his duty to fence or adjust the guard on a circular saw under the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 (S.R. & O., 1922, No. 1196), reg. 21. LORD GODDARD, who was presiding in the Court of Appeal, said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 532):

"It is, of course, perfectly clear that an employer can delegate the duty of seeing that machines are properly fenced or adjusted to proper employees, that is to say, to employees who have the necessary knowledge and experience for them to see that the machine is fenced as securely as it is possible to do. If an employer delegates that work to a competent man and the competent man does not carry it out, it follows from that, of course, that the employer's duty has not been discharged. In this particular case impliedly the duty of seeing that the fence is properly adjusted is delegated to the man who works the machine, who is an experienced person in relation to that particular job. It is very difficult indeed to see how it could be otherwise done. One has to try to interpret these rules and obligations in the light of a certain degree of common sense and also in such a way as to enable the machines to be used. Parliament obviously has approved of the use of circular saws and recognises that circular saws may be used in industry at the present time. Then one has to consider how, in the ordinary and normal working of a factory, this business can go on of adjusting the guard. It would be quite impracticable, I suppose, for a foreman to go round every five minutes to see whether a workman had got his machine adjusted exactly to the last degree of safety. It must be left to the experience and common sense of the man to see that it is adjusted in that way as is most safe."

In Smith v. Baveystock (1) the employee to whom the duty was delegated was himself injured because he failed properly to carry out the duty delegated to him. LORD GODDARD found that, in the circumstances of that case, there had been no negligence or breach of statutory duty by the employers. DU PARCQ, L.J., after considering the situation which might have obtained if the employers had been prosecuted for a breach of the regulations, said (ibid., 535):

"... when it comes to proceedings in a civil court for damages. I think they [the employers] are entitled to say: 'The fault is really yours and not ours. We were quite entitled to rely on you. True, if somebody else had been injured by any failure on your part to fulfil your obligation we should have had to pay the penalty, we should have been responsible to him. We cannot rid ourselves of our obligation. But it is quite absurd to think that if you, who are really the person to blame because you were reasonably and properly entrusted by us with this duty, failed to carry it out, therefore, we have got to pay damages to you'."

D

In Gallagher v. Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd. (2) employers failed in their submission that they had delegated to the workman a statutory duty not to overload a crane. WROTTESELY, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 41):

"The word 'delegation' when used in connection with the statutory duty of the employer does not mean the same thing as 'employment'. An employer does not, merely by employing his servant to work a crane, delegate to him the statutory duty of seeing that the crane is not overloaded. The theory of delegation of a statutory duty is intelligible where the duty is a positive duty such as to keep the guard of a power saw in adjustment. In the case of a negative duty such as not to overload a crane, the conception of delegation presents considerable difficulty."

F

I was also referred to Barcock v. Brighton Corpn. (3) where the question of delegation of his duty by the employer was discussed. In that case the plaintiff, to whom certain duties had been delegated, succeeded on the ground that the defendants had not instituted and maintained a safe system of work. I do not think that the case helps me, and, accordingly, I say no more about it.

G

I now come to consider the claim of the plaintiff in this case in so far as it is based on an alleged breach of the first defendants' statutory duty. The work on which the plaintiff was engaged was work to which the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, apply. The plaintiff relies on breaches by his employers of reg. 4 and reg. 29 (1) of those regulations. Regulation 4 provides:

H

"It shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen who is undertaking any of the operations to which these regulations apply (i) to comply with . . . reg. 5 to reg. 30."

The regulation also provides that it shall be the duty of every person employed to comply with the requirements of such regulations as relate to the performance of an act by him and to co-operate in carrying out Part II of the regulations. Regulation 29 is in Part II, and, so far as relevant, it is in the following terms:

"(1) Every ladder and step-ladder shall be of good construction, sound material and adequate strength for the purpose for which it is used . . .

(8) No wooden ladder shall be used unless it is constructed with—(a) uprights of adequate strength . . ."

On my findings of fact, the ladder which broke was not of adequate strength for the purpose for which it was used, and in particular its uprights were not of adequate strength. The first defendants were thus, as it seems to me, in technical breach of their absolute obligation to provide a ladder of adequate strength for the purpose for which it was in fact used by the plaintiff. The plaintiff himself having a duty to co-operate, quite apart from any question of delegation, was in breach of reg. 29 (8) in that he used a wooden ladder with uprights of insufficient strength. It is clear, moreover, from the cases to which I have referred, that an employer is entitled in appropriate circumstances to delegate his statutory duty to an experienced employee. I find that the plaintiff was such an employee, and that the circumstances in which the first defendants carried on their business were such that it was eminently reasonable, if not commercially necessary, that they should delegate to their foreman on the spot the selection and approval of the heavy gear, including ladders, required for that particular job. The defendants did so delegate this duty to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff recognised and understood that they had done so. The plaintiff, in my view, should have appreciated that the ladder in question was unsuitable and unsafe for the reasons which I have given. If the plaintiff's mate, Bannister, had been injured by the collapse of the ladder, the first defendants could not, of course, have escaped liability. The situation, however, is obviously different where it is the person to whom the duty to select and approve the ladder had been properly delegated who is himself injured by reason of the insufficiency of the ladder.

On my findings, the plaintiff's case against the first defendants seems to be covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Smith v. Baveystock (1), subject only to this, that that case was decided before the passing of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. Whether the present case is regarded as one in which there has been a technical breach of statutory duty by the first defendants who have properly delegated the performance of that duty to a foreman, or as a case in which the first defendants have committed no breach of statutory duty, the result, in my view, is the same. I am inclined to think that it would be difficult to argue in this case that the first defendants were not in at any rate technical breach of their statutory duty. The common sense of the matter, however, is that the plaintiff acting within the scope of his delegated authority, and negligently selecting an unsafe ladder, was the sole author of his own misfortune. I can see no good reason why the well-known principle ex turpi causa non oritur actio should not apply in this case.

In Cakebread v. Hopping Bros. (Whetstone), Ltd. (4) the plaintiff was injured in the course of working a circular saw. The guard with which the saw was fitted was incapable of proper adjustment and, consequently, did not comply with the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922. The plaintiff himself failed to make the necessary adjustments to the guard which was provided. The case was decided after the passing of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. HILBERY, J., held that the plaintiff failed. His decision was varied by the Court of Appeal, who came to the conclusion that it was a case in which the defendants, having been throughout and continuously in breach of their statutory duty in that they had failed to provide a guard which complied with the regulations, were themselves to blame, but that the plaintiff's negligence had contributed to the extent of fifty per cent. towards the accident and his consequent injuries. TUCKER, L.J., after reviewing the authorities and referring to the situation which had obtained in the earlier cases such as Vincent v. Southern Ry. Co. (5), said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 394):

A "In that case [Vincent v. Southern Ry. Co. (5)] it was not necessary for the House of Lords, any more than it was necessary for LORD GODDARD in Smith v. Baveystock (1), to express a view of what the position would have been under the Act of 1945, and I do not read any of the observations of their Lordships as compelling me to hold that the workman in the present case is entirely out of court by reason of his negligence. I think he was negligent and that that negligence contributed to the accident, as did the breach of statutory duty and common law negligence on the part of the employers. I, therefore, think that this is a case under the new Act for apportioning the damages. I agree with the figure proposed by my Lord, and I will only say that I can quite conceive in a Smith v. Baveystock (1) type of case where a competent skilled man is left in charge of a properly constructed machine and there is proper delegation to him under reg. 23 and adequate supervision in the factory, if he is injured, I can imagine that some courts might take the view that somewhere in the neighbourhood of ninety per cent. might possibly fall on the workman. This case on its facts is to be distinguished altogether from a case of that kind."

D There is, perhaps, some ground for saying that this is a case of the kind to which TUCKER, L.J., was referring in that passage, where there has been at least a technical breach by the employer of his statutory duty to provide a safe and suitable ladder. Accordingly, I have had to consider that matter. I have already stated the facts, and I have found that the employers were acting in accordance with the usual practice of the trade, they were acting reasonably in entrusting to their experienced employee the choice of suitable heavy gear, and, in the popular sense, the only fault which can be attributed to anyone in this case is the fault of the plaintiff, who was well experienced in regard to ladders, in choosing a completely unsuitable ladder.

E The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1, is in the following terms:

"Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated . . ."

F Looking at this matter from the common-sense point of view—and I venture to think that that is the proper aspect from which to view this case—there was no fault in the employers. If they were entitled, and, indeed, as I find, almost bound, to delegate to the plaintiff the duty of selecting and approving gear, they could do no more. I doubt, therefore, whether it can properly be said that the defendants here were in fault under s. 1. That being so, I think it would be driving matters too far to hold that, in a case of this kind where the defendants are, in my view, completely free from blame, I am compelled to find them at fault and then to allocate some very large proportion of the blame—possibly ninety-nine per cent.—to the plaintiff. That situation ought not to arise, and I do not propose to decide the case on that ground.

H I am satisfied that the only person who was to blame in this matter was the plaintiff. He was negligent and also in breach of the statutory duty imposed on him under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and it was his own negligence and breach of duty which immediately caused the accident and resulting injury. The defendants were not at fault in the popular sense. I see no reason why, on the facts of this case, the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio should not apply, and, accordingly, I find that the plaintiff's claim fails. If I should be wrong about this, and if it had been necessary for me to decide the case on what I may, perhaps, call the contributory basis, I should without hesitation have found that while the defendants were in technical breach of the regulations to which I have referred, the amount recoverable by the plaintiff should be reduced by ninety-nine per cent. for the reasons I have given, the result of which would be that he would recover virtually nothing. Feeling as I do, and taking the view which I have expressed, the result is that the plaintiff's claim against the first defendants based on the alleged breach of their statutory duty fails. The selection and approval of the heavy gear having been properly left under a proper system of work to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff having made this unfortunate and bad selection, it is impossible to say that the defendants have been negligent or have failed to institute and supervise a proper system of work. For the reasons which I have given on the facts which I have found, I am quite satisfied that the plaintiff's common law claim against the first defendants must also fail.

That leaves the question of the second defendants. The plaintiff's claim against them can be dealt with quite shortly. The plaintiff alleges against the second defendants that he was in substance an invitee on the ladder. That is a contention which is, in my view, ill founded, and, if authority is needed to support my opinion, I need only refer to Marshall v. Cellactite & British Uralite, Ltd. (6). In that case, the factory owners gave permission to contractors working on their premises to borrow plant required for the work, and one of the contractors' employees was injured by falling from a defective ladder. It was held that the contractors, the second defendants, were alone to blame since they had themselves selected the ladder for this particular work. In the course of his judgment, LORD GREENE, M.R., said (63 T.L.R. 457):

"Because Cellactite [who were the factory owners] had given Adlon [the employers of the workman] a general permission to use any plant it was said that it was just as if Cellactite had put the ladder in place, with their own hands. That argument is fallacious, because the permission was not a permission relative to any particular piece of plant, but a general permission to use plant, and no guarantee was given or representation made to anyone as to the safety of any particular piece of plant or its suitability for any particular work."

Those words seem to me amply to cover the circumstances and the facts which I have found in regard to the way in which the second defendants told the plaintiff that he could use any of their ladders if he thought they would serve his purpose. They did not in any sense of the word press the plaintiff to use the ladders or guarantee that the ladders were suitable for the job. That was a matter which lay within the competence of the plaintiff and within his competence alone. I think that that case, which, of course, is binding on me, affords a short answer to the plaintiff's claim against the second defendants. Accordingly, the plaintiff's claim fails both against the first and against the second defendants.

Building Contract—Contractor a limited company—R.I.B.A. conditions of contract—N.F.B.T.E. and F.A.S.S. sub-contract—Voluntary liquidation of contractor after practical completion of work, and before issue of architect's final certificate—Sum due to sub-contractor under interim certificate not paid—Right of building owner to pay sub-contractor and deduct sum paid from amount due to contractor—Retention money—Equitable assignment—Contractor trustee for sub-contractor.

- A By a building contract, dated Jan. 15, 1951, a company, which carried on the business of a building contractor (and which is referred to hereinafter as "the contractor"), agreed to build some flats for a borough council.
- B The current edition of the Royal Institute of British Architects form of conditions of contract applicable where quantities formed part of the contract, adapted for the use of the council, applied to the contract. Clause 21 (a) of the conditions provided that sums referred to therein were to be expended in favour of such persons as the architect should direct, referred to as
- C nominated sub-contractors, and by cl. 21 (b) the sums directed by the architect to be paid to nominated sub-contractors for work, materials or goods comprised in the sub-contract was to be paid by the contractor within fourteen days of receiving the architect's certificate, less only any retention money which the contractor might be entitled to deduct and a cash discount.
- D By cl. 21 (c), "Before any such certificate is issued to the contractor he shall, if requested by the architect, furnish to him reasonable proof that all nominated sub-contractors' accounts included in previous certificates have been duly discharged, in default whereof the employer [i.e., the council] may pay such accounts upon a certificate of the architect and deduct the amount so paid from any sums otherwise payable to the contractor".
- E Clause 24 (a) dealt with the issue of interim certificates by the architect stating the amount due to the contractor from the council, and by cl. 24 (b): "The amount so due shall, subject to cl. 21 (c) of these conditions . . . be the total value of the work properly executed and of the materials and goods delivered upon the site for use in the works up to and including a date not more than seven days before the date of the said certificate . . ." By
- F cl. 24 (f) the architect was to issue a final certificate of the value of the works executed by the contractor on expiration of the defects liability period, which was six months from practical completion of the works. On Apr. 23, 1951, the contractor entered into a sub-contract with a sub-contractor
- G nominated by the architect. The sub-contract was in the form approved by the National Federation of Building Trades Employers and the Federation of Associations of Specialists and Sub-Contractors. By cl. 11 (a) the contractor, in accordance with the main contract, was to apply to the architect for certificates of payment and for the inclusion therein of the amount representing the value at the time of the sub-contract works. By cl. 11 (b) within fourteen days of receiving a certificate from the architect the contractor was to pay to the sub-contractor the amount certified therein, less retention money and a cash discount, "retention money" being defined in
- H the sub-clause as "the proportion attributable to the sub-contract works of the amount retained by the employer [i.e., the council] in accordance with the main contract". By cl. 11 (h): "If and to the extent that the amount retained by the employer in accordance with the main contract includes any retention money the contractor's interest in such money is fiduciary as trustee for the sub-contractor and if the contractor attempts or purports to mortgage or otherwise charge such interest or his interest in the whole of the amount retained as aforesaid (otherwise than by floating charge if the contractor is a limited company), the contractor shall thereupon immediately set aside and become a trustee for the sub-contractor of a sum equivalent to the retention money and shall pay the same to the sub-contractor on demand; provided that upon payment of the same to the sub-contractor the amount due to the sub-contractor upon final payment under this sub-contract shall be reduced accordingly by the amount so paid". On Sept. 19, 1952, the architect issued the nineteenth certificate, which covered the whole of the work up to that date. The practical completion of the work was on Oct. 25, 1952. In December, 1952, the contractor went into voluntary liquidation, but the council did not take over the completion of the contract. The end of the defects liability period being Apr. 25, 1953, the architect was then in a position to issue his final certificate, but he had not done so owing to a dispute between the contractor and the sub-contractor, the contractor not having paid to the sub-contractor a sum directed to be paid by a certificate of the architect issued on July 16, 1952. The sub-contractor claimed (i) that, in accordance with cl. 21 (c) of the main contract, the council were entitled to pay to the sub-contractor the balance remaining unpaid of amounts included in previous certificates given in favour of the sub-contractor, and (ii) that the contractor was trustee of any "retention money", as defined in cl. 11 (b) of the sub-contract, and that either the retention money, when it became payable, should be paid direct to the sub-contractor, or, if it came into the liquidator's hands, he was bound to pay it over to the sub-contractor. The sub-contractor's claim was opposed by other creditors of the contractor, who contended, inter alia, (i) that cl. 21 (c) of the main contract referred only to interim certificates and not to a final certificate, and (ii) (a) that cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract did not create a trust, but merely provided for a running account, and (b) that the contractor had no such interest in the retention money as could form the subject of a trust.

HELD: (i) clause 21 (c) of the main contract applied, not only to interim certificates, but also to the final certificate; notwithstanding the liquidation of the contractor, the sub-clause remained in effect; and, therefore, in accordance with its provisions, the council were entitled to pay to the sub-contractor the balance remaining unpaid of amounts included in previous certificates given in favour of the sub-contractor.

Re Wilkinson, Ex p. Fowler ([1905] 2 K.B. 713), applied.

(ii) the words used in cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract were apt to create a trust which would operate by way of an equitable assignment of assets described as the contractor's interest in the "retention money", the main contract provided for the retention of "retention money", which represented money already earned but not yet payable, the contractor had, under the main contract, an interest in that money which could be the subject of a valid equitable assignment; on the facts, the contractor had effectively made such an assignment, within cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract; and, therefore, the contractor's interest in the retention money as defined in cl. 11 (b) of the sub-contract, being part of the moneys retained by the council under the main contract, was fiduciary, the contractor was a trustee for the sub-contractor, in accordance with cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract, and, on receipt of the money by the liquidator from the council, the contractor and the liquidator were bound to preserve it entire, in accordance with cl. 11 (h), and to pay it to the sub-contractor, less only the cash discount provided for by the sub-contract.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS in the voluntary winding-up of a company.

The company, which carried on the business of a building contractor, entered into a contract, dated Jan. 15, 1951, with Ilford Borough Council to build a number of flats, and the applicants, Helical Bar and Engineering Co., Ltd., were sub-contractors nominated by the architect and were employed by the company under a sub-contract, dated Apr. 23, 1951. The current edition of the Royal Institute of British Architects form of conditions of contract applicable where quantities form part of the contract, adapted for the use of the council, applied to the contract, and the sub-contract was in the form approved by the National Federation of Building Trades Employers and the Federation of Associations of Specialists and Sub-Contractors. The date of the practical completion of the works was Oct. 25, 1952, and the end of the defects liability period, after which the architect's final certificate was to be given, was Apr. 25, 1953. In December, 1952, the company went into voluntary liquidation. Because of the dispute between the company and the applicants the architect had not yet issued his final certificate.

By the summons the applicants asked (a) for a declaration that the interest of the company in a sum of £787 now retained by the council as part of the retention moneys under the contract was fiduciary and as trustee for the applicants in accordance with cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract; (b) for a declaration that the company and its liquidator were bound in accordance with cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract to preserve entire the sum of £787 on receipt thereof by the liquidator from the council and to pay the same to the applicants, less a cash discount provided for by the sub-contract; (c) for a declaration that, in accordance with cl. 21 (c) of the contract, the council were entitled (i) on a certificate of their architect to pay to the applicants the sum of £600 which was directed to be paid to the applicants in a certificate issued by the architect to the company on July 16, 1952, but had not been paid, and (ii) to deduct the sum of £600, after having paid that amount to the applicants, from sums otherwise payable to the company under the contract; and (d) that, for the purposes of the application, the respondents, B. Finch and Co., Ltd., be appointed to represent all the creditors of the company other than the applicants and the London Electricity Board.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and J. S. Daniel for the applicants.

J. Montgomerie for the liquidator.

Stewart-Brown for the council.

Edwards, Q.C., and D. Lloyd for B. Finch & Co., creditors of the company.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is a summons taken out in the voluntary liquidation of the company asking for the determination of two matters. The company carried on the business of building contractors, and went into voluntary liquidation on Dec. 19, 1952. The company is insolvent.

On Jan. 15, 1951, the company entered into a building contract expressed to be made between the company, who were called the contractors, of the first part, Union Assurance Society, Ltd., as sureties, of the second part, and the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Ilford, to whom I will refer for convenience as "the council", of the third part. The object of the contract was the erection by the company for the council of fifty-seven flats on a particular site within the borough of Ilford. The contract price was £66,125 9s., and it was provided that the current edition of the Royal Institute of British Architects form of conditions of contract, applicable where quantities form part of the contract, adapted for the use of the council, should apply. Those conditions are in evidence before me. For the purpose of this judgment I only find it necessary to refer to a few of those conditions. Clause 21 provides:

"Where prime cost or provisional sums are included in the bills of quantities for persons to be nominated or selected by the architect to supply and fix materials or to execute work on the site, (a) such sums shall be deemed to include $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. cash discount and shall be expended in favour of such persons as the architect shall direct, and all specialists or others who have been nominated or selected by the architect are hereby declared to be sub-contractors employed by the contractor and are referred to in these conditions as 'nominated sub-contractors'. . . (b) The sums directed by the architect to be paid to nominated sub-contractors for work, materials or goods comprised in the sub-contract shall be paid by the contractor within fourteen days of receiving from the architect a certificate including the value of such work, materials or goods less only (i) any retention money which the contractor may be entitled to deduct, and (ii) a cash discount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. (c) Before any such certificate is issued to the contractor he shall, if requested by the architect, furnish to him reasonable proof that all nominated sub-contractors' accounts included in previous certificates have been duly discharged, in default whereof the employer may pay such accounts upon a certificate of the architect and deduct the amount so paid from any sums otherwise payable to the contractor . . . (e) Neither the existence nor the exercise of the foregoing powers nor anything else contained in these conditions shall render the employer in any way liable to pay any nominated sub-contractor."

Clause 24 deals with certificates and payments. By cl. 24 (a) and (b) it is provided:

"(a) At the period of interim certificates named in the appendix to these conditions interim valuations shall be made whenever the architect considers them necessary, and, subject to cl. 21 of these conditions, the architect shall issue a certificate stating the amount due to the contractor from the employer, and the contractor shall be entitled to payment therefor within the period named in the appendix. (b) The amount so due shall, subject to cl. 21 (c) of these conditions and to any agreement between the parties as to stage payments, be the total value of the work properly executed and of the materials and goods delivered upon the site for use in the works up to and including a date not more than seven days before the date of the said certificate, less the amount to be retained by the employer (as hereinafter provided) and less any instalments previously paid under this clause."

Clause 24 (c) provides for the amount which may be retained by the employer in virtue of the clause and which in the particular case was ten per cent. Then cl. 24 (d) provides:

"The amounts retained in virtue of this clause shall be dealt with in the following manner: On practical completion of the works, and subject to cl. 17 of these conditions, the architect shall issue a certificate for one moiety of the total amounts so retained and the other moiety shall be paid to the contractor upon the issue of the architect's final certificate."

By cl. 24 (f) it is provided:

"Upon expiration of the defects liability period stated in the appendix to these conditions or upon completion of making good defects under cl. 12 of these conditions, whichever is the later, the architect shall issue a final certificate of the value of the works executed by the contractor and such final certificate, save in cases of fraud, dishonesty or fraudulent concealment relating to the works or materials or to any matter dealt with in the certificate and save as regards all defects and insufficiencies in the works or materials which a reasonable examination would not have disclosed, shall be conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of the said works and materials."

A

One of the nominated sub-contractors was the applicants, and they were nominated by the architect, so that the company had no choice in their selection, but in accordance with the usual practice there was brought into existence between the company and the applicants a sub-contract, dated Apr. 23, 1951, in the form approved by the National Federation of Building Trades Employers and the Federation of Associations of Specialists and Sub-Contractors. That sub-contract provides in the usual way for the execution by the sub-contractor of the sub-contract works, which are described as:

"Construction 'Helicon' hollow tile and reinforced concrete fire resisting floors and roofs, reinforced concrete landings and staircases, etc., for fifty-seven flats . . ."

C

On the sub-contract there is, I think, very little to which I need refer. By cl. 10 provision is made for the price of the sub-contract works, on which nothing really relevant turns. By cl. 11 it is provided:

D

"(a) The contractor shall subject to and in accordance with the main contract from time to time make application . . . to the architect for certificates of payment and for the inclusion therein of the amount which at the date thereof fairly represents the value of the sub-contract works and of any variations authorised under this sub-contract then executed and of the materials and goods delivered upon the site for use in the sub-contract works . . . (b) Within fourteen days of the receipt by the contractor of any certificate from the architect the contractor shall notify and pay to the sub-contractor the amount certified therein to be due in respect of the sub-contract works and any authorised variations thereof, less retention money, that is to say, the proportion attributable to the sub-contract works of the amount retained by the employer in accordance with the main contract, and less a cash discount of 2½ per cent., if payment is made within fourteen days as aforesaid."

I can now pass on to cl. 11 (h), observing in passing that cl. 11 (g) links up with cl. 21 of the main contract. Clause 11 (h) reads:

H

"If and to the extent that the amount retained by the employer in accordance with the main contract includes any retention money the contractor's interest in such money is fiduciary as trustee for the sub-contractor and if the contractor attempts or purports to mortgage or otherwise charge such interest or his interest in the whole of the amount retained as aforesaid (otherwise than by floating charge if the contractor is a limited company), the contractor shall thereupon immediately set aside and become a trustee for the sub-contractor of a sum equivalent to the retention money and shall pay the same to the sub-contractor on demand; provided that upon payment of the same to the sub-contractor the amount due to the sub-contractor upon final payment under this sub-contract shall be reduced accordingly by the amount so paid."

By cl. 13:

"The contractor shall notwithstanding anything in this sub-contract contained be entitled to deduct from or set off against any money due from him to the sub-contractor (including any retention money) any sum or sums which the sub-contractor is liable to pay to the contractor under this sub-contract."

On Sept. 19, 1952, the nineteenth certificate report was given, and it is necessary that I should refer shortly to that. Under the heading "Builder's Work", the certificate sets out "Estimated value of builder's work, £45,156," to which is added, "Estimated value of unfixed materials, £25," giving a total, in round figures of £45,181, which shows that the certificate covers the whole of the work up to that date, Sept. 19. Then there is set out a list of the nominated sub-contractors, the second of which is the applicants. Their type of work is described as "reinforced concrete floors, etc.," and the amount against their name is £7,876. A comparison with the previous certificate shows that at the date of the previous certificate the amount in their case was £7,276, so that they had earned another £600 in the interim. Then there follows a list of nominated suppliers, and a total of £67,355, from which is deducted retention money at the rate of ten per cent., £6,735, leaving £60,620. Then there is the legend:

"Add retention released on completed blocks and increased costs of nominated suppliers, £2,660."

There follows a note which says:

"Payments on account have not been deducted. A copy of this report has been forwarded to the contractor. All nominated sub-contractors and nominated suppliers have been notified of the amounts due to them in respect of this report."

According to the evidence before me, the date of the practical completion of the works was about Oct. 25, 1952, so that on that basis the end of the defects liability period, six months after the date of practical completion, would be Apr. 25, 1953. It is clear from the evidence that the work has been completed, and that, notwithstanding the liquidation of the company, the council did not take over the completion of the contract as they would have been entitled to do under the conditions, and the architect is now in a position to issue his final certificate, but has held up taking that course because of the present dispute. What has happened is that the applicants have raised two points. (i) They say that they are entitled to a declaration that in accordance with cl. 21 (c) of the main contract, i.e., the contract between the company and the council, the council are entitled to pay to the applicants the balance remaining unpaid of amounts included in previous certificates given in favour of the applicants. (ii) They ask for a declaration to the effect that the company is trustee of any retention money, i.e., as defined in cl. 11 (b) of the sub-contract, where the phrase has a narrower meaning, and that, in effect, either the retention money, when it becomes payable, should be paid direct to the applicants, or that, if it comes into the liquidator's hands, he is bound at once to pay it over to the applicants.

Primarily, both questions turn on the construction of these two documents. The first question that I am going to deal with appears to me to turn entirely, so far as construction is concerned, on cl. 21 of the main contract. It appears from what I have read of the clause that the scheme is that the sums referred to in para. (a) are to be expended in favour of such persons as the architect shall direct, including nominated sub-contractors. In order to carry that out, there is set up the machinery which starts in para. (b), where it is provided that the sums directed by the architect to be paid to nominated sub-contractors for work, materials or goods comprised in the sub-contract shall be paid by the contractor within fourteen days. In para. (c) the reference to "such certificate" is clearly back to the certificate referred to in the latter part of para. (b), i.e., a certificate including the value of such work, materials or goods, namely, the work, materials or goods referred to in the earlier part of para. (b).

less only any retention money which the contractor may be entitled to deduct and the cash discount. On that basis para. (c) proceeds to provide that the architect has the right, before he issues the certificate, to ascertain from the company whether the company has duly discharged the amounts due to the nominated sub-contractors under previous certificates, with the consequence that, if the architect makes the inquiry and finds that the company has not made those payments, then the council has a right—and the matter is entirely one for the council—to pay such accounts on a certificate being duly given by the architect, and, as mere necessary machinery, to deduct the amount so paid from any sums otherwise payable to the company. The point which has been made by counsel for other creditors, on behalf of the general body of creditors, is that the certificate there referred to can only be an interim certificate and cannot be a final certificate, and he seeks to establish that point by the interpretation which he places on cl. 24. For the purpose of establishing the point, he has to satisfy me that each certificate deals only with work done and money earned since the date of the last certificate, but, in my judgment, there are two points against that. First, it appears to me that the language of cl. 24 (b) is directly against that construction because it says that:

A “The amount so due [i.e., the amount of the certificate] shall . . . be the total value of the work properly executed and of the materials and goods delivered upon the site for use in the works up to and including a date not more than seven days before the date of the certificate.”

B Secondly, when one considers the form of certificate, to which I have already sufficiently fully referred, it appears clear that the certificate does not proceed on that basis, but on the basis indicated by the language in cl. 24 (b) which I have just read. It, therefore, seems to me as a matter of construction that cl. 21 (c) is apt to cover, not only interim certificates, but a final certificate.

C On that basis it appears to me that this case is covered by the decision of BIGHAM, J., in Re Wilkinson. Ex parte Fowler (1). In that case, in September, 1903, A. signed a contract with a local authority to construct sewage works at a price to be paid to him by monthly instalments, less ten per cent., on the certificate of the engineer of the local authority, the ten per cent. to be retained and paid to A. six months after completion of the works. The contract also provided that certain machinery for the works was to be supplied to A. by specified firms, and cl. 54 provided:

D “If the engineer shall have reasonable cause to believe that the contractor is unduly delaying proper payment to the firms supplying the machinery, he shall have power if he thinks fit to order direct payment to them . . .”

E Pausing there, it will be seen that for all practical purposes that clause corresponds to cl. 21 (c) of the main contract in the present case. In October, 1904, G A. was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. At that date the contract was substantially completed, and there was then due under it the sum of £1,574 15s. 10d. only, of which £1,349 17s. 8d. was retention money and £224 18s. 2d. was a sum payable on the engineer's next certificate, and these two sums were claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy. At that date A. owed £836 8s. 9d. in various amounts to the specified firms for machinery supplied H to him for the works, and subsequently the engineer made two orders under cl. 54 directing payment of the £836 8s. 9d. out of the £1,574 15s. 10d. to the firms in settlement of their accounts. It was held (so far as material) that the power conferred by cl. 54 on the engineer was not annulled or revoked by the bankruptcy, and that the firms, by virtue of the two orders of the engineer, were entitled to be paid the £836 8s. 9d. out of the £1,574 15s. 10d. in priority to the claim of the trustee. It will be seen from that paraphrase of the headnote in Re Wilkinson. Ex parte Fowler (1) that it would be difficult to imagine a case which could more completely cover the present one. I think it is desirable to refer to a passage from the judgment of BIGHAM, J., because of the importance of the policy which underlies such a clause as this. BIGHAM, J., said ([1905] 2 K.B. 719):

"Now the contract contains a provision on which, in my judgment, the whole question turns. It is cl. 54 . . . That clause, in my opinion, is inserted in the contract for the benefit, not only of the people who supply the machinery, but also of the council itself. It is very much to the interest of the council to see that contracts of this kind for public works into which they enter are carried out in a manner satisfactory to all persons who are concerned in the performance of them. The council certainly may, and no doubt frequently do, make contracts of this kind, and they make them much more advantageously when the people who supply the machinery or other goods which are to be used by the contractor in the performance of the contract know that there is a reasonable probability that they will be paid. The council are enabled, by inserting a clause of this kind in their contract, to give a certain amount of confidence to people who supply goods to the contractor, and in that way they are placed in a better position when they come to make contracts again than they otherwise would be; and, therefore, I say that the clause is inserted, not only in the interests of the persons who supply goods to the contractor, but also in the interests of the council themselves."

BIGHAM, J., then proceeded to construe the clause, and he held that, notwithstanding the supervision of the bankruptcy, the clause remained in effect and that the two orders of the engineer were valid and effective orders. That case, as I say, covers this case. The council in this case have taken up what, in my view, is a very proper attitude, that is, they made it quite plain before the case came into this court that, if permitted to do so by the form of the judgment of the court, they would desire to exercise the power under cl. 21 (c) in respect of nominated sub-contractors. It so happens in this case that the figures show that there will be sufficient—so far as one can see, more than sufficient—to deal with all the claims of the nominated sub-contractors, without there being any necessity for abatement or apportionment. For those reasons, I propose, under para. (c) of the summons, to make the declaration for which the applicants ask in the modified form which I have indicated earlier in this judgment.

I now pass to a consideration of the other question, which turns on the sub-contract. That involves the construction of cl. 11, and particularly paras. (b) and (h). The first thing to do is to construe the clause so far as is necessary. Clause 11 (b) defines "retention money" as "the proportion attributable to the sub-contract works of the amount retained by the employer in accordance with the main contract, and less a cash discount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., if payment is made within fourteen days . . ."

Bearing in mind that definition of retention money, I turn to cl. 11 (h). On the face of it there are clear words used which are apt to create a trust which will operate by way of an equitable assignment of assets described as the contractor's interest in the retention money. It is said, first, that on a true construction of the document, which, of course, must be read as a whole, there is no trust, and nothing more than a running account. In support of that argument there is prayed in aid, for instance, cl. 13 of the sub-contract, which provides that the contractor shall be entitled to make certain deductions or set-offs from any sums, including any retention money, which he may be liable to pay to the sub-contractor. But such a clause as that appears to me not to affect the matter one way or another. It cannot, in the least, be decisive, because it appears to me to be a perfectly normal and sensible provision to make, namely, that, against what the company may owe to the applicants as trustee, the company may set off moneys which may be owing by the applicants to the company. Then it is said that what is made the subject of the alleged trust is the contractor's interest in the money, but that he has no such interest in that money as can form the subject of a trust, and for that purpose great reliance was placed by counsel for the other creditors on Wilmot v. Alton (2).

A In that case, a trader, who carried on the business of a theatrical costumier, contracted with a company to supply dresses for a ballet and to keep them in repair for the sum of £40 a week for twelve weeks commencing from a certain date. She subsequently charged her right and interest under the contract in favour of the plaintiff as security for an advance made by him. The dresses were duly supplied to the company under the contract, but before any moneys became payable under it the trader became bankrupt. It was held by the B Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., that the charge in favour of the plaintiff gave no title as against the defendants, the trustees in bankruptcy, to moneys which might become due under the contract after the bankruptcy. In the course of his judgment, LORD ESHER, M.R., said ([1897] 1 Q.B. 20):

C "During the period contemplated by the contract she [the trader] became bankrupt. The effect of that was that she could no longer fulfil the contract. The trustee in bankruptcy in such a case may, if he thinks it for the benefit of the estate, carry on the business and the contract; but he is not obliged to do so. He would have a right to say that he would not have anything to do with the contract. If the trustee in this case had D done so, no moneys not already accrued due under the contract could after that become payable to any one under it. After the bankruptcy therefore no money would have become payable under the contract, unless the trustee had elected to go on with it, and to perform the conditions which by the terms of it were to be performed by the bankrupt. If he did go on with the contract, then in consideration of his doing so week by week the E sums of money payable under the contract would become due. Therefore the case stands thus. At the moment of the bankruptcy, there is, as regards sums to become payable in futuro under the contract, no debt due. There are amounts which may or may not become due according as the conditions of the contract are or are not fulfilled. In order to earn those amounts, the conditions of the contract must be fulfilled, and their fulfilment depends F upon the question whether the trustee in bankruptcy will go on with the contract or not."

That appears to me quite clearly to be a case illustrative of the established principle of bankruptcy law that it is impossible to assign the profits of a business earned after the bankruptcy. The reference in the later part of the G judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., to Ex parte Nichols. Re Jones (3) confirms this. That is not this case, because here I have a contract where there is a provision for the retention of retention moneys. They represent moneys already earned, though not yet payable. That situation appears to me to be conclusively covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Drew & Co. v. Josolyne (4). In that case a building contract provided for payments to be H made as the work proceeded and subject to the retention of twenty per cent. of the value of the work shown in each certificate. The contractors assigned a portion of the retention moneys to secure a debt, and notice of the assignment was given to the building owners. After making the assignment the contractors filed a petition for liquidation, the works then remaining incomplete. In the liquidation a trustee and committee of inspection were appointed. The trustee, in pursuance of the resolution of the committee of inspection, completed the work, himself advancing moneys for the purpose, of which an amount exceeding that of the retention moneys which had been assigned was still unpaid. There was no other asset from which he could be recouped. The trustee and the mortgagees both claimed the amount of the retention moneys which had been assigned, and on the interpleader issue to try the title to the moneys it was held, so far as is relevant for my purposes, that the assignment of the retention moneys held good as against the trustee, and that the mortgagees were, therefore, entitled to succeed. It may, I think, properly be said that that was a very strong case, because, as will be seen from the summary of the facts which I have given, the trustee himself advanced moneys for the purpose of completing the contract, yet he was not allowed in respect of those moneys to compete with the equitable assignee. LORD ESHER, M.R. (who gave the leading judgment in Wilmot v. Alton (2)) said (18 Q.B.D. 595): "This appears to me a very plain case." He then set out the facts quite shortly, and proceeded (ibid.):

"What then was the position of the trustee in liquidation? He was not obliged to carry out the contract. He might have said that he would have nothing to do with it. The trustee, however, had an option to go on with the contract. There could be no new contract without the building owners' consent. It would be a perversion of language to say that the law by giving power to the trustee to carry on the contract means that he may make a new contract. If he elects to go on with the work, he goes on under the old contract as the trustee of the liquidating debtors' estate and will take their rights under the contract subject to any valid assignment which they may have made of such rights. When the building owners refrained from taking the work out of the contractors' hands and the trustee elected to go on with it, the old contract, as it seems to me, continued in effect. The contract work went on and was completed, and the architect certified accordingly, under the old contract, and, thereupon, if there had been no question of any assignment, the building owners would have been bound to pay the retention moneys over to the trustee. But there had been an equitable assignment of a portion of those moneys by the contractors before the liquidation, of which the building owners had notice; and in consequence they are bound to pay such portion of them to the assignees."

BOWEN, L.J., said (ibid., 597):

"The truth is that the trustee simply carried on the contract of the liquidating debtors. It may be that the trustee or his firm found the money which enabled the contract to be carried on and completed, without which the retention moneys would not have become payable, but that was his own affair, and could not give him any priority over the equitable assignees of the retention moneys; nor do I see that anything else took place to give him such priority. The old contract continued to subsist and the assignment by the contractors of the retention moneys to become due under it still held good."

Finally, I refer to the observations of FRY, L.J., towards the beginning of his judgment (ibid., 598):

"Here there was a building contract under which the contract price was to be paid in the usual way, viz., by payments on account upon the certificates of an architect and payment of the balance after completion of the work. The builders mortgaged a portion of the retention moneys to become payable to them. These moneys were the price of work already done, which however would not become payable till the whole of the work was completed. The mortgagors of those moneys could not set up a title to be recouped the moneys expended in completing the contract in priority to their own assigns, nor could any person claiming under them. The trustee comes in under the mortgagors as trustee of their estate, and the committee of inspection request him to carry on the contract upon which the liquidating debtors were engaged at the time of the liquidation. If this contract was so carried on, then the trustee so carrying it on claims under the mortgagors and could not claim anything expended in completing the contract against their mortgagees of the retention moneys."

A Those passages appear to me completely to cover the case before me on this question. They show, to my mind beyond doubt, that the company, under the main contract, had, in the retention moneys, an interest which it could make the subject of a valid equitable assignment, and that, in my view, it has effectively done by the language of cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract. Therefore, for those reasons, I shall propose to make a declaration under paras. (a) and (b) of the summons to the effect of this judgment, but not quite in the form asked because some question remains as to the exact figures. I think that probably
B the first declaration might take the form suggested by counsel for the applicants, namely, a declaration that the interest of the company in the retention money as defined in cl. 11 (b) of the sub-contract, being part of the moneys retained by the council in accordance with the main contract, is fiduciary, and that the company are trustees for the applicants in accordance with cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract. The exact form can be a matter for agreement between counsel.
C Then, under para. (b), I will make a declaration that the company and the liquidator are bound in accordance with the said cl. 11 (h) of the sub-contract to preserve entire the retention money on receipt thereof by the liquidator from the council and to pay the same to the applicants, less only the cash discount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. provided for by the sub-contract. Finally, as I have decided against the interest of the general body of creditors, I will make the D representation order asked for under para. (d) of the summons.

Order accordingly.

R. v. MISKELL.

[COURTS-MARTIAL APPEAL COURT (Hilbery, Sellers and Barry, JJ.), December 14, 15, 18, 1953.]

Court-Martial—Gross indecency—Attempt to procure—Relation to offence of acts charged.

The appellant was convicted of an attempt to procure an act of gross indecency with a male person after evidence had been given that he had spoken to a boy aged fourteen in the street, given him beer and ice cream in a café, and then gone into a park with him, and, while sitting there alone with him, had put his arm round the boy and said and done things which
G manifested his criminal purpose of inducing the boy to commit an act of gross indecency with him. He asked the boy to meet him the next night promising him a reward of money if he did so. The next night he met the boy at the suggested meeting place and invited him to go for a walk. The appellant was then arrested. The court took the view that the conduct of the appellant immediately before and at the time of the invitation
H manifested his purpose in inviting the boy to meet him the next night and go for a walk. The walk which had already taken place had been used for making indecent suggestions and overtures and such conduct made it manifest that the purpose of the invitation was that the boy and the appellant should act indecently together.

HELD: the invitation and the meeting were overt acts, and when they were considered in the light of the circumstances in which the invitation was issued and the meeting took place those acts were capable of being attempts to procure the boy to commit an act of gross indecency with the appellant.

APPEAL by leave of the court from the decision of a district court-martial at Hamburg by which the appellant, Corporal William John Victor Miskell, Army Catering Corps, was found guilty of attempting to procure an act of gross indecency with a male person and was sentenced to fifty-six days' detention and to be reduced to the ranks.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18. HILBERY, J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant was found guilty by district court-martial at Hamburg of attempted gross indecency with a male person and was sentenced to fifty-six days' detention and to be reduced to the ranks, and he appeals against that conviction by leave of the court.

The facts can be shortly stated. On the afternoon of May 16 a German boy was walking along a street in Hamburg when the appellant spoke to him. The appellant asked him to show him the way to the park. He then asked about a café and they went together to a café where the appellant gave the boy some beer and an ice cream. They then went to the park, and when in the park they sat on one of the seats for a few minutes. The appellant put his arm round the boy's shoulder, and with his hand dangling down his front, pointed at his private parts. The appellant then asked if he had a little one down there and said he had a big one. He also asked whether the boy had ever had sexual intercourse before, using the German word "gefickt". The appellant suggested that they might meet at some time at the station, and suggested the next day at seven o'clock, and that they might sleep out together in the park or forest at some time. The boy said he slept at home, but he agreed to meet the appellant, saying he would ask his father. The next day the appellant kept the appointment which had thus been arranged, and when he met the boy looked at his watch and said: "It is too late to go to the cinema; we'll take a walk". The police then arrested the appellant. All those facts were unchallenged by the appellant, and no evidence was offered by him or on his behalf. It was submitted that the evidence only amounted at the most to evidence of acts of preparation for procuring the commission of the offence and did not amount to evidence of an attempt to procure the commission. The same contention has been argued as the ground of appeal. No criticism of the summing-up by the judge-advocate was advanced by the appellant.

The sole question on which this appeal depends is whether the act or acts of the appellant could constitute as a matter of law an attempt to procure the boy to commit an act of gross indecency with the accused. It has long been established that whether an act or acts can amount to an attempt to commit a crime is a question of law. Once it is decided by the court that what an accused person has done can be an attempt to commit the crime, it is a question of fact for the jury whether what was done should be decided to have been an attempt. Not all acts which are steps towards the commission of a crime can be regarded as attempts. Some may be too far removed from the commission of the crime to be regarded as attempts to commit the crime, but just where the distinction is to be drawn between preliminary acts of preparation and acts which are nearly enough related to the crime to amount to attempts to commit it is often a difficult and nice question. This case, indeed, affords an example of the difficulty.

The principle to be applied by the court in deciding the question was stated by PARKE, B., in R. v. Eagleton (1). That statement of the principle was approved and followed in R. v. Robinson (2) and in R. v. Woods (3) in the following words (143 L.T. 312):

“The mere intention to commit a misdemeanour is not criminal. Some act is required, and we do not think that all acts towards committing a misdemeanour are indictable. Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are.”

The difficulty lies in the application of the principle to the facts: per LORD READING, C.J., in R. v. Robinson (2) ([1915] 2 K.B. 348). In R. v. Cope (4) where, as in this case, the charge was one of attempting to procure the commission of an act of gross indecency, LORD TREVETHIN, C.J., in the considered written judgment of the court, after pointing out that the letters in question which were said to be the acts constituting the attempt to procure did not contain an undisguised invitation to commit the offence, laid it down that in order to see whether the letters did contain such terms that Price (the addressee) would see in them an invitation to commit an act of gross indecency with the appellant, the surrounding circumstances might and should be examined.

The circumstances here were that the appellant had spoken to this boy in the street, had taken the boy to a café and given him beer and an ice cream, had then gone into a park with the boy, and there when sitting with him alone had said and done things which manifested his criminal purpose of inducing the boy to commit an act of gross indecency with him. After putting an arm round the boy and pointing to the boy's genital organ and asking if the boy had a little one there and saying he had a big one, he had followed this by suggesting that they should sleep out together in a park or the woods and had asked the boy in coarse terms whether he had ever had sexual intercourse. He had then asked the boy to meet him the next night, promising him a reward of ten marks if he did so, saying they could then go to a cinema or for a walk. The next night he went to the suggested meeting place and met the boy, and then, making the excuse that it was too late to go to a cinema, invited the boy to go with him for a walk. It is important to bear in mind that the question is not whether this invitation and meeting in the circumstances amounted to an attempt to commit an act of gross indecency. They could not be said to be that. The question is whether these acts of the appellant were acts to procure the commission of that offence. Applying the principle as stated, was there on these facts an act sufficiently proximate to procuring the boy to commit the offence to amount to an attempt to procure? It is a question, not whether there was an act of procuring, but whether there was an act which was an attempt to procure.

The conduct of the appellant immediately before and at the time of the invitation, in our view, manifested the purpose of the appellant in inviting the boy to meet him the next evening and in meeting him and inviting him to go for a walk. The walk which had already taken place had been used for making indecent overtures and suggestions. That conduct made manifest the purpose of the invitation and the meeting and the suggestion of another walk. That the appellant by his conduct and talk had intended to suggest to the boy that they should act indecently together can scarcely be doubted in view of the fact that the appellant himself said to the police after he was arrested:

"Well, what the boy said about Saturday night is all true, but I only met him tonight in order to put him off. I had no intention of doing what I suggested."

The law, however, punishes a man, not for a guilty intention, but for the overt act done as part of the carrying out of that intention. The intention of the appellant here was, undoubtedly, to procure an act of gross indecency with the boy. The invitation and the meeting were overt acts. When that invitation and meeting are considered in the light of the circumstances in which the invitation was issued and the meeting took place, it appears to us that those acts cannot be said to be incapable of being attempts to procure the boy to commit an act of gross indecency with the appellant. Once it is decided that they could be so regarded as a matter of law, then the question whether they were an attempt or not becomes one of fact for a jury, or, as in this case, for the court-martial.

In R. v. Cope (4) LORD TREVETHIN, C.J., said (86 J.P. 79):

"The letters in the present case obviously do not contain an undisguised invitation, nor is a code suggested, but it is said that they do contain terms which would have conveyed the invitation to the mind of their intended recipient as unmistakably as if it had been set out in express terms and that the jury have by convicting found that this is so."

He follows that observation by the passage which I have already quoted. Later on, he said (ibid.):

"We think that there was enough [in the letter] to entitle the jury to find that Price would have read into it an invitation to repeat with the appellant the offence which he had committed with Riley, and therefore that the sending of the letters was an attempt to procure Price . . ."

That invitation in that letter was no less remote from the procuring than the invitation given by the appellant in this case and the meeting in fulfilment of that invitation, coupled, as it was, with a further invitation to another walk. Here, as in R. v. Cope (4), in the circumstances which had occurred, the invitation in question was understood to be an invitation to an act of gross indecency, and the boy's father and the police were informed, and it is not contended that an invitation, however veiled, which in the circumstances is an invitation to commit an act of gross indecency, is not an attempt to procure such an act. For these reasons, the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WATT v. HERTFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Barry, J.), December 15, 16, 1953.]

Fire Brigade—Injury to fireman—Liability of fire authority—Injury by jack insecurely fixed in vehicle.

A The plaintiff, a fireman employed by the defendants, the county fire authority, was travelling in the back of a lorry to the scene of an accident. In the lorry there was a jack weighing between two and three hundred-weight. It was not possible to fix the jack in any way as the lorry was not fitted for it, the usual vehicle for carrying the jack not being available. The driver of the lorry was forced to apply his brakes suddenly which caused the jack to move forward and strike and injure the plaintiff.

B HELD: apart from statutory requirements, an employer was bound to exercise reasonable care to avoid exposing his employees to unnecessary risks, but what was "reasonable" depended on the circumstances and nature of the employment; a fireman voluntarily engaged himself in a type of employment involving much greater risks than did other types of employment, and fire authorities were entitled to require firemen to undertake far greater risks than those encountered in other employments; in C the circumstances the defendants were justified in using the lorry, and, speed being an essential requirement of the fire service, the plaintiff must have been prepared to take risks which other persons travelling in motor vehicles would not be required to take; and, accordingly, the plaintiff had not established that the accident was due to the defendants' negligence, and D his claim must fail.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff, William Frederick Watt, joined the fire service in 1939, and was employed by the defendants, the fire authority for Hertfordshire, as a fireman at Watford fire station. On July 27, 1951, while he was on duty at the fire station, an emergency call was received that a woman was trapped under a heavy E vehicle between two hundred and three hundred yards from the station. The officer in charge, Sub-officer Richards, left with one team of firemen for the scene of the accident, but, before doing so, he instructed the second team, of which the plaintiff was a member, to load the heavy lifting tackle, consisting of a large jack weighing between two and three hundredweights, on the flat floor of a Fordson lorry, the vehicle equipped for the carriage of the jack not being avail- F able. The jack, one end of which stood on four small castor wheels, was lifted on the floor towards the front of the lorry, and it was not possible to fix it in any way. The plaintiff and two other firemen got into the back of the vehicle, the two other firemen holding the jack in position. On the journey to the scene of the accident, the driver of the lorry was forced suddenly to apply the brakes, which threw the plaintiff and the other two firemen in the back off their balance G and caused the end of the jack which was supported by the castor wheels to move forward, striking the plaintiff's ankle and causing him injury.

Viscount Hailsham, Q.C., and Roland Brown for the defendants.

H BARRY, J., stated the facts and continued: The principal question which I have to decide is whether the plaintiff has established that this accident was due to the negligence of his employers. It is conceded by counsel for the defendants that, if the peculiar considerations associated with the fire service were to be eliminated and the case treated as an ordinary one of master and servant in some commercial enterprise, the defendants would have failed to have taken reasonable care to secure the safety of their workman. It is unnecessary to say much as to this aspect. This lorry has a plain, flat floor with drop-down sides, and a tail-board about one foot, six inches deep. There is on the lorry floor and on the side or tail-boards nothing to which any ropes or wires could be attached, and, in these circumstances, it seems impracticable to have lashed this heavy jack to the floor of the lorry in any effective manner. The jack being highly mobile—particularly at the end supported by the castors—any careful employer must have foreseen that, if the jack were carried on the back of the lorry and merely steadied by the hands of two men, there was very considerable danger of its shifting on some sudden movement of the lorry, such as a violent swerve or a violent application of the brakes, and, if it did shift, having regard to its weight, it would not be difficult to foresee that it was liable to cause considerable injury to anyone who happened to be on the lorry floor. Those matters are conceded, but I have to look at the special circumstances of the case.

The question which I have to answer is whether in the circumstances the defendants were negligent in requiring the plaintiff to travel on the floor of this lorry while this jack was being carried, unsupported by any platform and with its movement unchecked by any chocks on the floor or by any system of strapping or lashing. On the whole I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has failed to establish negligence on the part of his employers. As counsel for the defendants pointed out, and as counsel for the plaintiff conceded, an employer's obligations to his servants are not absolute obligations in the absence of some statutory requirement which may impose absolute obligations on him. The employer is bound to exercise reasonable care to avoid exposing those employed by him to unnecessary risks. As part of his duty it is also obvious that an employer must take reasonable care to provide his workmen with proper equipment for the work which they have to undertake. What is "reasonable", however, must depend on the circumstances and on the nature of the employment in which any particular servant may be engaged.

The plaintiff joined the fire service in 1939 and, in joining that service, it seems to me he voluntarily engaged himself in a type of employment which he knew involved very much greater risk than many other types of employment which he could have chosen. In fighting fires fire authorities are entitled to require their firemen to undertake, and their firemen gladly undertake, risks far greater than those which would be encountered in employments of a different kind. An employee is entitled to expect his employer to subject the scaffolding which he uses to minute scrutiny in order to ascertain that it is in every way safe for its purpose. Also he is entitled to require his employers to provide hand rails and other safety precautions which will reduce the risk of any accident to any man. Similar considerations do not apply to men engaged in fighting fires. It is inherent in their employment that they take risks in and about a building which a bricklayer or a builder's labourer would never be called on to undertake. In my judgment, someone in the plaintiff's position who joins the fire service must also be aware that, not only in actually fighting the fire, but in being transported to the place where the fire is taking place, he will be called on to take risks which other persons travelling in motor vehicles would not be required to undertake. The primary object of the whole service, of which the plaintiff, I am sure, is a most worthy member, is to save human life and property, and, to carry out those objects, speed is a most essential requirement.

I think counsel for the defendants is right when he says that no negligence has been established against Sub-officer Richards, or any of the other men who were working with the plaintiff at the fire station on the afternoon of this accident. Richards was faced with an emergency. I think that even vis-à-vis the plaintiff he was entitled to use his initiative and to do what he reasonably could to bring the necessary assistance to this injured woman in the shortest possible space of time. I think that in this emergency when there was a vehicle available he was entitled to use it even though he knew, or certainly ought to have known, that it was not ideally adapted for the use to which he proposed to put it. It has been suggested by counsel for the plaintiff that he might have detailed one or two of the firemen to drag this jack to the scene of the accident by hand. I do not know whether Sub-officer Richards had any exact information as to the distance between the scene of the accident and the station, but, even if he had, it seems to me it would clearly take longer to drag a heavy implement of this kind along the street or along the pavement than it would to transport it by lorry. This suggestion was not put to Sub-officer Richards, and for all I know there may be other reasons why he decided to utilise the lorry. Speed being the essential element, it seems to me that he was justified in making that decision. If, in fact, this woman had died as a result of some delay in bringing necessary equipment to the scene of her accident, her death would have weighed very heavily on Sub-officer Richards' conscience, and I think the same would apply to any of the others engaged at the Watford station. It is very forcibly argued by counsel for the plaintiff that, even though Sub-officer Richards might be under a duty to this injured woman as a member of the public to bring aid to her as soon as possible, that does not mean that, vis-à-vis the plaintiff and the other members of the brigade, he was entitled to use this lorry and to answer this call. He submitted that the defendants were not entitled to disregard the safety of their servants in an effort to save other people's lives or property. Counsel for the defendants agreed—and everyone must agree—that fire authorities are not entitled to subject their employees to unnecessary risk. The question here is: Was this risk unnecessary? In my judgment, it was not. This risk was an ordinary incident of the hazardous employment of a fireman. I think, in all the circumstances, it was a necessary risk and that Sub-officer Richards was entitled to call on the plaintiff and on the remainder of the plaintiff's team to travel in this lorry although it was carrying this jack which was quite clearly inadequately secured. The distance was a short one. The jack was being held in place by two firemen and, as I said, Richards was entitled to call on his men to undertake such risk as was involved in that with the object of bringing assistance to this injured woman in the shortest possible time. It is not said that there was anything improper in the way in which this jack was loaded on the lorry. It was agreed it could hardly have been loaded in any other way. Two firemen held it, and it is not suggested that they did not do their best to hold it secure, but, unfortunately, they, like the plaintiff, were thrown off their balance when the lorry brakes were suddenly applied.

It is also necessary to consider whether, even in the absence of any negligence on the part of Sub-officer Richards and the other men employed at the Watford station, the defendants, as a fire authority, were in breach of their duty to the plaintiff. It is said that the defendants ought to have foreseen that the Austin towing vehicle, which was properly equipped for carrying this jack, might be engaged on other work when the emergency call requiring the use of a jack was received. In these circumstances it is said that some other vehicle at the station should have been so equipped as to enable it to carry a heavy jack of this kind in safety or, failing any other vehicle being equipped with means of carrying this jack, counsel for the plaintiff suggests that the lorry which was temporarily in use at the fire station should have been fitted with some temporary device, such as chocks or clips, to enable the jack to be adequately secured to its floor. I have the evidence of Mr. Bottin, who is an assistant chief officer in the London Fire Brigade and a gentleman with vast experience. He tells me that in the London stations there is normally only one vehicle equipped for the transport of a jack of this kind. If that vehicle is away from the station, or is for any other reason unavailable for an emergency call, other steps have to be taken, or the assistance of some other adjoining or neighbouring station sought. I have indicated that emergency calls of this kind requiring the transport of a jack are extremely rare and I do not think that I could properly find negligence on the part of the defendants in failing to equip, as, possibly, they could have equipped, their pump-escape or their water tender with some clips or chocks for carrying the heavy lifting gear. Counsel for the defendants pointed out that examples of this kind can always be carried to absurd lengths. If two vehicles had been equipped for carrying this jack and both happened to be out of commission or unavailable, it could then be said that the fire authority was negligent in not having provided a third, and so on. I do not think that I can find negligence on the part of the defendants in having only one vehicle equipped for this purpose. In the ordinary course of events if that vehicle happened to be away from the station when an emergency call requiring the use of heavy lifting equipment arrived, as I have indicated, the normal course to take would be to invoke the assistance of some other station, but on this particular occasion an alternative course was open to Richards. There happened to be this lorry available, and he thought it right to use it in an endeavour to help this woman with the least possible delay. I think I would be doing a great disservice to the fire service as a whole if I were to hold that, in those circumstances the defendants were negligent or in breach of their duty to the members of the fire brigade.

I do not think that this is a case in which the defence of volenti non fit injuria has any real relevance. Counsel for the defendants preferred to put his case on the basis that the plaintiff had failed to prove, in the circumstances, any negligence on the part of his employers. I think that is how this case must be put and I think that the plaintiff has so failed.

I need hardly say that everyone must have the very greatest sympathy with the plaintiff in this disaster which has befallen him. I think it right to say, in the circumstances, that, in my considered opinion, this action was properly brought. I say that because I think, in the circumstances, it should not be held against the plaintiff that he has sought to make his employers liable for the injuries which he sustained. A difficult legal question arises and one which I think the plaintiff was perfectly entitled to have ventilated in the courts. In the circumstances I hope that his having done so will not prejudice his future employment with the defendants. However, I feel bound to say that his claim has failed and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

Alteration of title to chose in action—Proper law of policy.*

In 1929 Y. Co., an insurance company having its head office in England, constituted M., Ltd., their agents in Palestine under a power of attorney,

- B giving M., Ltd., wide powers to carry on the business of Y. Co. in Palestine and to contract and to issue, within certain limits, new policies without reference to the company in London. Under an insurance policy taken out in 1947 and issued in Palestine by the Haifa agency, who were subagents of Y. Co. properly appointed by M., Ltd., Y. Co. agreed to indemnify the plaintiffs against loss or damage caused through fire or riot up to £P.6,000

- C in respect of a garage and its contents owned by the plaintiffs and situated in Haifa, Palestine (later the State of Israel). On Jan. 18, 1948, the plaintiffs' premises were mined and blown up, and on Mar. 26, 1948, the plaintiffs left Haifa for Egypt and thereafter resided there. On Dec. 31, 1949, Y. Co. ceased to accept new business in Israel. Y. Co. admitted liability under the policy, but claimed that by virtue of Israeli emergency regulations of December, 1948, concerning the property of absentees, and

- D by virtue of the Israeli Absentees' Property Law, which came into force on Mar. 31, 1950, the sum due had vested in the Custodian of Absentee Property of the State of Israel. On Nov. 17, 1950, the plaintiffs issued a writ against Y. Co., who paid into court the sum due under the policy.
By an interpleader order of Jan. 11, 1952, the insured were made plaintiffs and the Custodian the defendant. On trial of the issue,

- E HELD: (i) the plaintiffs' claim against Y. Co. was for unliquidated damages, and constituted a chose in action which was situated where the damages were recoverable, i.e., where Y. Co. resided.

(ii) on the facts, having regard especially to the authority of the Haifa agency to enter into contracts on behalf of Y. Co. without submitting them to Y. Co. for approval, Y. Co. had a residence in Haifa up to Dec. 31,

- F 1949; Y. Co. resided in more than one country, but, on the terms of the policy and in view of the surrounding facts, the amount recoverable was primarily payable in Palestine; and, therefore, up to Dec. 31, 1949, the chose in action was situated in Palestine.

- G (iii) the proper law of the policy was lex loci contractus or lex loci solu- tionis, i.e., the law of the Mandated Territory of Palestine up to the date of the termination of the mandate, and, thereafter, the law of Israel.

Re Chesterman's Trusts ([1923] 2 Ch. 466) and Banco de Bilbao v. Sancha, Banco de Bilbao v. Rey ([1938] 2 All E.R. 253), considered.

(iv) it was proper, with the approval of both parties, for the court to construe the Israeli regulations of 1948 and the Law of 1950 without expert evidence being given; the Israeli rules of construction would be

- H assumed to be the same as the English rules; on construction, the chose in action consisting of the plaintiffs' claim was movable property within the terms of the regulations and became vested in the Custodian thereunder, and it remained vested in the Custodian under the Law of 1950; and, therefore, the Custodian was entitled to the money due under the policy.

INTERPLEADER ISSUE.

On Nov. 21, 1947, the Yorkshire Insurance Co., Ltd., issued at their "Haifa agency" a policy of insurance which covered a garage and its contents belonging to the plaintiffs at 130 Jaffa Road, Haifa, against damage or loss caused by fire and riot up to £P.6,000. The policy was on the ordinary fire policy form of the insurance company with certain additions, suitable for use in Great Britain and elsewhere. On Jan. 18, 1948, the plaintiffs' garage and workshops were mined and blown up, and the contents to which the policy related were destroyed. On Mar. 26, 1948, the plaintiffs left Haifa for Egypt and thereafter resided and carried on business in Cairo. After some correspondence between the plaintiffs' solicitors and the insurance company, the company eventually admitted liability under the policy for £5,039 4s., but contended that they were unable to pay the money to the plaintiffs except in Israeli currency and were bound to pay it to the Custodian of Absentee's Property of the State of Israel by virtue of Israeli emergency regulations of December, 1948, concerning the properties of absentees, and the Absentee Property Law of Israel which came into force on Mar. 31, 1950. The plaintiffs insisted that the company should withhold payment until the situation had been clarified and that on no account should payment be made in Haifa. On Nov. 17, 1950, the plaintiffs issued a writ against the company, and by an interpleader order made on Jan. 11, 1952, the insured were constituted as plaintiffs in the issue and the Custodian of Absentee's Property of the State of Israel as defendant. The sum paid into court by the company, after deduction of its costs, amounted to £4,962 19s. 9d. D

For the purpose of determining the effect of the Israeli Law and regulations, HIS LORDSHIP stated in detail the position of the company with regard to their agents in Israel. On Nov. 12, 1929, the company gave a power of attorney (which remained in force at all material times) to Messrs. Mulford & Co. of Jerusalem, Palestine. By that power of attorney the company constituted Messrs. Mulford & Co. E

"to be the true and lawful attorneys of the company in Jerusalem, Palestine, for and in the name and on behalf of the said company and for F the several intents and purposes following, that is to say, carry on, conduct and manage the business of the fire, marine and all classes of accident, including workmen's compensation, insurance, in Palestine, and Trans-jordania, upon such conditions and at such rates of annual or other premiums and according to such regulations and directions in all respects as shall for the time being be prescribed and directed by the official letters of instruction now or from time to time hereafter to be sent to the said attorneys signed by the general manager for the time being or other official duly appointed by the board of directors of the said company."

H

Messrs. Mulford & Co. were also given power

B

"to receive and collect moneys payable for premiums and otherwise, to sue for sums due, to adjust, settle questions and claims upon policies and to give receipts for them, to compound in respect of debts or sums of money, claims or demands, to effect, sign and execute all such policies of insurance issued on behalf of the said company as to the said attorneys shall seem meet such policies being always according to the forms provided by the said company, and from time to time to appoint a substitute or substitutes for all or any of the purposes aforesaid."

By virtue of the power of substitution, Messrs. Mulford & Co. ("Mulford's") appointed sub-agents with whom the insurance company had no direct contact. One of the sub-agents was called "Near East Insurance Offices" which His LORDSHIP found was the "Haifa agency" at which the policy in question had been issued. Mulford's had authority by themselves and their sub-agents to give interim cover and to renew policies and within certain limitations to issue new policies of the insurance company without referring the matter to the company in London. Payment was normally made in the place where the issuing sub-agent transacted his business. It was proved in evidence that up to certain amounts and for certain risks Mulford's had power to transact business on the company's behalf as if the company was actually present in Palestine. The company had assets in Palestine and a deposit was held in Barclays Bank, London, to the order of the Accountant-General of the Palestine government. It was also proved that Mulford's carried on business at addresses in Jerusalem and Haifa which were now part of the State of Israel. After Dec. 31, 1949, the company ceased to accept new business in the State of Israel and after that date Mulford's continued to act as agents for settling old claims and generally for the purpose of winding-up the company's business in Israel. There was no evidence to prove whether or not after Dec. 31, 1949, Mulford's had authority to conclude settlements of claims without referring them to the company. On behalf of the company it was admitted that the policy was effective in a part of Palestine which became part of the State of Israel, and was issued by a branch or agents of the company in Palestine, later Israel.

E

The survey report of the damage to the plaintiffs' property was forwarded to the company in England and correspondence as to payment of the money claimed under the policy was conducted by the plaintiffs (from Egypt) with the company's head office in London, and the company finally admitted liability in the sum of £5,039 4s. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was contended that the defendant, the Custodian, falsely claimed that the sum due under the policy was money payable to him. On behalf of the defendant it was contended that the local situation of any debt payable by the insurers under the policy was in Israel and that by virtue of the Israeli regulations of 1948 and the Law of 1950 the sum in question had vested in the defendant and that it would be illegal for the company to pay it to anyone but the defendant as the plaintiffs were resident in Egypt and "absentees" within the meaning of the regulations.

H

His LORDSHIP decided that the burden of proof lay on the defendant and also held that the strained relations between Israel and the Arab States at the appropriate times could be judicially noticed, although evidence would be required, if necessary, to establish the dates of the commencement and cessation of hostilities between Israel and the Arab States and their exact legal and diplomatic relationship. HIS LORDSHIP referred to McQuaker v. Goddard (1).

Megaw, Q.C., and I. C. Baillieu for the plaintiffs.

Leonard Caplan for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult. A

Nov. 27. PEARSON, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: As questions will arise under the regulations and the Law whether the plaintiffs' claim against the insurance company, which, according to the defendant's contention, became vested in him, was "property" within the meaning of the relevant provisions, and whether it was a "mere right to claim damages", it is necessary to consider the legal nature of the claim and what, if any, situation it had at the material times. B

It is established by many decided cases that such a claim as this is a claim for unliquidated damages: Grant v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co. (2); Hardcastle v. Netherwood (3); Castelli v. Boddington (4) (assumption on a valued policy of marine insurance; averment of partial loss by perils of the sea; breach; non-payment thereof.); Luckie v. Bushby (5); Lloyd v. Fleming, Lloyd v. Spence (6); Pellas v. Neptune Marine Insurance Co. (7); Swan & Cleland's Graving Dock & Slipway Co. v. Maritime Insurance Co. & Croshaw (8); Baker v. Adam (9); William Pickersgill & Sons, Ltd. v. London & Provincial Marine & General Insurance Co., Ltd. (10). Such a claim is unliquidated because the plaintiff has to prove the amount, and even after an adjustment of the amount the plaintiff (unless he chooses to sue on an account stated) must still prove the amount, using the adjustment as evidence because it involves an admission by the insurer, but such evidence might be rebutted, for instance, by proof of a mistake: Luckie v. Bushby (5). But the word "damages" is puzzling and seems to be used in a rather unusual sense, because the right to indemnity arises, not by reason of any wrongful act or omission on the part of the insurer (who did not promise that the loss would not happen or that he would prevent it) but only under his promise to indemnify the insured in the event of a loss. The usual meaning of the word "damages" is as stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 10, p. 82, para. 100, where it is said: C D

"Damages may be defined as the pecuniary compensation which the law awards to a person for the injury he has sustained by reason of the act or default of another, whether such act or default is a breach of contract or a tort; or, put more shortly, damages are the recompense given by process of law to a person for the wrong that another has done him." E F

On the other hand, there is an interesting footnote on p. 1 of MAYNE ON DAMAGES, 11th ed. The first sentence of the text is: G

"Damages are the pecuniary satisfaction obtainable by success in an action."

The footnote is:

"MAYNE's definition was intentionally wide to bring within the scope of his work actions for the price of goods, amounts payable under policies of insurance, dividends in bankruptcy and other cases where money is recovered otherwise than as compensation for a wrong. Lawyers generally distinguish, however, between debt and damages. Where under a contract, instrument or statute a person is entitled to a sum certain, either ascertained or capable of being ascertained, the sum constitutes a debt and can be recovered as such; but failure to pay a debt when due is a wrong and an action may be framed either for the debt or for damages." H

The explanation of the use of the expression "unliquidated damages" to describe a claim for an indemnity under an insurance policy may be wholly or partly afforded by the old form of pleading in assumpsit, alleging a breach by non-payment, as in Castelli v. Boddington (4). But, as the only wrong admitted by the insurer is his failure to pay a sum due under a contract, the amount of which has to be ascertained, he seems to be in much the same position as the person who owes and has failed to pay a reasonable price for goods sold and delivered or a reasonable remuneration for work done or services rendered. The claim is for unliquidated damages, but the word "damages" is used in a somewhat unusual sense.

The claim for indemnity under an insurance policy after a loss has occurred is not a proper subject for a garnishee order: Randall v. Lithgow (11); Israelson v. Dawson (12), where SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1933] 1 K.B. 304):

"I have come to the conclusion that as between assured and underwriter there is no debt. There may be a breach of contract or an obligation to indemnify, but there is nothing which can be called a debt or an indebtedness within the meaning of Ord. 45, r. 1."

But such a claim for indemnity is a chose in action which can be assigned: Lloyd v. Fleming (6) and Swan's case (8); Green v. Brand (13); English & Scottish Mercantile Investment Co. v. Brunton (14); Bank of Toronto v. St. Lawrence Fire Insurance Co. (15); A.S. Tallina v. Estonian State Steamship Line (16); HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 18, p. 495, note (g).

Reference was made to condition No. 14 of the policy, giving the insurance company an option to reinstate, and to condition No. 11, requiring the insured to give due notice of his claim with proper particulars, and afterwards to give all such further particulars and documents and information as might be reasonably required by or on behalf of the insurance company, and, providing that "no claim under this policy shall be possible unless the terms of this condition have been complied with."

But the correspondence in this case from July 7, 1948, to Dec. 22, 1949, shows (i) that the insurance company never suggested that they wished to exercise their option to reinstate the property, and they impliedly elected not to do so; (ii) that the plaintiffs reported the loss to the insurance company's Haifa agent on the day of the loss, and a survey report was prepared after their expert had visited the site and was forwarded to head office in England, and the insurance company never asked for any further particulars or documents or information, and the amount of the indemnity was agreed between the plaintiffs and the insurance company by letters of Mar. 29, Oct. 18, and Nov. 11, 1949. Under condition No. 11 the right to be indemnified by a payment of money must accrue at some time and, in my judgment, it had accrued at any rate by Nov. 11, 1949, if not by some earlier date.

Next to be considered is the situation of the chose in action. It is established by the decided cases that not only debts, but also other choses in action, are for legal purposes localised and are situated where they are properly recoverable and are properly recoverable where the debtor resides: Stamps Comr. v. Hope (17) ([1891] A.C. 481, 482); Re Maudslay, Sons & Field (18) ([1900] 1 Ch. 609); R. v. Lovitt (19) ([1912] A.C. 218, 219); Favorke v. Steinkopff (20) ([1922] 1 Ch. 178); Swiss Bank Corp'n. v. Boehmische Industriale Bank (21) ([1923] 1 K.B. 678, et seq.); New York Life Insurance Co. v. Public Trustee (22); Sedgwick Collins & Co. v. Russia Insurance Co. of Petrograd (23) ([1926] 1 K.B. 15); England, Scottish & Australian Bank, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (24) ([1932] A.C. 243, et seq.); Sutherland v. German Property Administrator (25) (where the claim was against English shipowners for damages for breach of contract or in tort, and it was held to be a chose in action situated in England); the Tallina case (16) (where the claim was for payment under an English policy of marine insurance and was considered to be a chose in action situated in England); Re Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) (26).

A corporation resides in a country if it carries on business there at a fixed place of business, and, in the case of an agency, the principal test to be applied in determining whether the corporation is carrying on business at the agency is to ascertain whether the agent has authority to enter into contracts on behalf of the corporation without submitting them to the corporation for approval: Saccharin Corpn., Ltd. v. Chemische Fabrik von Heyden Akt. (27) ([1911] 2 K.B. 522, et seq.); Okura & Co., Ltd. v. Forsbacka Jernverks Akt. (28) ([1914] 1 K.B. 724); Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Societa di Navigazione A Vapore Del Lloyd Austria Co. (29). On the facts set out above I hold that the insurance company is proved to have had a residence in Haifa up to Dec. 31, 1949, but is not proved either to have had or not to have had a residence there after that date.

Where a corporation has residence in two or more countries, the debt or chose in action is properly recoverable, and, therefore, situated, in that one of those countries where the sum payable is primarily payable, and that is where it is required to be paid by an express or implied provision of the contract, or, if there is no such provision, where it would be paid according to the ordinary course of business: R. v. Lovitt (19); New York Life Insurance Co. v. Public Trustee (22). On the evidence in this case, the insurance policy was issued in Palestine at the Haifa agency and was in respect of property situated in Haifa. There was an option for the insurance company to reinstate the property and the sum to be paid was not to exceed a sum stated in Palestine currency, and any claim under such a policy would, according to the insurance company's ordinary course of business, have been settled by a payment at the Haifa agency. When all these facts are taken into account, it may be that there should be read into the policy an implied term that payment should be made in Palestine currency as currency and, therefore, in Palestine, being the only country in which that currency is legal tender. If there is no such term of the policy, still the natural and primary place of payment according to the ordinary course of business and the inferred expectations of the parties when the policy was issued is Haifa. I hold that the chose in action was properly recoverable, and, therefore, situated in Haifa up to Dec. 31, 1949, but its situation after that date is uncertain.

The defendant relies on the regulations of December, 1948, and the Law of March, 1950. The defendant's notice to admit facts, dated Oct. 3, 1952, set out inter alia, the following facts:

"(1) That the document entitled the Law and Administration Ordinance 5708-1948 Emergency Regulations Concerning Properties of Absentees, attached to this notice with annexed copy certificate by Haim Herman Cohn, then Attorney-General of Israel, and dated Oct. 18, 1950, is a true and accurate translation from the Hebrew language of a law passed by the competent legislative authority of Israel. (2) That the said law was a valid and effectual part of the law of Israel from Dec. 2, 1948, until Mar. 31, 1950. (3) That the document entitled the Absentees' Property Law 5710-1950, attached to this notice with annexed copy certificate by Haim Herman Cohn, then Attorney-General of Israel, and dated Dec. 13, 1950, is a true and accurate translation from the Hebrew language, of a law passed by the competent legislative authority of Israel. (4) That the said law is and has been a valid effectual part of the law of Israel since Mar. 31, 1950."

It was assumed and expressly or impliedly agreed by counsel for both parties at the hearing, and should be taken as established, that all the facts Nos. 1 to 4 are admitted, and, therefore, that the regulations were a valid and effectual part of the law of Israel from Dec. 2, 1948, to Mar. 31, 1950, and that the Law has been a valid and effectual part of the law of Israel since Mar. 31, 1950, and that the translations supplied are true and accurate.

A No witness was called to give expert evidence of Israeli law. The plaintiffs' counsel did not raise any objection on that ground, or contend that the defendant necessarily failed to prove his case by reason only of no such witness having been called. When I asked what the position was in that respect, I understood that both counsel on behalf of the parties desired that the regulations and the Law should be construed and applied without expert assistance, and it was their view or submission that that course could properly be taken. I have thought it right to verify that by reference to the authorities, and for that purpose have considered the following: Concha v. Murrieta, De Mora v. Concha (30) (40 Ch.D. 550, 551, 554); Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse (31) ([1923] 2 K.B. 643); Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz (32); Lazard Bros. & Co. v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (33) ([1933] A.C. 298); De Beeche v. South American Stores, Ltd. & Chilean Stores, Ltd. (34) ([1935] A.C. 158, 159); Re Cohn (35); the Tallina case (16) (80 Lloyd's Rep. 107, 113, 116), and DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., at pp. 73 and 868.

C I think that it appears from the reports of Re Cohn (35) that in that case UTHWATT, J., construed and applied a provision of the German Code without having had any oral evidence of German law, and if that is so it affords a precedent for this case. Also there is a passage at p. 868 of DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, where it is said:

D "How far can judges examine foreign laws for themselves? On this point it is impossible to lay down any absolute rule, the courts wisely having avoided any pronouncement which might unduly fetter their discretion. They recognise as obvious the impossibility in normal cases of judges forming any useful opinion on foreign law except on the basis of expert evidence, but by a prudent exercise of common sense they have shown themselves

E willing to waive proof by experts where such is manifestly unnecessary, as, for instance, on points which must be formally proved, but need really no expert testimony, which may be costly or difficult to procure."

In the circumstances I think it right in accordance with the wishes of the parties to face the task of construing and applying the regulations and the Law without the assistance of an expert in Israeli law and subject also to the disadvantage that the documents which I have to construe and apply are translations from the original Hebrew text. I did not feel entitled or qualified to look through volumes of Palestine or Israeli ordinances or statutes or law reports as they were not in evidence and I would not know which of the ordinances or statutes were still in force or which of the reported decisions were still good law at any material time. It must be assumed that the Israeli rules

G of construction are the same as the English rules of construction.

[His LORDSHIP then considered the construction of the emergency regulations of 1948 and of the Law of 1950. He held that the chose in action was movable property within the terms of the regulations and was expressly vested in the Custodian by the regulations. The Law of 1950 replaced the emergency regulations, but the Law was to be read as one with the regulations, which were to

H be deemed to be a law amended by the Law of 1950. The chose in action was "property" within the Law of 1950, and the vesting in the Custodian was not disturbed by the said Law. In general, the Law of 1950 did not (subject to some possible exceptions) apply to property situate outside Israel: MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 10th ed., p. 144; Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Slatford (36); A.-G. v. Campbell (37); Colquhoun v. Brooks (38); R. v. Jameson (39); Tomalin v. S. Pearson & Son, Ltd. (40); but it was not proved that the chose in action ceased to be situated in Israel by Mar. 31, 1950, or at any time. The removal of personal property to another country after vesting in the State did not cause it to cease to be so vested: Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz (32). HIS LORDSHIP continued:] I hold, therefore, that the defendant succeeds in this issue, because the chose in action became vested in the defendant under the regulations of 1948 and remained vested in the defendant under the Law of 1950.

It is right, however, to say something about a contention of counsel for the defendant, to which much argument was directed on both sides, because, if his contention is correct, the case should be decided in his favour on a different ground. He contended that the law by which a debt or chose in action can properly be affected (whether by discharge or modification or transfer of the right) is the proper law of the contract rather than the lex situs. Counsel for the plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that the only law by which a debt or chose in action can properly be so affected is the lex situs. The problem arises because a debt or chose in action can be regarded in two ways: (i) it can be regarded properly as movable property, and when so regarded it naturally falls under the lex situs; (ii) it can be regarded as a still unperformed obligation under a contract, and, therefore, it might be still subject to the proper law of the contract and liable to be discharged or altered by that law. A legislative provision that a debt or a chose in action owing to A shall be discharged by payment to B could be regarded either as involving a transfer of the ownership of the property from A to B, or as an alteration of the contractual obligation by substituting B for A and as the obligee.

I am inclined to think that there is a short answer to the contention of counsel for the defendant in this case. The Israeli Law of 1950 is, on the face of it, a law dealing with property and not with contract, and, therefore, it should be construed as applying only within those territorial limits which are appropriate to property legislation. Accordingly, an initial vesting under that Law could only be of a property situated in Israel, and if counsel for the defendant had to show that this chose in action was caught de novo by the Law of 1950, he would fail to do so for want of proof that the chose in action was situated in Israel at or after the time when the Law came into force.

I have, however, considered more generally the authorities relied on by counsel for both sides in support of their respective contentions. I will take first the principal authorities on the defendant's side. In the early cases to which he referred either no distinction or no clear distinction was drawn between the proper law and the lex situs, the distinction being avoided by the use of such phrases as "a debt or liability arising in any country". On this point, the beginning of the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Potter v. Brown (41) should be compared with the latter part of his judgment, and with the judgment of LAWRENCE, J., in the same case. In Ellis v. M'Henry (42) the judgment of the court, which comprised BOVILL, C.J., WILLES, KEATING, and BRETT, JJ., was delivered by BOVILL, C.J., who said (L.R. 6 C.P. 234), referring to certain previous authorities:

"In the first place, there is no doubt that a debt or liability arising in any country may be discharged by the laws of that country, and that such a discharge, if it extinguishes the debt or liability, and does not merely interfere with the remedies or course of procedure to enforce it, will be an effectual answer to the claim, not only in the courts of that country, but in every other country. This is the law of England, and is a principle of private international law adopted in other countries. It was laid down by LORD KING, in Burrows v. Jemino (43); by LORD MANSFIELD in Ballantine v. Golding (44); by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Potter v. Brown (41); by the Privy Council, in Odwin v. Forbes (45), and in Quelin v. Moisson (46); and by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Gardiner v. Houghton (47); and by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the elaborate judgment delivered by my brother WILLES, in Phillips v. Eyre (48)."

But he also said (ibid., 237):

A "There are nice distinctions which may sometimes arise where, though a contract is made in one country, it is to be performed or to take effect in another; or is made under circumstances which show that it is intended to be subject to some law other than that of the place in which it was made; Lloyd v. Guibert (49). But no such point arises in these cases, as the contracts out of which these debts arose were both made and to be performed in Upper Canada."

B In Perry v. Equitable Life Assurance Society of U.S.A. (50), the plaintiff had, in May, 1903, taken out a twenty-years endowment life assurance policy for ten thousand roubles, which were payable at the defendants' office in St. Petersburg, and the terms of an Imperial Decree provided that all disputes which might arise in connection with the assurance operations carried on by the defendants in Russia should be settled according to the Russian laws and in the Russian courts of justice. On Nov. 18, 1919, the Soviet government issued a Decree of Cancellation of which the material provisions were (45 T.L.R. 470):

C "(1) Life assurance in all its forms in the R.S.F.S.R. shall be abolished. (2) All contracts entered into with insurance companies and savings banks for the purpose of life insurance are annulled. (3) All insurance premiums shall be transferred to the revenue of the Treasury."

BRANSON, J., said (ibid.):

D "The first question is what is the proper law of the contract. In my opinion there is no doubt about the answer. The proper law of the contract is the law of Russia. This appears plainly from condition 7 . . . The proper law of the contract being Russian, the next question, which is one of fact, to be decided upon the evidence, is what has been the effect of the Soviet legislation upon the contract."

E After considering the evidence as to Russian law, he said (ibid., 473):

F "Upon these grounds I accept the evidence as to Russian law of Professor Sack and Mr. Konkievitch, and find, in accordance with it, that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants was annulled by the Cancellation Decree, if, indeed, there was any contractual nexus left in existence between them after the Monopolisation Decree came into force in December, 1918, and the plaintiff cannot recover upon it."

G That is a clear decision that a contract can be annulled, the contractual nexus between the parties can be dissolved, by legislation of the country whose law is the proper law of the contract. It is to be observed, however, that as no payment would have become due under the policy before 1923, and the contract was annulled in 1919, if not earlier, no chose in action had arisen, so there was nothing to which any lex situs could apply.

In R. v. International Trustee for Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft (51) the headnote reads:

H "In 1917 the British government made an offer in New York of 5½ per cent. secured loan convertible gold notes, the principal and interest of which and of the bonds into which they might be converted were to be payable, without deduction for British taxes, in New York in United States gold coin, or, at the option of the holder, in London, in sterling at the fixed rate of 4.86½ dollars to the pound. The offer was made 'subject to the approval by our counsel of necessary formalities.' The respondents were the holders of a bond, in exchange for a note, by which the British government promised to pay one thousand dollars on Feb. 1, 1937, either in New York, at the office or agency to be maintained there by them, in gold coin of the United States of the standard of weight and fineness existing in February, 1917, or in London in sterling money at the fixed rate of 4.86½ dollars to the pound. The payment was to be made without deduction for any British taxes. In 1933 by a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, which it was admitted had the force of law, it was provided that every provision contained in any obligation which purported to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, was against public policy, and that any such obligation should be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment was legal tender for public or private debts. On a petition of right by the respondents claiming that they were entitled to be paid such a sum in dollars as would equal in value the number of dollars of the standard specified in the bond—namely, of the weight and fineness which was prescribed by the law of the United States existing in February, 1917:—Held, (1) that a consideration of all the circumstances relating to the offer of the loan—the fact that the notes were issued in the first instance in the United States, were expressed to be in terms of United States currency, and were to be paid on one option in New York on a value estimated by reference to United States coins—pointed to the law of the United States being the proper law of the contract; and (2) that the joint resolution of Congress had the statutory effect of requiring the bond to be discharged upon payment of dollar for dollar of the nominal amount.”

That shows that the obligation under a bond could before its maturity be converted by legislation of the country of the proper law from what may be called a “piece of gold” obligation into what may be called a “simple currency” obligation. But that case was concerned, solely or at any rate primarily, with debts falling due after the date of the legislation, and does not show what effect, if any, such legislation would be allowed to have on debts already accrued before the coming into force of the legislation.

In Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (52) the assumed facts were that the securities were held by a London bank to the order of a Czechoslovakian bank, and the owner had no contractual relation with the London bank, but had a contract of bailment with the Czechoslovakian bank. The contract of bailment was made in Czechoslovakia and its proper law was Czechoslovakian law; at the time of the contract and at all times thereafter a system of exchange control was in force in Czechoslovakia, and the effect of that was that by Czechoslovakian law the owner never became entitled to take possession of the securities, because the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia was required and not obtained; therefore, the owner never had a right to take possession of the securities and his claim in detinue against the London bank failed. That case does not deal with the position which would have arisen if the owner had at one time had under his contract a right to take immediate possession of the securities in England and supervening Czechoslovakian legislation had purported to deprive him of that right. There is also Lorentzen v. Lydden & Co., Ltd. (53), but the decision in that case appears to have been based mainly on the consideration of public policy referred to ([1942] 2 K.B. 215, 216).

On the other side there are a number of authorities which tend to show that only the lex situs can alter the title to debts and choses in action: Re Maudslay, Sons & Field (18), Lecouturier v. Rey (54); Swiss Bank Corpn. v. Boehmische Industrial Bank (21); New York Life Insurance Co. v. Public Trustee (22); Sedgwick Collins & Co. v. Russia Insurance Co. of Petrograd (23), per SARGENT, L.J. ([1926] 1 K.B. 15), and the same case in the House of Lords, reported as Employers' Liability Assurance Corpn. v. Sedgwick Collins & Co. (23) ([1927] A.C. 104, 117, 125); Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade (55) ([1933] 1 Ch.

766, 767, 768); Sutherland v. German Property Administrator (25) ([1934] 1 K.B. 430, 431, 433, 434); The El Condado (56); A.G. Der Manufacturen I.A. Woronin Leutschig and Cheshire v. Frederick Hutts & Co. (57) (79 Lloyd's Rep. 266); Re Banque des Marchands de Moscou (26) ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1272-1274); the Slatford case (36) ([1951] 2 All E.R. 786-789), per DEVLIN, J., not following Lorentzen v. Lydden & Co., Ltd. (53).

A Evidently, there is a considerable weight of authority in favour of the view that only the lex situs can alter the title to debts and choses in action, and the authorities cited to prove the contrary proposition do not seem to have that effect. On principle, there is the consideration that, if the action to recover a debt or chose in action is brought in the country where it is properly recoverable and, therefore, situated, and if there is a conflict between the lex situs and the proper law (the one having legislation which vests the debt or chose in action in A and the other having legislation which vests the debt or chose in action in B), the court trying the action will be bound to apply its own law which is the lex situs. I am unable to accept the contention of counsel for the defendant on this part of the argument.

B On the question what has been and is the proper law of the insurance contract, counsel for the defendant contended that it has been and is the law in force from time to time, i.e., the law of the Mandated Territory in Palestine up to the date of termination of the mandate and thereafter the law of Israel. Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that the proper law of the insurance contract was from the beginning and still is the law of the Mandated Territory of Palestine, and since the termination of the mandate it is that law as existing at the date of termination. In support, or partial support, of this contention, counsel for the plaintiffs cited D a decision of a German court referred to in WOLFF ON PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 2nd ed., p. 425, and Re Fried Krupp Act. (58) ([1917] 2 Ch. 193). On the other side, counsel for the defendant cited: Re Chesterman's Trusts (59) ([1923] 2 Ch. 478), and Banco de Bilbao v. Sancha, Banco de Bilbao v. Rey (60). The proper law is normally at any rate considered to be the law of a place, e.g., lex loci contractus or the lex loci solutionis, and I think the contention of counsel for the defendant E is the orthodox view and should prevail.

Finally, there was some argument on the question whether the regulations and the Law or either of them should be considered to be confiscatory. As the regulations and the Law are evidently measures of economic warfare, and analogous to the English legislation and orders relating to the Custodian of F Enemy Property, I would say on the authority of Re Munster (61) that they are not confiscatory. That is on the assumption that according to their true construction their operation is in general at least confined within proper territorial limits. If they should be construed as applying universally or to a large extent to property in any part of the world, possibly a different view could be taken, but the refusal of recognition of courts in other countries might be based on the supposed extra-territorial operation rather than on any confiscatory character. G It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to attempt the not easy task of ascertaining from the decided cases what is the meaning or test of "confiscatory" legislation, or what difference confiscatory character makes to its operation in other countries.

My decision, therefore, is in favour of the Custodian on this issue. His claim H is for a declaration that the sum of £5,039 4s. due from the insurance under the said policy is due to the defendant. I think he should have that declaration except that the sum concerned is now a somewhat smaller sum—in fact, £4,962 19s. 9d.

JONES v. GATES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
December 10, 11, 1953.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Exclusion of tenant's right to give counter-notice—"Land . . . required for a use other than for agriculture"—Intention of landlord to sell land as sports ground, but no actual purchaser—No request by tenant for arbitration—Jurisdiction of court to determine validity of notice—"Question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit"—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 24 (2) (b)—Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 190), reg. 4.

The landlord of an agricultural holding wished to sell the holding as a sports ground if he could find a purchaser, but he did not intend to use it himself or to let it for that purpose. He had received some inquiries regarding the land, but no one had offered to purchase it. On June 25, 1951, he served on the tenant a notice to quit in which he purported to invoke the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (2) (b), by stating that the holding was "required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted under the enactments relating to town and country planning." On June 28, 1951, the tenant served a counter-notice under s. 24 (1) of the Act of 1948. In an action by the landlord for possession,

HELD: (i) there being at the relevant time no purchaser and no one who wished to use the land as a sports ground, the land was not "required for a use, other than for agriculture", within the meaning of s. 24 (2) (b), and, therefore, the tenant was entitled to serve a counter-notice under s. 24 (1), and the notice to quit could not have effect unless the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries consented to its operation.

(ii) as the question raised by the tenant, viz., whether the holding was "required for a use, other than for agriculture", within s. 24 (2) (b), challenged the whole basis on which the notice to quit was given, it was not a "question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit", within reg. 4 of the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, and, therefore, the fact that the tenant had not referred the question to arbitration under reg. 4 did not preclude him from raising the point in the landlord's action for possession.

Quaere, whether reg. 4 gave exclusive jurisdiction to an arbitrator on matters within the scope of the regulation.

Case referred to:

(1) Budge v. Hicks, [1951] 2 All E.R. 245; [1951] 2 K.B. 335; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the landlord of an agricultural holding from an order of His Honour JUDGE ARMSTRONG, made at Bournemouth County Court, and dated Aug. 28, 1953, dismissing an action for possession of the holding.

In the notice to quit the landlord stated that the land was required for a use, other than agriculture, for which permission had been granted under the enactments relating to town and country planning. On receiving the notice, the tenant served a counter-notice under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1). The county court judge found that the landlord intended to sell the land as a sports ground, that he had not yet received any offer for it, and that he did not intend to let it or use it himself for that purpose. The learned judge held that the landlord had failed to show that the land was "required" for a use other than agriculture, within the meaning of s. 24 (2) (b) of the Act of 1948, so as to exclude s. 24 (1) of the Act.

R. R. D. Phillips for the landlord.

R. Hughes for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : This was an action to recover possession of a field of 6.162 acres at Northbourne, in the county borough of Bournemouth. There was at one time a question whether the field, or the tenancy of it, constituted an agricultural holding or a tenancy within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, but it is now conceded that it was an agricultural holding, and, therefore, that the subject-matter was within the scope of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. The landlord, who is the appellant in this court, by his solicitors served on the tenant, on June 25, 1951, a notice which, so far as it is relevant, was in these terms:

"We hereby give notice to quit and deliver up [the field which I have mentioned]. The land is required for a use other than agriculture for which permission has been granted under the enactments relating to town and country planning."

On June 28, 1951, the tenant, or his agent on his behalf, served a counter-notice to the effect that s. 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, should apply, and that the notice to quit should not have effect unless the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries consented to its operation. The form of notice and counter-notice is a reference to the terms of s. 24 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.

Section 24 (1) provides:

"Where notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this sub-section shall apply to the notice to quit, then, subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister consents to the operation thereof."

I pause to emphasise that Parliament has there enacted in the plainest terms that, where a cross-notice is given within a month, then, subject only to what follows in the next sub-section, the notice to quit is not to have effect unless the Minister consents. Section 24 (2) provides:

"The foregoing sub-section shall not apply where . . . (b) the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning . . . and that fact is stated in the notice."

From what I have read it is apparent that the landlord, by the statement at the end of his notice, purported to invoke s. 24 (2) (b), so as to exclude the operation of s. 24 (1). The tenant, on his part, challenged the landlord's right to invoke s. 24 (2), and called on the operation of s. 24 (1), claiming, therefore, that without the Minister's consent the notice was invalid. In those circumstances the first question which fell to be decided by the county court judge was whether it was the fact that the land was required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission had been granted under the enactments relating to town and country planning. Nobody has suggested that merely stating that the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use other than for agriculture, etc., is sufficient and that the terms of the sub-section are satisfied by the mere ipse dixit of the landlord. The conclusion of the county court judge was as follows:

"As to its being so required, [the landlord] says that he intends to sell the field as a sports ground and would have no difficulty in doing so. He has, he says, had inquiries from a business firm and a football club but has so far had no offer and is not, I gather, now in negotiation with anybody. He does not propose either to let it for that purpose or so to use it himself. On that evidence [counsel for the landlord] says that a reasonable prospect of use is shown and that satisfies the word 'required'. I do not think that in the absence of a definite person or persons willing to negotiate there could be said to be such a reasonable prospect and I am not, therefore, satisfied that the holding is 'required' for the purpose."

I agree entirely with that language of the county court judge. The finding followed evidence given by the landlord and certain correspondence which has been read to us, from which it is quite plain that, although the landlord has it in mind, if he finds a purchaser, to sell the field as a sports ground, there is at the moment no such purchaser. As the county court judge said, there is no one in negotiation with the landlord nor, as it seems to me on the evidence, was there anybody at any relevant time. The matter may, I think, therefore, be put briefly thus. If the question be: Is the land required for a use other than for agriculture, then who now so requires it? Not the landlord, because as the county court judge says, he does not propose to use it or to let it, and there is no one else except what counsel for the landlord calls "the prospective purchaser," who is an unidentified and, possibly, non-existent person. It follows, therefore, in my judgment, that the county court judge rightly decided adversely to the landlord.

Certain other points which were put are dealt with by the county court judge and they do not arise here, save one only. Counsel for the landlord contended strenuously that the jurisdiction of the court is wholly ousted in this matter as the result of the joint effect of s. 26 of the Act of 1948 and certain regulations made thereunder. Before I turn to an examination of that section and of the regulations, I would like to say that I am by no means satisfied that the point is really open. I do not doubt that counsel for the landlord took the point before the county court judge generally, though from the place in which it appeared in the judge's note I should imagine that it was directed to certain other points which counsel for the landlord adumbrated, and which might arise under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. If this point had been a valid point, then it should have been taken right at the beginning, because it leads to the conclusion that in the circumstances of the case the tenant was not entitled to challenge the notice at all, and, therefore, that the evidence which the plaintiff himself gave was inadmissible and was a waste of time. However, I will assume that the matter is open. A second preliminary observation which I would like to make is that s. 24 (1) of the Act of 1948 makes it abundantly plain that in the circumstances mentioned in the section a landlord is not entitled to serve an effective notice against a tenant of an agricultural holding without the Minister's consent, save in cases in which one or other of the provisions of s. 24 (2) are shown to be satisfied. Prima facie, therefore, it is for a landlord, if he desires to obtain an order for ejection, to show that s. 24 (1) is excluded.

Section 26, which gives rise to the problem, is in these terms:

"(1) The Minister [of Agriculture and Fisheries] may make regulations—
(a) for requiring any question arising under s. 24 (2) of this Act to be determined by arbitration under this Act . . . (2) The power conferred on the Minister by this section shall be exercisable by statutory instrument . . ."

Before I consider the regulations, one of the points which was urged on us by counsel for the landlord was that that section was obligatory, i.e., that the Minister was bound to make regulations. He draws attention, quite fairly and rightly, to the point that the general policy of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, is that questions of fact which arise and require to be determined between landlord and tenant (e.g., as regards compensation and other matters) are to be decided by arbitration. But I am quite unable in its context to construe s. 26 as making it obligatory on the Minister to make regulations, or to say that, unless he does, the effect is to render s. 24 wholly inoperative. The many references in the Act to arbitration make it, I think, quite plain that, when compulsory arbitration is intended, wholly different formulae are used from those used in s. 26. I quote, for example, s. 2 (2), which says:

“ Any dispute arising as to the operation of the foregoing sub-section in relation to any agreement shall be determined by arbitration under this Act.”

On the other hand, I will assume that, if the Minister makes regulations and makes them so as to “ require ” a question to be determined by arbitration, then, if the regulations produce that effect, the right to arbitrate may well be the exclusive means of challenge.

The regulations which we have to consider are the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, which came into operation on Mar. 1, 1948, before the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, came into operation, but it is, I understand, conceded here, as it was in Budge v. Hicks (1), that these regulations must now be treated as applicable under the present Act. Regulation 4 is in these terms:

“ In any case where it is stated in a notice to quit that the notice is given for one or more of the reasons specified in the next following regulation, it shall be open to the tenant, within one month from the giving of the notice to quit, to serve on the landlord a notice in writing requiring any question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit to be determined by arbitration under [the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923].”

D

In the next following regulation, viz., reg. 5, one of the reasons specified is that the land is required for use other than for agriculture for which permission has been granted, etc., following the terms of s. 24 (2) [: see reg. 5 (c)]. Regulation 4 was considered by this court in Budge v. Hicks (1), and the question then arose as to its scope and whether, within its scope, it was obligatory. The three lords justices in this court carefully left the matter open. Not unnaturally, each of them drew attention to the fact that, if it was meant to be obligatory, then the formula “ it shall be open to the tenant ” was a somewhat surprising one to use, because, ex facie, it seemed to give an option. SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1951]

F

2 All E.R. 248) that he thought it was the intention of the Act of 1948 that technical agricultural matters should be dealt with by arbitration rather than in the courts. With that I agree. But, plainly, the matter with which we are concerned is in no sense a technical agricultural matter. What we have been asked to do is to decide what is the true meaning of the Act and particularly of the word “ required ” in s. 24 (2), and on such a matter I am bound to say that it would be, I think, surprising if reg. 4 of the regulations of 1948 had the effect for which counsel for the landlord contended. This was a notice served on June 25, 1951, to take effect on July 19, 1952. According to the argument, unless the tenant, by July 25, 1951, served a notice calling for arbitration of the question whether the landlord really did require the premises as alleged, the tenant was for ever thereafter shut out from challenging the validity of the notice. On the view that we hold, it turns out that the notice was really a fictitious notice, in the sense that it was based on a fictitious or unreal and wholly invalid ground (and in using the word “ fictitious ” I am not, of course, making any kind of suggestion against the good faith of anybody—it just did not, in fact, exist). A tenant would be in great difficulty, I should have thought, in discovering to his own satisfaction within one month whether or not a landlord intended or proposed to use, or whether anyone else wanted or intended to use, the holding in a particular way and whether permission had been granted. The practical effect would be that a tenant, for his own protection, would have to serve an arbitration notice in every case so as to keep open the point that the notice might be challenged. Counsel for the landlord said that there would be no great harm or expense in that, but it does seem to me undesirable, and, I should have thought, a very unlikely intention of Parliament.

The question, however, remains : Are the terms of reg. 4 such as quite clearly to exclude the jurisdiction of the court ? Section 24 being expressed as I have already stated, plainly nothing short of perfectly clear terms of exclusion will suffice. It is true that, as the regulation sets a time limit, saying that it shall be "open to the tenant, within one month", to serve on the landlord the notice there specified, it can be argued that, unless that is done within one month, the right of challenge will be gone, but, looking at the regulation according to its ordinary meaning, I am unable to hold—and I have not been persuaded by counsel for the landlord that we can hold—that the effect of the regulation has been to exclude the tenant's right in this case to challenge the basis on which the notice to quit has been given.

Without desiring to determine now what is the exact scope of this and other regulations and whether as regards other matters they may have the effect of giving exhaustive and exclusive jurisdiction to an arbitrator, in this case I am not satisfied that the point which the tenant takes, namely, whether s. 24 (2) has been effectively invoked, can be said to be a "question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit" within reg. 4. The question which the tenant here raises by his challenge is whether the reason is a reason at all within the meaning of s. 24 (2), and I think that the language chosen, namely, "any question arising out of the reason", is not really apt to cover the question of the premises on which the validity of the notice rests.

For these reasons I reject the argument that the tenant is now precluded from raising the point whether the land is required for a use other than for agriculture. It follows, therefore, that, in my judgment, the learned county court judge rightly concluded this case in giving judgment for the tenant, and in those circumstances the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree and have nothing to add.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

PATRICK (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. BROADSTONE
MILLS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), December 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 1953.]

Income Tax—Profits—Stock-in-trade—Valuation—Base stock method—Fixed process stock on machines not in trading account—Spare process stock awaiting process at arbitrary valuation.

A

In arriving at its profits for income tax purposes for the accounting period 1947-48 a company used the base stock method of accounting, under which, of the base stock, the fixed process stock (i.e., cotton undergoing process on the machines) appeared at an indeterminate amount in the item "land, buildings, boilers . . . and fixed stock" in the balance sheet, but did not appear in the trading account or the profit and loss account, and the spare process stock (cotton awaiting process) was valued at an arbitrary figure of 28d. per pound at the beginning and at 30d. per pound at the end of the period. The base stock method was found to be recognised in the industry and to be sound commercial accounting, but evidence was accepted by the commissioners that in cases of changes in the level of stocks and of rises in prices, as had occurred here, it involved an understatement of profits and the creation of a hidden reserve.

HELD: the fixed process stock and the spare process stock were both stock to be turned into yarn and in the computation of profits for income tax purposes their value should be taken into account at the beginning and at the end of the accounting period at actual cost or market price, whichever was the lower, and, therefore, the base stock method, however well recognised for company accounting purposes and satisfactory in normal times, was not the proper method of accounting.

APPEAL against an order of VAISEY, J., dated July 24, 1953, allowing an appeal from a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax holding that the company was entitled to use the base stock method of accounting in computing its profits for income tax purposes for 1948-49. In applying the method the company, a cotton spinning company, had excluded fixed process stock (stock undergoing process on the machines) from its trading account and had valued spare process stock (stock awaiting manufacture) at arbitrary figures. It contended that, in consistently employing the base stock method of accounting, it was employing a recognised principle of commercial accounting, that its accounts were drawn in accordance with sound commercial practice, and that the method should, therefore, be adopted for the purposes of its assessments under appeal. The Crown contended that the base stock method of accounting employed by the company was not in accordance with the practice of the great majority of concerns in the cotton industry, that it did not accord with sound principles of commercial accountancy, and that it did not show the full amount of the profits of the relevant year, but showed a distorted view of them and understated them. They submitted that the company's process stock at the beginning and end of the year should be valued and brought into account at cost (being lower than market value) and not at any fixed or arbitrary figure for the purpose of computing the company's profits in relation to the assessments under appeal. A

Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Cyril King, Q.C., S. M. Young and H. H. Monroe for the company.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal by the company, Broadstone Mills, Ltd., against an order of VAISEY, J., which reversed a decision of the Special Commissioners and restored an assessment to income tax made on the company for 1948-49 under Case I of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £27,000, and an additional assessment for the same year in the sum of £19,218 less £11,853 capital allowances. The company carries on business as a cotton spinner at Stockport. It was incorporated in 1920, when it took over as a going concern the cotton spinning business which had been carried on since 1904 by Broadstone Spinning Co., Ltd. It owns two mills (herein referred to as No. 1 mill and No. 2 mill), which are adjacent and are, indeed, joined together by buildings. In these mills cotton is subjected to processes in various machines resulting in the production of yarn. The average time taken for raw cotton to pass through the mill and emerge as saleable yarn is approximately six to eight weeks. B

The company has always adopted a system of accounting known as the base stock system. Under that system the fixed process stock, i.e., the cotton which is on the machines, does not appear in the trading account at all, and the spare process stock is taken at an arbitrary figure. The company's contention is that the system is well recognised and is in accordance with the principles of sound commercial accountancy and that it ought to be adopted in order to arrive at the company's liability to tax. On behalf of the Crown it is said that, even if the system is satisfactory for ordinary commercial requirements over a period of years, it is not a proper way in which to arrive at the company's profits for taxation purposes in any year of assessment, and, further, that it does not show the full amount of profit for the year in question. Moreover, it is claimed that no system will give the true profits of the year unless there is a valuation of stock made (either on market price or cost price) at the commencement and at the end of the accounting period: in other words, if there is a variation between the beginning and the end of the year in the amount of stock, or in its value, those are matters for consideration which are omitted to an extent if the company's method of valuation is applied. C

The commissioners found that the method adopted by the company in dealing with its base stock in its accounts was one of the methods recognised in the trade of cotton spinning and was in accord with sound commercial practice. They also found that the method the company had adopted for computing its profits was in accordance with sound commercial practice, and they allowed the appeal against the assessment. They did not deal with contention (3) put forward by the representative of the Crown. That contention was D

"that [the company's] method did not show the full amount of the profits of the relevant year, but showed a distorted view of those profits and understated them, and the company had been under-charged in the first assessment made upon it." E

Their failure to deal with this has led to the expenditure of much time in this court. Counsel for the company submitted that, on the findings of the Special Commissioners, the company was entitled to succeed. Counsel for the Crown F

A submitted that, notwithstanding the findings, the method adopted could not be a proper way to ascertain the profits of the company in the year of assessment if it did not show the full amount of the profits, or if it showed a distorted view of them, and he set out to show that this was so. To which counsel for the company replied that we ought to be guided by the findings of the commissioners on fact. All this could have been avoided if the commissioners had made a finding on the third contention. They ought to have done so. For some time I thought that this court ought to remit the case to them for a finding, but it was put to us that there could only be one answer and that, in such circumstances, there was no point in sending the case back.

B There is a further matter to which I direct attention. Four witnesses gave evidence before the Special Commissioners, who set out a summary of their evidence in paras. 9, 10, 11 and 12 of the Case. In each case the commissioners say of the evidence, "which we accepted". I do not know what that means, in regard to the evidence of the accountants in particular. If it means that they accepted the views given as those of the witnesses who gave them, it carries one nowhere. If it means more than that, it does not appear to me that they could accept both of two conflicting views. The essential requirement of a Case Stated is that it shall contain the findings of fact of the tribunal which states it. This C Case is lacking in that respect. It is said by counsel for the company that we ought to assume that the commissicners accepted the evidence of Mr. Robson (in para. 10) in preference to that of Mr. Gower (in para. 11) by reason of their conclusion in para. 15. That may be a fair assumption to make. But the commissioners have already said that they accept the evidence of both, and nowhere do they say that Mr. Gower is wrong in the view he expressed that the method D adopted by the company led to a distorted view of the profits in the relevant year. I mention these matters with the object of saving time in future cases. It is not what someone says which is of importance. The court ought to have before it the findings of fact of the tribunal. If those are clearly stated, there is usually no need to set out the evidence which is given.

E It is not easy to state the facts in this case, which involves some technical matters, without reading a considerable part of the Case itself:

F "3. At all stages in the production of yarn, quantities of cotton in various stages of manufacture are either on the machines or are waiting by each machine ready to take the place of the cotton on that machine. The cotton which is actually on the machines and undergoing process is termed fixed process stock and that which is waiting to replace the cotton on the machines is termed spare process stock. There were produced to us (and are annexed hereto, marked A, and form part of this case) a series of photographs of various machines used in the mills, showing the fixed process stock on the machines and the spare process stock in convenient positions by the machines. 4. We were concerned in the appeal with the method of dealing, G in computing the company's profit for income tax purposes, with the fixed process stock and an agreed weight (hereinafter called the base weight) of spare process stock (being the minimum required to ensure continuity of production); these are together referred to as base stock. The company in fact held spare process stock in excess of the base weight of spare process stock, but there was no dispute as to how this should be dealt with. It was H agreed that for income tax purposes the excess should be valued at cost price (being lower than the market value). 5. (1) The company, and its predecessor, Broadstone Spinning Co., Ltd., has always adopted a system of accounting known as the base stock system. In this system the base stock and any further spare process stock held are not carried in the accounts at cost or market value, but are carried, either at a fixed price or at an arbitrary price. (2) There was produced to us, for the purpose of illustration, a hypothetical account in illustration of the company's trading account for the accounting period (which follows closely the actual trading figures for the period) and a copy of the company's balance sheet as at Apr. 3, 1948. . . . (3) In the trading account the base stock, assumed to be 123,000 pounds in weight, does not figure at all, either in opening or in closing stocks, and the further spare process stock in excess of the base weight is carried at a figure of 28d. per pound. This is an arbitrary figure designed to represent the cost of raw cotton plus a weighting for the cost of processing. The figure was originally 12½d., and was increased in 1945 to 17d. then to 28d. at Mar. 29, 1947, and later to 30d. at Apr. 3, 1948. (4) In the balance sheet the fixed process stock is included in the item 'Land, buildings, boilers . . . and fixed stock —£333,236.' It is so included at an unascertained figure representing the cost of the fixed process stock on the purchase of the mills by the company in 1920, and has not been changed since."

That paragraph makes clear two or three matters of great importance. The first is that the fixed process stock, i.e., the cotton on the machines which has been processed, is not taken into account so far as regards the trading account. It is omitted entirely, because on the company's system it is not dealt with as part of the stock in the ordinary sense but is said to be included in the item of "Land, buildings, boilers . . . and fixed stock" in the balance sheet. It is not in the profit and loss account, or in the trading account. Secondly, the spare process stock included in the trading account is taken, not at its value, but at an arbitrary figure. The third matter of importance is the very large variation in the price of cotton which has taken place over the years. Paragraph 5 (3) shows even the arbitrary values of the company rising from 12½d. to 30d., and I think I am right in saying that the later figures show that by the end of the accounting year the actual value had risen to 42d. per pound.

Paragraph 6 of the Case states the practice which had been followed by the company:

"(1) In all previous years of assessment the profits of the company and of its predecessor, Broadstone Spinning Co., Ltd., were computed for income tax purposes according to the base stock system, i.e., the fixed process stock did not figure in the account (although, as stated in para. 5 above, a value was in fact attached to it in the company's balance sheet), the base weight of spare process stock was valued at the arbitrary figure referred to in para. 5 (3) above, and any further 'spare process stock' in excess of the base weight was valued at cost. (2) The assessments under appeal were made upon the basis of bringing in all stocks of cotton at cost (which was agreed to be lower than market value); i.e., the base stock and the whole of the further spare process stock in excess of the base weight were brought in at the opening and the close of the account at a price representing the cost (at such opening or close) of raw cotton plus the cost of processing. (3) The question for our determination was whether the company was entitled to have its profits computed for income tax purposes according to the base stock system."

It is common ground that there ought to appear in that paragraph after the word "profits", "for the accounting period".

Paragraph 8 mentions two documents to which I shall have to refer later, D1 and D2, which become of importance when the court is asked to consider whether there could be more than one answer to the Crown's contention No. 3. Paragraph 7 (b) again sets out the variation in prices.

"8. The weight of fixed process stock on machines in No. 1 mill rose during the accounting period from 31,191 pounds to 44,204 pounds (vide statements D1 and D2). No. 1 mill was put out of production in 1941 as a result of arrangements for the concentration of industry, and the cotton on the machines was run off. The company then created a reserve of £7,132

(which figures in the balance sheet, exhibit C) to cover the estimated cost, at prices then current, of re-clothing the mill. No. 1 mill is now gradually being brought back into production, and the machines are partially re-clothed. The cost of the fixed process cotton on the machines in this mill has not yet been debited to the reserve account, but had temporarily been charged against revenue, although the company intends to capitalise it. When fully clothed, the machines in No. 1 mill will carry a weight of 88,000 pounds of cotton."

Let me add that No. 2 mill carries 92,000 pounds of cotton on the machines, so that the two mills together would carry on the machines 180,000 pounds of cotton. It is not shown in the company's trading account, though it is said it is in the balance sheet figure of land, buildings, etc.

The next four paragraphs in the Case deal with the witnesses who appeared before the Special Commissioners. Paragraph 9 begins:

"9. Mr. J. J. Wilkinson, the secretary of the company, attended and gave evidence before us (which we accepted) to the following effect."

Mr. Wilkinson in his evidence said it was essential for the economical running of a mill that the machines should always remain clothed, and he described the system of buying the cotton and selling the cotton. He said that the fixed process stock was taken into the company's balance sheet as a fixed asset and did not figure in the trading account, and the directors of the company had always taken the view that that was the way they wished the accounts to be presented to the shareholders, it being their view that a true trading result was arrived at in that way. I think it might well be said that, if every year there is the same amount of base stock and fixed process stock, and if its value is the same, it would not affect the position of the trading account. But if the amount changes and the value changes, the position is not the same. In para. 9 (4) the secretary is recorded as saying:

"He agreed that the cotton on the machines (i.e., the fixed process stock) is always changing and is always on the move, and that the cotton on the machines at the end of the accounting period had in fact cost the company 42.85d. per pound as shown in exhibit D2. The cotton on the machines at the end of the accounting period must have been bought during the period and its price would be included in the purchases charged in the company's accounts. The price would, however, have been debited to the particular sale occasioning the purchase of the cotton. The 136,000 pounds of cotton on the machines at the end of the accounting period had cost the company 31.88d. per pound, that was, the bale price, plus the cost of processing work done on that stock. That cost turned into sterling was £7,892 plus £16,425. The company had in fact allowed cotton bought at the advanced price to replace cheaper cotton on the machines. It had, however, advanced the price of yarn immediately the raw cotton price increased: the increase in the price of raw cotton was immediately (and, in his opinion, rightly) priced on yarn and not left on the base stock on the machines."

Mr. Robson, who was a member of the firm of Messrs. Price, Waterhouse & Co., chartered accountants, gave evidence on behalf of the company, which again the commissioners say they "accepted". He said that the company had followed

"a recognised commercial accountancy basis. The base stock method is a good method of accounting, though some other people might say there is a better method. He did not agree that it was undoubtedly a better method to bring in base stock at the beginning and end of the year at cost or market value; business people who consider the base stock method suitable in their businesses consider it the best."

He added that

"An accountant would give an unqualified certificate to accounts as giving a true and fair view of the profits of a company whether it employed the one method or the other so long as the company had adhered to one method consistently" from year to year. I find later in para. 10 in the record of his evidence:

"He agrees that in times of rising prices accounts prepared on the base stock method would show profits lower in amount than accounts prepared on the cost or market value basis; in times of falling prices, the opposite result would be produced."

As far as I can gather from the figures shown in the Case, there have been for some years consistently rising prices for cotton. That means that, if the fixed basis is followed year after year, the accounts would show profits lower in amount than accounts prepared on the cost or market value basis. The record of the witness's evidence continues:

"But, on the basis of the principles which those people who use the base stock method hold, there is no distortion of profits in times of rising prices."

The meaning of that is that those who use this principle prefer to look on the base stock in precisely the same way as they look on the machines. In other words, they are regarding the cotton, the raw material, at one stage as part of their fixed capital merely because it is on the machines. But it does not remain on the machines. It passes through the machines in the course of a few weeks and is dealt with just as is any other cotton. That is the meaning of Mr. Robson's words,

"on the basis of the principles which those people who use the base stock method hold."

He added:

"Business people who use the base stock method do so because they consider it an appropriate method for their particular businesses; they regard the cotton clothing the machines as part of the machines, without which the machines cannot function, just as a sewing machine cannot function without a certain minimum amount of thread upon it. They say, in effect, that the weight of base stock is just as much a part of the machine as the lever which engages it."

On this view, which the witness considered a tenable view,

"the base stock is part of the fixed assets, and replacements are replacements for maintenance purposes to be charged against trading as a maintenance cost."

It must follow from that principle, if it is adopted, that as prices rise the cotton which is upon the machine costs more. It is paid for out of revenue, but the cotton which is on the machines is not shown in the revenue account.

Paragraph 11 of the Case deals with the evidence of Mr. Gower, chartered accountant, who is the principal advisory accountant to the Board of Inland Revenue. Some criticism was directed against his evidence. I think there is no doubt from what I have read, and from what we have been told, that Mr. Gower has for some years been contending for what he regards as the true principle of real prices and real values, and that he has sought to show that the base stock method of accounting is not right, at least for tax purposes. I can well understand that those who follow that system of accounting equally hold the view that they ought to be allowed to have their own method of accounting. Mr. Gower's evidence, according to para. 11, begins in this way:

"He thought it was common knowledge that the general basis for the valuation of stock-in-trade in all forms, whether raw material, processed material, or finished goods, was cost price or market value, whichever was the lower."

There is no finding on that. Is it common knowledge that the general basis of the valuation of stock-in-trade in all forms is cost price or market value? That was stated in one or two of the cases to which our attention has been drawn, but I am dealing here rather with the evidence of the witness.

A "He said that the base stock method had been employed by a limited number of concerns—limited both as regards the trades in which it was used and the number of concerns in any particular trade using it. He considered that it was unobjectionable and made little difference to results over a number of years provided the quantity of base stock did not vary, and provided there were no violent fluctuations in the cost of the raw material; but in a time of violent fluctuations, and in particular in a time of consistently rising prices, in his view, the use of the base stock method could and did give rise to very misleading results."

B He said that if one had a position in which prices were rising continually the accounts did not show a fair view of the position. In the present case he said the quantity of base stock had risen and in the period under review

C "the price of raw cotton had risen seriously. The cost of the 'fixed process stock' had increased during the year by something like 10½d. per pound from about 32d. per pound to about 42d. per pound. Valued in accordance with the Revenue's contention at cost, the process stock was worth £22,502 at the beginning of the year and £37,947 at the end—an increase of £15,445. As shown by the company's books, the increase during the year in the value of the process stock was £4,289. There was thus a difference of £11,156 which had been charged against the profits in this year."

D He went into further figures, and he said they pointed to the conclusion that the base stock method resulted, in the prevailing circumstances,

E "in an understatement of profits and the creation of a hidden reserve. This was due to the fact that the base stock method was being used for times for which it could not be considered at all suitable."

F Let me say that the paragraph which summarises the evidence of Mr. Gower said that the commissioners "accepted" it. Again, there is no finding of the commissioners on the last part of para. 11. The statement of Mr. Gower's evidence continues:

G "He agreed that the base stock method is a reasonable and recognised method of accounting, and one which business men could reasonably and properly adopt, and is good commercial accounting, but he made the qualification that in times of rising prices it is a conservative method, and does not produce such correct results as the cost or market value method. By 'conservative' he meant keeping something well in hand. No auditor would cavil at conservative accounts; he rather welcomed them for shareholders' purposes. It was open to the company to use the base stock method. Asked whether the company's accounts were erroneous, he expressed the view that they were conservative and understated the profits by reason of a hidden reserve of the true cost of cotton. In his opinion the base stock method did not show the true quantum of profits earned in the relevant year. In times of falling prices it worked in the reverse way; where costs were falling you were losing some of the conservative element and were absorbing some of the hidden reserve. Once you got back to a stage where the prevailing cost of cotton was the same as that adopted for base stock, you were back to zero. On present day prices he described the base stock method as distorting the real trend of results. In a stable period, when prices hardly rose or fell, there was nothing in it."

Mr. Gower emphasised that the Special Commissioners were asked to deal with the tax position for one accounting period. The evidence which he gave was to this effect: "I do not like the base stock accounting system for tax purposes. It does not matter if you keep your base stock at the same figure and if prices remain the same. If one or other of the elements changes you do not get, by using it, the true profits of the relevant year." He went on to say that the process stock was not a fixed asset. It was just the same as any other cotton bought that passed through the mill and through the machines in the mill, and it ought to be treated as any other cotton was.

One other witness, the principal inspector of taxes, Mr. Mitchell, said that efforts had been made to get everyone to adopt the system of cost or market price in regard to stock. He had found that in the cotton trade 88½ per cent. of the spinners were now valuing process stock at cost in their books, and 11½ per cent. were adopting the base stock method, although, he added,

"the latter concurred in the adjustment to the cost basis for taxation purposes."

There is no importance in that from the point of view of the law, but I think it does show that on the whole it is recognised—and that means it is recognised by accountants who advise trading concerns—that, when there are changing prices, violently fluctuating prices, the cost or market value of the stock gives the more accurate result in any accounting period.

The first matter for consideration is what is fixed process stock and what is spare process stock? The answer surely is clear. They are both stock. They are so called. They are bought as stock. All the cotton, the raw material, is bought for the purpose of its being turned into yarn by being passed through the mill in the ordinary way. Both the fixed process stock and the spare process stock are paid for out of revenue. The evidence of Mr. Wilkinson, the secretary, in para. 9 (4) of the Case shows that the cotton on the machines at the end of the accounting period must have been bought during the period and its price would be included in the purchases charged in the company's accounts. The cost of that cotton has passed through the company's accounts.

How can one arrive at the profits of the year without considering what one has on the other side? The position is illustrated by the two documents referred to earlier, D1 and D2. D1 shows the company's cotton stock as at the commencement of the accounting period, Mar. 29, 1947. D2 shows the position at the end of the accounting period, Apr. 3, 1948. The first thing I notice is the figure in regard to cotton on the machines, the fixed process stock. In the case of No. 2 mill the amount on the machines remains the same, i.e., 92,000 pounds. It is working to capacity. No. 1 mill had been used for something else during the war—it was taken over by some government department, I think—and it had been stripped of its cotton. During this accounting year it was being gradually brought back to full production. At the commencement of the accounting year the amount of cotton on the machines was 31,191 pounds. At the end of the year it was 44,204 pounds, an increase, as the Case shows, of 13,000 pounds in the accounting year. At 42d. a pound that would be something over £2,000. So that there was in No. 1 mill somewhere over £2,000 worth of cotton more in quantity at the end of the accounting period than there was at the beginning of that period, and that cotton had been paid for out of revenue. The figures in D1 and D2 show also the spare process cotton, and it appears from D1 as though the company had on Mar. 29, 1947, some 45,000 pounds of spare process cotton, i.e., cotton waiting near by to be used on the machines as occasion arises. That 45,000 pounds was taken in the accounts at an arbitrary figure of 28d. a pound. How it is possible to get accuracy in any account by taking an arbitrary figure I do not know. The broad middle column in D1 shows the division up of that 45,000 pounds odd into 23,278 pounds and 21,774 pounds. I take it that was because it had been pointed out by someone, no doubt on behalf of the Revenue, that the company could not well claim, even on their valuation basis, to have so much spare process cotton as 45,000 pounds at any one time. It was too much. So they reduced that figure to 23,278 pounds, and thereafter in the accounts the figure of 28d. appears against 23,278 pounds, and the balance of 21,774 pounds is taken at what is said to be the cost price of 32.1d. a pound. I find it difficult to see any reason for putting on the spare process cotton a lower figure than cost or market price. Prices were rising all the time.

When I look at D2, which shows the figures for the end of the year, I find in the left hand column the figure of spare process cotton is there put as 76,371 pounds. I do not appreciate the reason for that great increase. True, it is said that the mill was coming into further use, as is shown by the increased cotton on the machines in No. 1 mill, but I should not have thought there would have been anything like that increase in spare process cotton. Indeed, that seems to have been recognised, because in the broad column in the middle, in the same way as in D1, the figures are split up later and the same weight is taken, 23,278 pounds, for the spare process cotton, on which an arbitrary figure of 30d. is put, whereas the balance of 53,093 pounds has against it the value of 42.85d., to which the price had risen. I do not follow the reason for any arbitrary price at all in a matter of this kind, but again it may not matter if conditions do not change through the year. As I have said, the justification for the practice, so far as there is justification, was said by Mr. Robson to be that those who adopted it in this trade—and it may be in some other trades—regarded the cotton on their machines as part of the machines.

In arriving at the correct position, those who have to make valuations are guided by s. 29 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926:

“ . . . any income tax in respect of profits or gains or income chargeable under Case I, Case II, Case IV, or Case V of sched. D which would but for the foregoing provisions of this section have been computed as aforesaid shall be computed, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act and subject as hereinafter provided, on the full amount of the profits or gains or income of the year preceding the year of assessment.”

The same is shown by s. 1 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and by the Rules Applicable to sched. D, r. 1 (a) (2). The object is to find the profits or gains from the trade for the year of assessment. In considering the question of stock, I think that the principle stated by the Lord President, LORD CLYDE, in Whimster & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) in 1925, has been accepted generally. The Lord President said (12 Tax Cas. 823):

“ In computing the balance of profits and gains for the purposes of income tax, or for the purposes of excess profits duty, two general and fundamental commonplaces have always to be kept in mind. In the first place, the profits of any particular year or accounting period must be taken to consist of the difference between the receipts from the trade or business during such year or accounting period and the expenditure laid out to earn those receipts. In the second place, the account of profit and loss to be made up for the purpose of ascertaining that difference must be framed consistently with the ordinary principles of commercial accounting, so far as applicable, and in conformity with the rules of the Income Tax Act, or of that Act as modified by the provisions and schedules of the Acts regulating excess profits duty, as the case may be. For example, the ordinary principles of commercial accounting require that in the profit and loss account of a merchant's or manufacturer's business the values of the stock-in-trade at the beginning and at the end of the period covered by the account should be entered at cost or market price, whichever is the lower; although there is nothing about this in the taxing statutes.”

As I say, that has been adopted in general and it is sound in practice. The Lord President, in saying that

"the ordinary principles of commercial accounting require that in the profit and loss account of a merchant's or manufacturer's business the values of the stock-in-trade at the beginning and at the end of the period covered by the account should be entered at cost or market price, whichever is the lower", was in one sense going into accountancy matters. But I venture to think that that view of his is based on general experience and common sense—you cannot get at the true position unless you take actual figures as distinct from arbitrary figures.

In the same case LORD SANDS said (ibid., 826):

"Where a trader sits down to ascertain from his books his profits or losses for the year, it is not enough that he should set on one side the money he has paid out, other than capital outlay, and on the other the money he has received in respect of the year's business plus the price he paid for commodities now in his possession. There are at least three other things that he must take into account—the present value of these commodities, the debts he has incurred, and the debts due to him, in respect of the year's operations."

The cotton in the present case whether it be in bale in the mill or ready to be used alongside the machine or on the machine, is a commodity which the trader has bought in order to turn into yarn. Later, LORD SANDS said (ibid., 827):

"The consideration of how it would be prudent for a trader to act does not solve the question here presented to us as one of revenue law. Under this law the profits are the profits realised in the course of the year. What seems an exception is recognised where a trader purchased and still holds goods or stocks which have fallen in value. No loss has been realised. Loss may not occur. Nevertheless, at the close of the year he is permitted to treat these goods or stocks as of their market value. This exception to the general rule has never, however, been extended to the case of probable or indeed apparently inevitable loss to be incurred in the execution of future contracts entered into during the year in question, and the authorities are against it."

Counsel for the company referred us to Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Cock, Russell & Co., Ltd. (2), in which CROOM-JOHNSON, J., cited the words I have just read from the Whimster case (1) and said (29 Tax Cas. 392):

"There is nothing in the relevant legislation which indicates that in computing the profits and gains of a commercial concern the stock-in-trade at the start of the accounting period should be taken in and that the amount of the stock-in-trade at the end of the period should also be taken in. It would be fantastic not to do it; it would be utterly impossible accurately to assess profits and gains merely on a statement of receipts and payments or on the basis of turnover. It has long been recognised that the right method of assessing profits and gains is to take into account the value of the stock-in-trade at the beginning and the value of the stock-in-trade at the end as two of the items in the computation."

Counsel for the company also directed our attention to Sun Insurance Office v. Clark (3). The headnote reads (6 Tax Cas. 59):

"A company carrying on the business of fire insurance, had made a practice of carrying forward annually, in its published accounts, as a reserve, forty per cent. of the yearly premium receipts representing estimated losses on unexpired risks, and had claimed to be assessed on this basis. It was found as a fact by the commissioners that forty per cent.

was a reasonable and proper allowance, and the company's claim was admitted. The Crown contended that the company was not legally entitled to the allowance. Held, [by the House of Lords] that General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corpn., Ltd. v. McGowan (4) notwithstanding, there is no rule of law as to the admissibility of an allowance for unexpired risks in estimating profits, but the question is one to be decided by reference to the facts in each case; and that on the facts found in this case the allowance claimed was a proper allowance to be made."

The general commissioners for the city of London in that case had found that the allowance was a proper one to make. There was an appeal to the Revenue Court, and BRAY, J., dismissed the appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal from BRAY, J., and the House of Lords restored the order of BRAY, J., and of the commissioners, allowing the appeal from the order of the Court of Appeal. The difficulty which arose in that case was due to a misunderstanding, which was said to be a failure to appreciate the reasons for the decision of the House of Lords in the McGowan case (4).

Counsel for the company relied on the Sun case and the case of Cock, Russell & Co. (2) in support of his submission that the court ought not to interfere with what he claimed was a finding of fact by the commissioners. If the report of the case is examined, I think it hardly supports the proposition for which counsel contends. LORD LOREBURN, L.C., said (ibid., 75):

"An estimate being necessary and the arriving at it by in some way using averages being a natural and probably inevitable expedient, the law, as it seems to me, cannot lay down any one way of doing this. It is a question of fact and of figures whether what is proposed in each case is fair both to the Crown and to the subject."

The Lord Chancellor dealt with the decision in McGowan's case (4):

"In McGowan's case (4), to which reference is made, three methods of estimating these gains or profits were before the House. I place first, merely for convenience sake and not for its importance or value, a faint suggestion which was made in the case of McGowan (4), which as I understood it, was as follows:—It was suggested that each contract of insurance made during a particular year should be considered separately. If it had expired then the actual result should be taken, whether profit or loss. If it had not expired then an estimate should be made, having regard to the period unexpired and the degree of risk, which might be different (in summer and winter for example) during that period. I do not imagine that either the Crown or the company would seriously desire such an enquiry. I do not know how many fire insurances are effected by a great company within a twelvemonth, probably scores of thousands or even hundreds of thousands. Such a process, as to the unexpired contracts, would be minute and almost interminable. It was rejected because there was no evidence that it would be a reasonable way of ascertaining what was desired. The second method suggested in that case was that of merely taking for each year the sum total of the premiums received and the sum total of the losses paid and subtracting the one from the other, without regard to the fact that the premiums cover risks running on into subsequent years and the losses include losses arising out of contracts made in previous years. This method is of course not precise or scientific. It proceeds upon the view that, when this is done for the three consecutive years indicated by the statute and the figures thus reached are averaged, a fair and reasonable conclusion is attained. This method was adopted long ago and has more than once been the subject of consideration in courts of law. I can conceive it being unfair either in the case of a rapidly increasing or of a rapidly diminishing fire insurance business. It may prove unfair in both cases. But in McGowan's case (4) it has not proved to be unfair. On the contrary it closely corresponded with the dividends actually distributed and was upon the facts of that case clearly the most accurate and reasonable of the methods which alone were propounded for our consideration. Accordingly it was adopted. I think it is in general a good working rule, but no one in this House has said that it ought to supersede the truth if the truth is in conflict with it in any case. A third method, similar in principle to that advanced by the now appellants, was also considered by your Lordships in the case of McGowan (4). This method is to carry forward annually at the close of the year a percentage of the premium income in order to allow for unexpired risks. It has no pretensions to being precise. I can easily imagine cases in which an actuary could show it was misleading. But if it comes nearer to the truth than any other method in a particular case, I do not understand why it should not be adopted. This third method, however, in its application to that case, the McGowan case (4), would have meant that the insurance company was to pay income tax upon the footing of about £15,000 profits and gains in the three statutory years, whereas they had divided dividends of about £60,000 in those three years. And there was no evidence and no finding, nor could there honestly have been, that the third method worked fairly between the Crown and the subject. In those circumstances this House rejected the third method. The House adopted the second, but so far from laying it down as a rule of law, it was expressly pointed out that the second method was of itself imperfect and, though a good working rule generally, would not be applicable if in any case it appeared upon the facts to involve hardship. The headnote in the LAW REPORTS is quite wrong and the view of BRAY, J., of what the House decided in McGowan's case (4) is accurate."

"I am equally anxious that your Lordships should not be supposed to have laid down that the method applied by the commissioners in the present case has any universal application. If the Crown wishes in any future instance to dispute it they can do so by evidence, and it is not to be presumed that it is either right or wrong. A rule of thumb may be very desirable, but cannot be substituted for the only rule of law that I know of, viz.: that the true gains are to be ascertained as nearly as it can be done."

Thus, I read LORD LOREBURN as having said there may be one or two or three methods of arriving at the profits for the relevant period. The one which shows most accurately the position between the revenue, on the one hand, and the taxpayer, on the other, is the one which ought to be adopted. In other words, it is not sufficient to say that a particular system of accounting is a well-recognised system of accounting and satisfactory during normal times if the contention on the other side is that the system does not give a true result for the particular year, the accounting year. That was the case the Crown put forward before the Special Commissioners. It is shown by their contentions, particularly the one to which I have already referred, but the Special Commissioners, though they had this case before them for quite a long time, failed to deal with that contention.

I would state these general propositions: (1) One cannot arrive at the profits of the year without taking into account the value of the stock one has at the beginning of, and at the end of, the accounting year. (2) The figures for stock are just as important as any other figures. Values may have to be estimated when market price is taken, but any departure from accuracy is reflected in the trading account. (3) Stock should be taken either at cost price or at market price, whichever is the lower. The company's method of accounting does not meet these requirements for the relevant year. It has more stock, purchased out of income, than its trading account shows, and other stock is not taken at the right figure. It seems to me that the submission of counsel for the Crown that there can be only one answer to the Crown's third contention is established.

VAISEY, J., towards the end of his judgment, said:

- A "On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that my decision in this case must be for the Crown. I am satisfied that the base stock method of accountancy as adopted by the company is recognised and accepted in the industry and is unobjectionable for some commercial purposes. But I hold that it is not appropriate for the purpose of assessments to income tax, because it does not afford a true picture of the profits in any one year of charge, and because for that purpose the process stock of the company
- B at the beginning and end of a year of charge should be valued and brought into account at cost (being lower than market value). It seems to me that in computing the company's profits no part of such stock should be either treated as a fixed asset or brought into account as a mere arbitrary figure."
- C The Special Commissioners, having made the findings to which I have referred, said:
- "We held that the appeal succeeded and we left the figures to be agreed."
- I think it is right to say that they held that the appeal succeeded on their findings already stated in para. 15 of the Case. It appears to me that on the facts they misdirected themselves in law in so holding. The decision of
- D VAISEY, J., was right, and, in my view, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I will state briefly my reasons for coming to the same conclusion as my Lord, though I accept my Lord's reasoning and the conclusions on all those detailed matters with which

E he has dealt so fully. The matter came before the Special Commissioners by way of appeal from the assessment made on the company by what I may call the Gower method of assessment. The company submitted that it was not bound by that method, but was entitled to be assessed on the system which had been in vogue in the company for almost fifty years, taking their pre-

F decessors into account. I was very much impressed by the argument of counsel for the company that the only question before this court was whether there was evidence to support the findings of the Special Commissioners. If the answer to that question was in the affirmative, then this court had no other course but to uphold the decision of the Special Commissioners and reverse the judgment of VAISEY, J.

- G The question which this court had to determine, as formulated by the Special Commissioners on the face of it seems complete. It was "whether the company was entitled to have its profits computed for income tax purposes according to the base stock system." Counsel for the company said, with force, that the commissioners had the precise question before them and they had had detailed evidence in documents and evidence from rival accountants. They formulated the questions for this court in this way:

- H "The questions of law for the opinion of the court are:—(i) Whether there was evidence upon which we could arrive at our findings in para. 15 of this Case, and (ii) Whether, in view of such findings, our decision was erroneous in law."

My Lord said that the commissioners had not really made the proper findings, but counsel for the company strenuously argued that they had, and that looking at the form in which they had stated their question, they must be taken to have known that they had before them the assessment for the income tax year. It is plainly so stated in sub-para. 1, which reads: "Those are our findings which we set out in para. 15", and the findings in para. 15 are two:

"We, the commissioners who heard the appeal, found that the method adopted by the company dealing with its base stock in its accounts is one of the methods recognised in this particular trade of cotton spinning and is in accordance with sound commercial practice."

I do not think anybody is ready to dispute that finding, because Mr. Gower in his evidence lent support to it, and Mr. Robson said the same thing. The commissioners also said:

"We also found that the method the company had adopted for computing its profits was in accordance with sound commercial practice."

So far as the accountants were concerned, that would seem to follow their first finding, because both Mr. Gower and Mr. Robson said that there are reputable firms who prefer this method for their companies' accounts. Then the commissioners said: "We held that the appeal succeeded". By that they must have meant, I think, that, because they had found the base stock method employed by the company was in accordance with sound commercial practice, therefore, it was suitable for income tax purposes. I think that third conclusion was wrong, and I prefer to put it in this way. If that be a proper construction of the findings of the commissioners, it was erroneous in law, being not so much a pure question of fact as a mixed question of fact and law.

The relevant words of s. 29 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, provide that income tax in respect of profits shall be computed on the full amount of the profits or gains or income of the year preceding the year of assessment. The Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, r. 1 (1), provides:

"The tax shall be charged without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed."

Then by r. 3:

"In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of . . . (e) any loss not connected with or arising out of the trade, profession, employment or vocation. (f) any capital withdrawn from, or any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, profession, employment or vocation."

I should have thought that the true question properly formulated for the Special Commissioners was this. Did the base stock method of accountancy for which the company contends correctly ascertain the full profits as enjoined by s. 29 (1) for income tax purposes for the year of assessment? I do not think they really answered that question. I was looking again at the evidence of Mr. Robson on which counsel for the company placed so much reliance and I had in mind his criticism of VAISEY, J., who said that Mr. Robson did not seem to commend that system. Counsel said it was not part of the duty of Mr. Robson to commend any system—he was giving evidence about the matter. Counsel also complained of VAISEY, J.'s arrogating to himself the task of the Special Commissioners when he said:

"But I hold that it is not appropriate for the purpose of assessments to income tax because it does not afford a true picture of the profits in any one year of charge."

Counsel said with force that that is said only because the company did not adopt what is called the Gower system, but adopted its own base stock system. I think it is a little singular that Mr. Robson, if his evidence is analysed carefully, seems to skirt the central question: Is the base stock method of computing profits the proper method in accordance with the Income Tax Acts?

I will summarise the evidence in this way. It is quite true that no one method can be described as the proper method to apply, speaking generally, among cotton spinning concerns. Some use the base stock method and others the Gower method of cost or market value. But the company was following commercial practice when applying the base stock method. It is a good method, though other people may say there is a better method. With great respect to counsel, I think that that is dealing with the company's own methods of presenting its accounts for company purposes. Mr. Robson said that he did not think the Gower method was the better method, i.e., to bring in the base stock at the beginning and end of the year at cost or market value. The base stock method gave a true view of the profits of the company if it was employed consistently. He had given certificates certifying companies' accounts framed on that basis. For example, for the purpose of ascertaining the commission of a manager in a particular company, he would adopt the method consistently used by the company and would not institute any other method. All the way through, while he is discussing the question of rising prices and falling prices and the base stock method in relation thereto, he nowhere says: "In my view, this method produces an accurate result in that it provides the full profits for the year of assessment." I think that VAISEY, J., was to that extent justified in commenting on Mr. Robson's evidence.

LORD PORTER said in Ryan v. Asia Mill, Ltd. (5) (32 Tax Cas. 296):

"Moreover what may be prudent accountancy for a company is not necessarily the correct method of ascertaining the proper assessment for income tax."

In my view, the Special Commissioners in their findings were concerned almost wholly with the first part of that sentence of LORD PORTER. The base stock method is the appropriate method for this company, which has adopted it consistently for its own purposes, i.e., for company purposes, but I do not think the commissioners have really addressed themselves to the true question in this case: Did this base stock method of accountancy correctly ascertain the full profits for income tax purposes for the year of assessment? Quite naturally, all sorts of subsidiary questions thereupon arise, such as: Did the base stock method have the effect of making deductions from profits which are expressly or by necessary implication forbidden by the Act of 1918 or any other relevant taxing statute? But if we are asked to say: "Here are findings by the Special Commissioners, and if there is evidence to support them, then the task of this court is ended, because it must support them", I must answer that the findings of fact by the Special Commissioners do not conclude the matter. Even if there was nothing with which I could quarrel so far as these findings went, nevertheless the true issue is still left undetermined, and I think that VAISEY, J., was right. As he expressed it, he did not, perhaps, cover quite accurately the real issue, and I would prefer to formulate it in this way. The Special Commissioners only considered the facts up to one particular point and then stopped short. Bearing in mind that in the base stock system as described by my Lord the fixed stock never comes into the trading account or appears in the balance sheet and that the spare process stock has an arbitrary figure attached to it, I think that the Special Commissioners reached that stage and then stopped. They said: "There is no doubt at all that the base stock method has been in vogue amongst cotton spinners for very many years—in this particular case in vogue for nearly fifty years." For the purposes of the company there is, perhaps, no quarrel to be made with it, and for computing profits for the company's purposes no fault was to be found with it. But, the real question being whether the method was a proper one for ascertaining accurately the full profit in accordance with s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1926, I think the Special Commissioners did not really address their minds to that topic.

For this reason I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed, and I concur fully in the judgment delivered by my Lord.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Re SPENSLEY'S WILL TRUSTS. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. v. STAUGHTON AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), B
December 17, 18, 1953.]

Charity—Benefit to community—Gift in favour of High Commissioner for Australia.

Perpetuities—Rule against perpetuities—Alternative disposition—Gift to charity on future uncertain event.

Charity—Trustee—Restriction of objects by nature of trustee—Appointment of National Trust as trustee—Discretion as to objects—Restriction to charitable uses necessarily charitable. C

By his will dated Mar. 24, 1932, a testator, who died on Mar. 3, 1938, devised land, dwelling-houses, and other buildings at Westoning, and also the lordship of the manor and an advowson, to the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty to hold them in trust for F. for life, and after her death for S. for life, and after the death of both for the use of the High Commissioner for Australia as a country residence in a similar way to that in which Chequers is used by the Prime Minister of England. The will further provided: "Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date then for such other uses preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia as the said National Trust and [F.] if then alive may jointly decide or if the said [F.] be not then alive as the said National Trust may decide but so that the said estate of Westoning may as far as possible be kept intact". The testator suggested that, if the Australian government refused the gift, a certain part of the land should be sold, but that the remainder of the estate should be maintained as a small residential agricultural estate. On July 11, 1938, the National Trust disclaimed "all estates, interests and powers therein given to or vested in it as trustee or devolving" under the will. On Sept. 3, 1938, the High Commissioner for Australia disclaimed all his interest and that of the government of Australia, under the will. On the question of the validity of the trust to take effect on the disclaimer by the government of Australia, D

HELD: (i) the primary trust in favour of the High Commissioner was not a charitable trust as being for the benefit of a section of the community (viz., the citizens of Australia), and it followed that the alternative trust which arose on renunciation of the primary gift by the government of Australia, whether charitable or not, failed because it would not arise within the perpetuity period. E

Re Corelli ([1943] 2 All E.R. 519), applied.

(ii) the alternative trust was not limited to charitable objects by the character of the National Trust as trustee, because (a) the choice of objects did not rest only with the National Trust, but rested with the National Trust and F. jointly; (b) the primary trust in favour of the High Commissioner not being charitable, there appeared no ground for restricting H

the alternative trust to charitable uses; and (c) the primary trust was in any event not within the objects of the National Trust and there was, therefore, no ground restricting the objects of the alternative trust to such objects.

F APPEAL by first, second and third defendants against an order of VAISEY, J., dated May 15, 1952, and reported [1952] 2 All E.R. 49, on an originating summons to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of the will and codicil of Howard Spensley, deceased, and in the events which had happened, subject to the successive life interests of the defendants, Ethel Fairchild and Tassie Mary Skene, the trusts contained in cl. 14 and cl. 15 of the will concerning the testator's estate of Westoning and the furniture and contents of the manor house at Westoning failed or were good charitable trusts.

G VAISEY, J., held that the trusts contained in cl. 14 and cl. 15 were charitable trusts and directed that a scheme should be brought in. Notices of appeals were also given in respect of the decision of VAISEY, J., on a further question raised by the summons (see [1952] 2 All E. R. 49), but the appeals were settled by agreement.

H E. B. Stamp for the first, second and third defendants, a nephew of the testator and two children of the said nephew, interested in residue.

N. S. S. Warren for the fourth defendant, Mary Gluckman.

J. A. R. Finlay for the fifth defendant, an infant son of Mary Gluckman.

J. W. Mills for the sixth and seventh defendants, two infant sons of Mary Gluckman.

D. S. Chetwood for the eighth defendant, Ethel Fairchild, the first tenant for life.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

Hillaby for the plaintiffs, the trustees.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: In this case, the testator, Howard Spensley, by cl. 14 of his will dated Mar. 24, 1932, made a disposition in the following terms:

"I devise and bequeath my land houses and buildings in the parishes of Westoning Harlington and Tingrith in the county of Bedford (except as herein otherwise dealt with) including the lordship of the manor of Westoning and the advowson of the living of Westoning hereinafter called the estate of Westoning to the National Trust for Places of Historic or Natural Beauty of 7 Buckingham Palace Gardens Westminster (hereinafter called the National Trust) upon the following trusts: (1) For my sister Ethel Fairchild for life; (2) After the death of the said Ethel Fairchild for my sister Tassie Mary Skene for life; (3) After the death of both of my said sisters for the use of the High Commissioner or other person representing the government of the Commonwealth of Australia in England for the time being to be used by him as a country residence in a way similar to that in which Chequers is used by the Prime Minister of England. Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date then for such other uses preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia as the said National Trust and my sister Ethel Fairchild if then alive may jointly decide or if the said Ethel Fairchild be not then alive as the said National Trust may decide but so that the said estate of Westoning may as far as possible be kept intact. The presentation to the said living of Westoning to be made by the person for the time being having the use of the said manor house or if that be not possible then by the said National Trust. I hope should the Australian government accept this bequest they will appoint to the living of Westoning men having experience in Australia so that a greater knowledge of the two countries the one by the other may arise."

Then there is a provision in which a sale is recommended of part of the Westoning property, but the testator suggests "that the remainder of the estate be not sold but may as far as possible be maintained in the state in which it now is that is to say as a small residential agricultural estate."

Clause 15 of the will is in these terms:

G

"I bequeath the furniture and contents (other than moneys securities or legal documents and except as herein otherwise disposed) of my manor house at Westoning to the said National Trust to be used in connection with the said house and to follow the trusts created in respect of my Westoning estate."

The testator died on Mar. 3, 1938, and his will was proved on June 8 in the same year. On Sept. 3, 1938, the High Commissioner for the Commonwealth of Australia by deed renounced and disclaimed the trust for the benefit of the High Commissioner or other person representing the government of the Commonwealth of Australia in England for the time being, which trust I will refer to as "the primary trust". In view of that renunciation and disclaimer, the primary trust (whether it would or would not otherwise have constituted a valid disposition) ceased to have effect by virtue of the express provision in the primary trust which brings the second, or alternative, trust, as I will call it, into operation in the event of the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refusing the bequest at the time of the testator's death or renouncing it at any future date. On July 11, 1938, the National Trust disclaimed the trusteeship of the dispositions to which I have referred. In these circumstances, the question arose whether the alternative trust which, in the events which happened, so far as it lawfully could, took (subject to the life interests) immediate effect, was a valid charitable trust. By his judgment dated May 15, 1952, VAISEY, J., held that the alternative trust was a valid disposition for charitable purposes, and from that decision the beneficiaries interested in residue now appeal to this court,

The decision of VAISEY, J., was founded on an application of the principle deducible from certain authorities referred to and followed in Re Flinn (1), in which a testatrix bequeathed to "His Eminence the Archbishop of Westminster Cathedral London for the time being" her residuary estate "to be used by him for such purposes as he shall in his absolute discretion think fit". It was held that the bequest was a gift to him as a trustee and not beneficially and that he held the residuary estate on a valid charitable trust for ecclesiastical purposes.

The reasoning which led VAISEY, J., to apply the principle deducible from those cases to the case now under consideration was substantially to this effect. Starting with the proposition that the National Trust is a corporation established for exclusively charitable purposes, he went on to hold that, although the testator purported to confer on Ethel Fairchild jointly with the National Trust the discretionary power of deciding on, or selecting, the uses to which the property was to be put under the alternative trust, the effective selection of such uses was in the hands of the National Trust alone inasmuch as the property could only be applied to the purposes in question on the death of Ethel Fairchild. He, therefore, concluded that the gift here, so far as the alternative trust was concerned, was in substance equivalent to a gift to the National Trust to be applied for such purposes as the National Trust might decide, and, therefore, comparable to a gift of the type considered in Re Flinn (1). In other words, the learned judge regarded the gift here in question as tantamount to a gift to a corporate body established for exclusively charitable purposes with a superadded direction to the effect that such charitable body was to apply the property for such purposes as it might think fit, and, so regarding it, held, on the principle deducible from Re Flinn (1) and the cases therein cited, that the superadded direction, being merely in general terms which purported to give an unfettered discretion to the charitable body, viz., the National Trust, did not have the effect of enlarging the permitted objects of the gift beyond the charitable purposes which the National Trust itself could properly pursue under its constitution.

The reasoning on which the learned judge's decision was based has been criticised in this court on behalf of those interested in the residuary estate. To those criticisms I will return later in this judgment, but I should first of all deal with a point taken before us which, so far as I am aware, was not argued before VAISEY, J., and that was this. It is, of course, well known that trusts for charitable purposes are exempt from the rule against perpetuities, that being one of the important privileges or advantages accorded to charity by the courts. Nevertheless, a gift to charity, unless it takes effect on the failure or determination of a previous gift to charity, must take effect, if at all, within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. Applying that principle to the present case, those interested in residue contend that the primary trust in this case was not a charitable trust, so that on any view there is no appropriation of the fund to charity by the terms of this disposition until the failure or determination of the primary trust. They further point out that the primary trust is limited to endure until such time as the bequest may be refused or renounced by the government of the Commonwealth of Australia, as appears from the words:

“Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date then for such other uses . . .”

They contend that this provision is apt to cover the case of a renunciation by the government of the Commonwealth of Australia at any future time, not necessarily a time falling within the period permitted by the rule. They, therefore, submit that the alternative trust, even if it could otherwise be upheld as a charitable trust, is a trust which, according to the terms of the will, might take effect beyond perpetuity limits and, accordingly, even if it could otherwise be held to be charitable, is void as infringing the rule. A

Counsel for the Attorney-General contested that argument substantially on these grounds. First, he said, the primary trust is a charitable trust, and, therefore, one has here an immediate appropriation to charitable purposes and the exemption applies to a gift at any distance of time from one charitable object to another. Secondly, he said that the words B

connote a refusal or renunciation either at the testator's death or within a reasonable time thereafter, and should not be construed as introducing a possibility of a failure of the gift at a time extending beyond the perpetuity period. As to the latter point, I see no ground in the context for placing that limited construction on the words “or renounce it at any future date”. In my view, the government of the Commonwealth of Australia could properly be said to renounce this gift within the meaning of the provision in question if, after accepting it and enjoying it for a period, they decided (for whatever reason) that the benefit of the trust should be given up. In my view, therefore, the provision concerning refusal or renunciation does open the possibility of the primary trust taking effect and continuing for a period longer than that permitted by the rule against perpetuities and then failing, with the consequent taking effect of the alternative trust beyond the permitted limits. D

As to the argument that the primary trust is a trust for charitable purposes, counsel for the Attorney-General invited us to draw an analogy between this case and the cases in which trusts have been upheld as conducive to the efficiency of the armed forces of the Crown. He also said, if I understood him correctly, that this trust could be upheld as charitable as being for the benefit of a section of the community, viz., the citizens of Australia, the cost to whom of maintaining in this country their duly constituted representative would be pro tanto reduced and who would also enjoy the more efficient services of such representative, due to the opportunities for rest and recuperation afforded by the country retreat which the testator was minded to provide. I find myself unable to accept that argument. It seems to me that this trust is simply a trust to provide certain amenities for a person for the time being holding in this country a particular office under the Australian government. I think it would be an unwarrantable extension of the fourth head of “charity” in the classification contained in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (2) to hold such a disposition as that to be charitable. E

I am fortified in that view by the circumstance that those responsible for framing the Chequers Estate Act, 1917, clearly regarded the comparable purposes to which Chequers was to be devoted as open to objection, inferentially on the ground of perpetuity, unless validated by Act of Parliament. The deed scheduled to the Act contains this recital: F

“And whereas the trusts hereinafter declared in relation to the Chequers estate and the said trust fund would infringe certain rules of law unless G these presents were confirmed and made valid by Act of Parliament and it is intended that a Bill shall be introduced into Parliament for the confirmation of these presents accordingly . . . ”, and in addition to that the Act which confirmed the scheduled document contains the recital:

A “And whereas the trusts created by the said deed cannot take effect without the authority of Parliament, and it is expedient that the said trusts should have full force and validity . . . ”

I find some further support for my conclusion in the decision of COHEN, J., in Re Corelli (3). In that case a testatrix gave the residue of her estate and effects to trustees to enclose all the freehold land as a breathing space and air zone for the health of the town of S., her expressed intention being that the ultimate trusts of the house and grounds at M.C. be continued in perpetuity for the benefit and service of distinguished visitors from far countries visiting S. who would otherwise seek their quarters in a hotel. The learned judge held that the purpose comprised in the provision that the house and grounds be continued in perpetuity for the benefit and service of distinguished visitors from far countries visiting “S.” was not a valid charitable purpose.

C Accordingly, in the view I take, the object of the primary trust, though, no doubt, it might be said to be a desirable and useful public object, is not such an object that it can properly be held to be a charitable object within the legal definition of “charity”. It follows that, in my judgment, the new point taken in this court should succeed, with the result that the alternative trust is invalid as infringing the rule against perpetuities, even if it could otherwise be upheld as a valid charitable trust.

E That conclusion makes it strictly unnecessary to deal with the actual ground of the learned judge's decision, but, in view of the fact that it was the ground on which the case was decided before him, and in view of the argument presented to us, it is only right that I should proceed to deal with it also. The learned judge, as I have said, founded himself on the principle deducible from the cases summarised and followed in Re Flinn (1). I find it unnecessary to review those authorities at length, because counsel for the fourth defendant, in the course of his argument on behalf of residue, stated the principle deducible from them in terms which, if I may say so, appear to me to be wholly adequate, and from which counsel for the Attorney-General did not dissent. The principle deducible from those authorities was thus stated by counsel: “Where there is a gift to a person who holds an office the duties of which are in their nature wholly charitable and the gift is made to him in his official name and by virtue of his office, then, if the purposes are not expressed in the gift itself, the gift is assumed to be for the charitable purposes inherent in the office”. On the other hand, it is necessary also to bear in mind the principle stated in such cases as Dunne v. Byrne (4) and Re Davidson (5). The principle deducible from those cases is of this nature—and to contrast it with the principle deducible from Re Flinn (1) and the cases there followed it can appropriately be introduced with a “but”—“But where the purposes of a gift are plainly expressed in terms not confining them to purposes which are in the legal sense charitable they cannot be confined to charitable purposes merely by reference to the character of the trustee”.

H To quote from LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment in the Privy Council in Dunne v. Byrne, LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1912] A.C. 409):

“The learned counsel for the appellants began by insisting that inasmuch as according to the authorities a gift to a Roman Catholic archbishop and his successors, without more, would be a good charitable gift, there is to be found in this will an overriding charitable intention sufficient to supply the lack of certainty—if lack of certainty there be—in the declared object of the bequest. Their Lordships have no hesitation in rejecting this argument. A similar argument was advanced and rejected in the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Re Davidson (5). It is difficult to see on what principle a trust expressed in plain language, whether the words used be sufficient or insufficient to satisfy the requirements of the law, can be modified or limited in its scope by reference to the position or character of the trustee".

It will be seen that inevitably those two principles must be liable to produce fine distinctions in particular cases and it may often be hard to decide on which side of the line a given case falls. Is it a gift to a holder of an office of a charitable character virtute officii with merely superadded words conferring wide powers of disposition? If so, on the principle followed in Re Flinn (1), the gift will prima facie be charitable by virtue of the charitable character of the office. On the other hand, is it a gift to a trustee bearing a charitable character or holding a charitable office on trusts which according to their terms are not, or are not exclusively or necessarily, of a charitable nature? If so, then the scope of the trusts is not to be limited by reference to the character of the trustee.

In the present case, speaking for myself, I feel little difficulty in holding that the gift here in question cannot properly be upheld as a charitable gift on the strength of the principle followed in Re Flinn (1). The learned judge was able to reach a different conclusion, the nature of which I have already indicated. I should, perhaps, quote that part of his judgment in which he states his conclusion. He says ([1952] 2 All E.R. 52):

"I am bound to say that, applying the principle explained rather than laid down by JENKINS, J., in Re Flinn (1), it seems to me that I have to look at this case as if the person who has the effective disposing power is the National Trust. The National Trust is, admittedly, a charity with defined charitable purposes. That is best to be seen from Re Verrall (6), where it was held that the purposes for which the National Trust had been incorporated were charitable purposes, and they are expressed by ASTBURY, J. ([1916] 1 Ch. 115), as being '... plainly public purposes, expressly stated to be for the benefit of the nation...' He further went on to say that they had no choice of applying them to any other purposes. It is said that the words which I have read, 'preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia', must necessarily exclude any idea of the purposes to which the National Trust was confined, and in declaring these alternative purposes, which have to be brought into operation in the events which have happened, those words preclude the National Trust from applying the purchase money to the general purposes for which it, the National Trust, was incorporated. I do not think I can accept that. To begin with, the words introduced by the word 'preferably' cannot, I think, be more than a mere predilection, and I think I must so look at this matter that it is the National Trust, not only by way of property, but also by way of power, which has the disposing power over this property now represented by the proceeds of sale."

Then the learned judge refers to Re Garrard (7) and Re Norman (8), two of the cases mentioned in Re Flinn (1), and expresses the view that the present case goes a little further than those cases, but that the learned judge's decision "follows as a necessary sequel to those decisions". He says of the present case (ibid., 53):

"It is not so simple, it is not so straightforward, and it is not so clear-cut, but on the whole I think that the National Trust, by virtue not only of this property, but also by virtue of the power which it has, is given only such control over this property and over these proceeds of sale as enables it to dedicate to purposes which are either the same or in pari materia with its own proper purposes as an incorporated charity."

Before I leave the authorities it would be right for me to refer to Re Ashton's Estate (9) to which reference was made by counsel for the Attorney-General. Re Ashton (9) was the well-known case of a gift to certain vicars and church-wardens "for parish work". There SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1938]

A 1 All E.R. 710):

"I quite agree that, if the words could be construed in the way in which [counsel for the appellants] would have us construe them, he would be entitled to succeed, but I find myself quite unable to construe them in that way. First of all, I do not think that it is legitimate to cut down the purposes which are specified by reference to the character of the trustees. That is a rule that has been enunciated more than once. The passage in which it is most frequently quoted is the passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in Dunne v. Byrne (4) delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN. [He read the passage to which I have referred.] I quite agree that LORD MACNAGHTEN is there referring to a trust expressed in plain language, and he certainly did not mean to suggest that the character of the trustee is a thing which is to be disregarded in construing the gift as a whole. I can well conceive of cases where the purpose named takes its colour from the character of the trustee, but, where one finds that there is plain language, it is not legitimate to cut down that language by reference to the fact that the trustees named hold a particular office, or have a particular character."

D So here, says counsel for the Attorney-General, there are no trusts declared in plain language, but merely a general reference to

"such other uses preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia, as the said National Trust and my sister Ethel Fairchild if then alive may jointly decide",

E and he says that those words, being vague and colourless in themselves, should be given the proper colour by reference to the character of the National Trust as trustee.

The learned judge's conclusion based on the principle followed in Re Flinn (1) is attacked on the part of the residuary legatees substantially on these grounds. They are, I think, disposed to concede that if the gift here had been a gift to

F the National Trust to be applied by the National Trust for such purposes as it might think fit, or on trust to apply the same for such purposes as the National Trust might think fit, that might well be a valid disposition for charitable purposes by analogy to the cases of a gift to the holder of some office of a charitable character by virtue of his office, for, while pointing out that there is no exact correspondence between a gift to an individual as the holder for

G the time being of some office and a gift to a corporation aggregate, as in the present case, they are not, as I understand their argument, concerned to dispute the validity, or probable validity, of a gift in the terms I have stated. The burden of their argument is that the actual gift here in question is by no means of that character. They point out that this is not a case where the property is given simply to the National Trust as sole trustee to be applied as the National

H Trust may think fit: it is a case where the property is given to the National Trust for such uses as the National Trust and the testator's sister, Ethel Fairchild, may jointly decide, and although it may well be that a gift to the National Trust in trust to apply the same for such purposes as the National Trust should think fit would be a valid charitable gift, on the ground that the superadded words should not enlarge the National Trust's power of disposition beyond the purposes necessarily charitable which it can properly pursue under its constitution, there can be no ground for the same conclusion in the case of a gift to the National Trust jointly with an individual on trust to apply the same for such purposes as they (the two trustees) may think fit, or in the case of a gift (as the gift here actually is) to the National Trust for such uses as the National Trust and a named individual may jointly decide. They say that in such a case no inference can be drawn from the character of the trustee as regards the nature or scope of the trusts to which the joint power of selection extends. They criticise VAISEY, J.'s conclusion as having been reached by the unjustifiable process of treating the discretion conferred for the purposes of the alternative trust as a discretion reposed in the National Trust alone. It is, of course, true that, after the death of Ethel Fairchild, the National Trust, if they had accepted the trust, would have been left in sole control, but it is impossible to ignore the fact that the power of selection of objects is in the first instance, undoubtedly, given to Ethel Fairchild and the National Trust jointly, and the testator quite clearly contemplated that in certain circumstances Ethel Fairchild would play an active and effective part in making the selection. A

Criticism does not end there, for it is also said that the primary trust is not a trust for charitable purposes. With that contention I agree, for the reasons I have already endeavoured to state. The primary trust not being charitable, it is asked, with force, what ground can there be for restricting the uses to which the power of selection extends, expressed as they are in the most general terms, to charitable uses? Further, it is pointed out that the primary trust, whether it was charitable or not, was not a trust of a kind falling within the charitable purposes for which the National Trust was constituted. We were referred to the National Trust Acts, 1907 and 1937, but for my part I have seen nothing in them to justify the conclusion that it would be a legitimate object of the National Trust to maintain a country residence for the High Commissioner for Australia for the time being. One, therefore, finds in the primary trust that the testator contemplates that the National Trust will act as a trustee for the purposes of a trust not falling within the charitable objects of its constitution, and again it is asked, with force: If that be so, what justification is there for drawing the inference that the other uses to which the property is to be applied under the alternative trust should be uses falling exclusively within the authorised charitable objects of the National Trust? B C D E

Then it is said that the preference expressed in the words "preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia" shows that the testator had in mind objects by no means necessarily within the scope of the National Trust's legitimate objects, and although VAISEY, J., was not impressed with this argument it seems to me to be not without force. I do not think that any further light is thrown on the question by cl. 15 of the will, which contains the gift of the furniture. The gift there is to the National Trust without any mention of the joint power of selection, but it is a referential gift, and I cannot regard the omission as affording any real support for VAISEY, J.'s conclusion. F

I think I have now dealt with substantially all the arguments directed against the validity of the alternative trust, and for my part I find them unanswerable. Counsel for the Attorney-General has persuasively argued the contrary. He says that the alternative trust is wholly separate and distinct from the primary trust, and that here one finds objects expressed in vague and general terms which should be construed by reference to the fact that the National Trust is the trustee, and by that process limited to charitable purposes within the scope of the legitimate objects of the National Trust. For my part, I cannot find in cl. 14 any indication sufficient to justify controlling and limiting the purposes of the alternative trust in that way, and in the view I take on this ground also, as well as the ground of perpetuity dealt with above, the alternative trust fails to qualify as a valid charitable trust, with the consequence that the property comprised in the disposition in question is not validly disposed of and must sink into residue. Accordingly, I would allow this appeal. G H

SIR RAYMOND EYERSHED, M.R.: I am of the same opinion, and only for the reason that we are differing from VAISEY, J. (with what hesitation, on a matter of this kind, I need not say) I add some few observations of my own.

The law which has to be applied is not, I think, in doubt. Counsel for the fourth defendant stated it in terms which counsel for the Attorney-General was content to accept and which JENKINS, L.J., has quoted. To that statement
 A I only venture to add, in reference to Dunne v. Byrne (4) and Re Davidson (5), a short statement from the argument of Mr. Stranders in Re Flinn (1):

“ . . . a gift, which is otherwise not charitable, does not become charitable through its being given to a corporation which occupies a charitable office.”

My Lord has also quoted from the judgment of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., B in Re Ashton (9). I cannot say in this case, obviously, that we have here “plain language”, but if, for the words “plain language” in SIR WILFRID GREENE’s statement, I substitute “language having on its true construction the effect of comprehending non-charitable objects”, then the passage in Re Ashton (9) is applicable here. The problem in this case (as in all cases) is in
 C the end to construe properly the language which the testator has used and to discern therefrom whether or no he has expressed what is called a general charitable intention.

I am of opinion (and, I confess, clearly of opinion) that what JENKINS, L.J., has called the primary trust—i.e., the first trust in favour of the High Commissioner for the Commonwealth of Australia—is not a charitable gift. That view was not, as counsel for the Attorney-General said, argued below and he
 D has, I think, argued that question, perhaps, a little faintly here, but however that may be, the suggestion that it is charitable as tending to promote the public interest of the diplomatic service of the Commonwealth of Australia seems to me too spectral and remote. The object is to provide a commodious and appropriate country residence for the amenity of the holder of the office of the High Commissioner for Australia, and I cannot think that that, how-E ever laudable and desirable, is a charitable object.

If that be a correct view of what has been called the primary trust, the result is of great importance, in my judgment, although it is not conclusive. It is of great importance, first, because of the point raised by counsel for the fifth defendant, on which I share the view expressed by JENKINS, L.J., viz., that the charitable trust which follows, if it be charitable, may not take effect
 F until a time beyond the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. Counsel for the Attorney-General asked us to construe the word “renounce” in the phrase “or renounce it at any future date” as having the technical significance of the word when used in reference, say, to a legacy, meaning, renounce it altogether before ever it has been in any respect enjoyed. I do not take that view of the meaning of the word in this context. The phrase is:

G “Should the government of the Commonwealth of Australia refuse this bequest at the time of my death or renounce it at any future date . . .”, and it is to be borne in mind that the opportunity of enjoying this gift may arise immediately (if, for example, the prior life tenants surrendered) or at some distant date after the death of one or both of them. In such a context, and

 H having regard to the dictionary use of the word “renounce”, it seems to be that the testator was saying: “Should the Commonwealth at any time, and whether it has in the meantime taken under the benefit or not, give up or surrender its beneficial interest”.

That, as JENKINS, L.J., has said, is sufficient to determine the appeal, but on the second point, on which VAISEY, J., took a different view, I also share the conclusions of JENKINS, L.J. Again, my conclusion on the effect of the primary or first trust appears to me of great importance, and for this reason.

If the disposition for the High Commissioner's benefit is not charitable, then I start with this, that the National Trust, who are appointed trustees of these premises, are directed to hold them for a purpose which is both outside the defined objects for which the trust exists according to the National Trust Acts, 1907 and 1937, and is also non-charitable; and if that is right then, to my mind, the real basis of the argument of counsel for the Attorney-General is at once destroyed, for, if the trust is from the start a trust which is, or at least may be, foreign to the inherent charitable nature which the National Trust Acts imposed on the National Trust, then it seems to me that, in the absence of some very clear words indicating a change of intention, the same view must be applicable to the remainder (the vital part, for this purpose) of the gift. I can find nothing in the later language which has so limiting an effect. The first words, "for such other uses" (and I agree they mean all other uses than the one already specified) are perfectly general in effect. Similarly, the words "preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia" (like the words "for parish work" in the Ashton case (9)) provide a formula obviously apt to comprehend purposes other than charitable, although they may also include charitable purposes.

I will not repeat what my brother has said as to the significance of joining as nominator of the purpose with the National Trust the testator's sister, Mrs. Fairchild. I agree with him as to the inference to be drawn from that circumstance. Looking at the whole clause and deriving from it, viewed as a whole, the sense which lay behind the testator's expression, I am for my part much impressed by this. The testator opens with a disposition (which I am now assuming is not charitable) in favour of the Australian High Commissioner in England. He then makes a direction for designating a trust prima facie quite unlimited in character, and with the qualification that it is "preferably for some purpose in connection with Australia". Finally, he directs that, as regards presentation to the living of Westoning, persons should be appointed

"having experience in Australia so that a greater knowledge of the two countries the one by the other may arise."

Laudable, plainly, as that object is, it seems to me that it is an object which may be described more appropriately by the word (used in its proper and general sense) "political" than "charitable". It is an expression of an intention analogous, as I think, to the intention which this court held to underlie the disposition in Re Strakosch (10).

For these reasons, in addition to those which JENKINS, L.J., has stated and with which I find myself in full agreement, I think, as he does, that the intention to be derived from this part of the will is not a charitable intention, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed and that the gift which is here in question must be declared invalid.

MORRIS, L.J.: I find myself in full agreement with the two judgments which have been delivered and I do not desire to add anything.

Appeal allowed.

MASON AND ANOTHER v. CLARKE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), November 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, December 8, 1953.]

Landlord and Tenant—Reservation—Sporting rights—Right to take rabbits reserved to landlord—Right of tenant farmer to kill rabbits in interests of good farming—Right to agree to destruction of rabbits by agricultural executive committee—Right of landlord to set snares in tenant's fields—Profit à prendre—Oral grant—Ground Game Act, 1880 (c. 47), s. 1 (1) (b).

By an agreement in writing, the predecessor of the second plaintiffs let to the defendant, a farmer, certain pasture fields, reserving to himself “(subject to the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880) all the game, rabbits, wild fowl and fish with liberty for himself and all other persons authorised by him, to preserve, hunt, course, kill and carry away the same,” and the defendant agreed, subject to the Act of 1880, “not to shoot or otherwise sport on the land”. Between December, 1949, and October, 1950, the land became overrun with rabbits, and, in pursuance of a notice served on him by the agricultural executive committee, the defendant agreed that the committee should gas the rabbit-holes in the hedgerows on the fields. In October, 1950, by an oral agreement, the second plaintiffs sold the right to take rabbits on the land to the first plaintiff. The receipt given to the first plaintiff by the second plaintiffs for the amount paid to them by the first plaintiff for the right to take the rabbits was, to the knowledge of both those parties, a false receipt, designed, the court found, to defraud the Inland Revenue. The first plaintiff laid snares in the fields where the defendant grazed sheep, and on Oct. 15, 1950, the defendant ordered the first plaintiff, who was snaring rabbits, off the land, but he refused to leave. On Dec. 2 the defendant kicked over snares which the first plaintiff had laid on the land. On Oct. 22 a man with two companions took rabbits with ferrets in the hedgerows with the written authorisation of the defendant. On Oct. 24 a servant of the agricultural committee, with the help of the defendant's son, gassed the rabbit-holes in the hedgerows. The plaintiffs alleged that these incidents constituted a breach of covenant by the defendant and a trespass against the enjoyment of their profit à prendre.

HELD: (i) the reservation of sporting rights by the second plaintiffs operated by way of re-grant by the defendant whose obligations in regard to it were to abide by the terms of his covenant and not to derogate from his grant by wilfully destroying the game or rabbits except in the proper exercise of his rights of cultivation and management of the land; in authorising the gassing of rabbits by the committee and the ferreting, the defendant was doing what was advisable in the interests of good farming.

(ii) in any event, the defendant was entitled to gas the rabbits under the Ground Game Act, 1880, s. 1 (1) (b), the word “employed” in that subsection including any employment, direct or indirect, and the servant of the agricultural committee being indirectly employed by the defendant to do the work; the ferreting was also within s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act since the man who killed and took away the rabbits was duly authorised in writing by the defendant.

(iii) it was not reasonable for the first plaintiff to lay snares in the defendant's fields, having regard to the fact that sheep were grazing there, and the defendant had a right to remove them to safeguard the sheep.

(iv) the first plaintiff had no right in law (and, in view of the falsity of the receipt accepted by him, no equitable right) to a profit à prendre since his right to take rabbits was granted orally and not by deed, and, therefore, he, not having been lawfully authorised by the second plaintiffs had no right to go on the defendant's land.

(v) consequently, the action failed.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated May 8, 1953.

The second plaintiffs, the Shepton Mallet Transport Co., Ltd., were the owners of the Hothorpe estate in Leicestershire and Northamptonshire which they had purchased in December, 1949. Fields on the estate had been let as pasture land for many years to the defendant, a farmer, under a tenancy agreement by which the landlord purported to reserve to himself the right to take all the game and rabbits on the land and the defendant agreed "not to shoot or otherwise sport" on the land. When the land was sold to the second plaintiffs the benefit and burden of the agreement passed to them. Between December, 1949, and October, 1950, the estate became overrun by rabbits, and in October the Agricultural Executive Committee of Northamptonshire, in exercise of their powers under s. 98 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, served notices on the defendant and the second plaintiffs requiring them to destroy the rabbits. The defendant agreed that the committee should gas the rabbit-holes in the hedgerows at his expense. In October, 1950, under an oral agreement not evidenced in writing, the second plaintiffs sold the right to take rabbits on the land to the first plaintiff, Mason, for £100. Mason proceeded to snare and sell some hundreds of rabbits. On Oct. 15, 1950, the defendant ordered Mason who was engaged in snaring rabbits, off the land, and he refused to leave; on Dec. 2 the defendant kicked over snares which Mason had laid in the fields; on Oct. 22 a man with two companions was ferreting in the hedgerows with the defendant's permission; and on Oct. 24, the committee, by agreement with the defendant, gassed the rabbit-holes in the hedgerows. In the present action, which arose out of these four incidents, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant had wrongfully broken his covenant not to shoot or otherwise sport on the land and had trespassed on and interfered with the plaintiffs' rights by himself killing rabbits and by procuring the committee to kill rabbits by gassing them. They also alleged that the defendant had prevented them from enjoying the benefit of their profit à prendre. The defendant alleged, inter alia, that the reservation of the profit à prendre did not entitle the plaintiffs to kill and take away rabbits for commercial gain nor to lay snares in the defendant's open fields. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and awarded them damages.

J. G. S. Hobson for the plaintiffs.

Perrett for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 8. The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: There is an estate of about four hundred acres in Leicestershire and Northamptonshire called the Hothorpe estate which used to be owned by the de Trafford family, but in December, 1949, was bought by a company called the Shepton Mallet Transport Co., Ltd., the second plaintiffs, which is run by a Mr. Bennett. The fields have been let for many years to a tenant farmer, Mr. Clarke, the defendant, and his father before him, but the spinneys have been retained by the owners in their own occupation. The owners have also retained the shooting rights over the fields let to the defendant. The defendant keeps many sheep on the fields. There was no trouble between him and the owners until the limited company came on the scene. Since then there has been acute hostility. This action is an outcome of it. It all arises out of the rabbits which have their holes in the spinneys and in the hedgerows and run over the fields. After the company took over the land, these rabbits became a serious nuisance. In the middle of 1950 the agricultural executive committee gassed the holes in one spinney, but this did not remedy the mischief. By October, 1950, the pest had become so bad that the agricultural executive committee decided to put into force their powers under s. 98 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, to exterminate the rabbits. The defendant, Mr. Clarke, was very ready to co-operate with the agricultural executive committee. He was not, of course, in occupation of the spinneys, but he did have the hedgerows, and he agreed that the committee should gas the rabbits there at his expense. This was done on Oct. 24, 1950. The owners (the limited company) were, however, not so forthcoming. They had just sold the rabbiting to a Mr. Mason, the first plaintiff, for £100 and did not want to deprive Mason of them. The agricultural executive committee served the statutory notice on the owners on Oct. 14, 1950, but the spinneys in the owners' occupation were not gassed until January, 1951. Meanwhile, Mason had snared some hundreds of rabbits and sold them.

This action concerns four occasions of conflict. On two of these occasions the defendant sought to interfere with Mason. On Oct. 15, 1950, the defendant ordered Mason off the fields, but he did not go. He went on with his snaring as if nothing had happened. On Dec. 2, 1950, the defendant kicked over some of the snares which Mason had laid in the fields. The two other occasions concerned the killing of rabbits. On Oct. 22, 1950, a man with two companions went ferreting in the hedgerows with the permission of the defendant, and on Oct. 24, 1950, the agricultural executive committee, by agreement with the defendant, gassed the rabbit-holes in the hedgerows. I propose to consider these last two occasions first.

The question is whether the defendant had any right to kill or authorise the killing of rabbits on the land in his occupation. In this respect, the rights of the owner and the defendant are regulated by a tenancy agreement made in writing (not under seal) many years ago between Mr. de Trafford, the former landlord, and the defendant. It was originally for one year, but it has been continued from year to year. When Mr. de Trafford sold the land to the Shepton Mallet Company, the benefit and burden of the agreement passed to the company: see Boyer v. Warbey (1). The agreement was an ordinary letting of pasture land, but the landlord reserved to himself and the tenant agreed (subject to the provisions of the Ground Game Act) “not to shoot or otherwise sport on the land.” Although the landlord purported to “reserve” the game, rabbits, etc., this was not in strictness a reservation. It was long settled at common law that an “exception” is only properly allowed of things in esse, such as trees or minerals; a “reservation” is only properly admitted of services to be rendered by the tenant, such as paying rent or providing a beast (heriot), whereas a right to come and kill and carry away wild animals is only a liberty or licence—a profit à prendre—which can take effect only by grant and not by exception or reservation. Words of reservation of sporting rights, operate, therefore, not by way of reservation proper, but by way of re-grant by the tenant: Wickham v. Hawker (2). In former times there was a drawback in this view of the matter in that a reservation could not technically operate as a re-grant unless the tenant executed the lease himself. This technical drawback was eliminated by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 65 (1). So that a reservation now operates as a re-grant without any execution by the tenant, but that section does not, I think, affect the substance of the obligations. In point of law the reservation still operates as a re-grant by the tenant to the landlord and the rights of the parties must be ascertained on that footing. When this reservation is regarded as a re-grant, it is clear that the obligations of the tenant in regard to it are two only: First, he must obey his express covenant "not to shoot or otherwise sport on the land" except in accordance with the Ground Game Act, 1880; secondly, he must not derogate from his grant. This obligation "not to derogate" means that he must not wilfully destroy the game or the rabbits except in the proper exercise of his rights of cultivation and management of the land. The farmer is not precluded from per GREER, L.J., in Peech v. Best (3) ([1931] 1 K.B. 18). It does not, therefore, prevent him from cutting furze or underwood, or stopping rabbit-holes when that is advisable in the interests of good farming: see Peech v. Best (ibid., 8, 9) per SCRUTTON, L.J.; but it does, of course, prevent him from netting partridges or dynamiting the fish, or doing wilful destruction of that kind.

“(subject to the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880) all the game, rabbits, wild fowl and fish with liberty for himself and all other persons authorised by him, to preserve, hunt, course, kill and carry away the same”,

Applying this test, it is plain that the second plaintiffs cannot complain of the gassing of the hedgerows on Oct. 24, 1950. Early in that month the agricultural executive committee had come to the conclusion that the rabbits on the land had become such a pest and were so injurious that they must be exterminated. The committee had tried persuasion, but it was of no avail. So they decided to serve compulsory notices on the second plaintiffs as owners and on the defendant. The pests officer told the defendant of this decision, whereupon the defendant agreed to let him deal with the rabbits in the hedgerows. The committee sent one man to gas the holes and he did it with the help of the defendant's son. It seems plain to me that the defendant did not derogate from his grant in so doing. He was only doing what was advisable, and, indeed, necessary in the interests of good farming. By the same token, the company cannot complain of the ferreting on Oct. 22, 1950. The three men were only killing rabbits in the hedgerows which had become such a pest that they had to be exterminated, and they were, as we know, justifiably gassed two days later.

On this view, it is unnecessary for the defendant to justify himself by reference to the Ground Game Act, 1880, but, if it were necessary, I should have thought that the gassing was authorised by s. 1 (1) (b) of that Act in that it was done by the defendant's son and one man from the agricultural executive committee. The defendant employed the committee in good faith for reward to destroy the rabbits, and they appointed one man to do the actual gassing. If the defendant had employed the man directly, there could have been no doubt that he was justified under the Act. He should not be any the less justified because he employed the man indirectly through the committee. The word "employed" in s. 1 (1) (b) includes, I think, any employment, direct or indirect. So far as the ferreting is concerned, that also was authorised by s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1880 because the man who was taking the rabbits had himself been duly authorised in writing, and there was no need for his two companions also to be authorised in writing. A written authority is needed by the one who kills and takes the rabbits, but not by his assistants. I ought to mention, perhaps, that the man who ferreted did not overlap with the agricultural executive committee because he had finished before they did their gassing, and there would be no point in his ferreting afterwards.

I turn now to the two occasions when the defendant interfered with the plaintiff, Mason. The question is what right had Mason to go on the land? He had no right at law to a profit à prendre. That can only be granted by deed, and there was no deed until Dec. 31, 1950. Before that time Mason had only an oral agreement with the owners whereby he paid £100 for the rabbiting on the estate. Did that give him a right in equity? It must be noticed that the oral agreement was not evidenced by writing. All that Mason had was a receipt which said that the £100 was a contribution "towards bailiff's wages on Hothorpe estate". That statement was false and no satisfactory explanation has been given of it. The landlord's agent who prepared the receipt said that Mr. Bennett, who runs the landlord company, instructed him to make out the receipt as being "towards bailiff's wages", and he obeyed those instructions. He added significantly that Mr. Bennett had a strong personality and expected his instructions to be carried out. But Mr. Bennett himself was never called to say why he wanted the receipt made out in that way and the court has been left in complete ignorance. In the absence of any explanation of this patently false receipt, I can only infer that it was done with a dishonest motive, for why otherwise should a man make a statement which he must have known was false? It has been suggested that it was done in order to deceive the revenue authorities, but I do not propose to inquire into the precise motive. Suffice it that it was a false receipt knowingly false, and done with some dishonest motive. The plaintiff, Mason, took the receipt without making any objection. He said that he read it, saw that it was a receipt for his £100, and thought that what Bennett did with the £100 was no concern of his. What is the effect of this false receipt? It means, I think, that Mason has no right in equity to a profit à prendre. I cannot think that any court of equity would grant him a decree of specific performance when all he could produce was such a strange and suspicious receipt. What, then, was Mason's position? He had no right at law to a profit à prendre because he had no deed. He had no right in equity because he could not get specific performance. Had he any right at all to go on the land? If he was lawfully authorised by the landlord company to go rabbiting on the land, then, of course, he could go, but the difficulty is to see that he was lawfully authorised, when the only thing he could himself produce was this false receipt. I take it to be clear law that a person who comes on to a farmer's land, asserting that he has the authority of the owner so to do, must be prepared to vouch his authority when called on to do so. In the absence of it, the farmer can turn him off the land as he would any stranger. Mason seems to have realised that the receipt would not be any warrant of authority, because he did not take it with him, not even on Oct. 11, 1950, on the very first occasion when he went to see the defendant, and, what is more, he gave the defendant on that day a wrong account of it. He said he had paid £100 and had a receipt for it giving him authority to catch rabbits on the estate, whereas the receipt gave him no such authority. It seems to me that Mason cannot be in a better position by not producing the receipt than he would have been by producing it. If he had produced it, it would not have shown him to be lawfully authorised to be on the land, let alone to snare rabbits there. He had, therefore, no lawful authority. The importance which the defendant attached to the receipt is shown by a letter which the defendant after the first meeting wrote to Mr. Smart, the pests officer of the agricultural executive committee:

"Today I have seen and spoken to a man whom Bennett has sold the rabbits to for £100. This man holds a receipt for his payment. He has promised to bring it for my perusal when I shall make a copy of same and you will be able to have one also if you wish."

Mason, however, never produced the receipt to the defendant. The only person to whom he did produce it was to Mr. Smart who went to see Mason on Oct. 13, 1950, and asked to see the receipt. Mason produced it and Mr. Smart examined it. There can be little doubt that Mr. Smart told the defendant what it contained and thus enabled him to bring it to the notice of the court. It was suggested that Mason need not rely on this false receipt, but could derive his authority from a letter written by the landlord's agent to the defendant. I do not think that is correct. The false receipt taints the whole of his authority: see Alexander v. Ruyson (4); and makes him a person not lawfully authorised to be on the land. This means that neither Mason nor the company can complain in respect of the interference by the defendant with Mason. Not Mason, because he had no right to be on the land either at law or in equity. Not the company, because Mason was not a person lawfully authorised by them. It was said that Mason had a possessory title, but I do not agree with this. Not being lawfully authorised, he had no better title than a poacher. Even if I were wrong about this, however, the only thing that Mason can complain of is interference with his snares. The hard words on Oct. 15 broke no bones and gave no cause of action.

In considering whether he (Mason) had the right to lay snares in the field, the question is whether it was reasonable for him so to do, having regard to the fact that sheep were there. The law is that each see Peech v. Best (3) ([1931] 1 K.B. 14) per SCRUTTON, L.J. It is, I think, not reasonable to lay snares in a field where a man's sheep are grazing, except by arrangement with the farmer beforehand. The reason is because there is a danger of the sheep becoming caught in the snares, which may lead to trouble—and, even from the snarer's point of view there is a danger of the snares being knocked over. Mason gave no notice to the defendant of his intentions to lay snares, nor of the places where he was going to lay them. This was, I think, unreasonable, and the defendant had a right to kick them over so as to save danger to his sheep.

" . . . must use their land reasonably having regard to the interest of the other . . . ":

In my opinion, therefore, neither the company nor Mason has any cause of action against the defendant. The judge came to a different conclusion, largely because of the view he took about the receipt. He thought that the defendant should not have taken any point about it, so much so that he seems to have awarded punitive damages against him for raising it. I do not think he had any jurisdiction to do this. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. In the absence of some alternative explanation (and none was offered) I cannot avoid the conclusion that the one and only purpose of describing the rent in the receipt as a contribution "towards bailiff's wages" (a statement which was repeated on the stub in the receipt book) was to facilitate a fraud on the Inland Revenue, and, if so, the fact that the receipt was never applied to that purpose is nihil ad rem. That such was the object is apparent to anyone with knowledge of the facts who sees it and, as the plaintiff saw it, and retained it in his keeping, it must have been apparent to him. How, then (if at all), does the falsity of the receipt affect Mason's right to sue the defendant in these proceedings for alleged interference with his rights of sporting? In considering this question it is necessary to bear in mind that Mason was not, during the relevant period, the legal tenant of the rights, for they constituted a profit à prendre and were not demised to him by deed. Such rights, then, as he possessed could only take effect and be enforceable in equity. It is said (in reliance on the principle of Walsh v. Lonsdale (5)), that, as he paid for the rights and the agreement was acted on, equity would recognise them as fully as though they had been validly created at law. It is true that he paid for them and was permitted to enjoy them, but linked with the payment was a dishonest intent by the company, the furtherance whereof was promoted by the form of the receipt which Mason was content to accept. How, then, can Mason found a claim to recognition in equity on such a payment? It is perfectly clear to me that no court of conscience would afford him any recognition or relief whatever in relation to a transaction which involved a payment so manifestly tainted. He who comes to equity must come with perfect propriety of conduct or (as has been sometimes said) with clean hands. Had the company repudiated its oral grant of the sporting rights equity would never have granted Mason a decree of specific performance but would have relegated him to such claim as he might possess to damages at law. The position, then, is that at all material times when he was on the defendant's land in quest of rabbits he had no title to do so at law nor any right entitling him to be there which would be recognised in equity. The result of this seems plain. The defendant, by the terms of his lease, was only bound to submit to the presence on his land in pursuit of game of the lessors or persons authorised by the lessors, which means lawfully authorised. If, as, in my judgment, is the case, Mason's authority derived from an agreement which was of no effect either at law or in equity, it cannot be said that his authority was lawful so as to bring him within the category prescribed by the defendant's lease. It follows that Mason was, at all material times, in no better position than a trespasser on the defendant's land and that his claims in this action, accordingly, fail.

Assuming, however, that in spite of the false receipt Mason is entitled to have his claims against the defendant entertained by the court, they would, in my opinion, fail on the main issue of interference for another reason. Mason could have no better rights than the lessors themselves were entitled to exercise and neither he nor they could, in my judgment, kill game on the defendant's land in a way or by methods which were unreasonable in relation to the defendant. The land let to the defendant by the 1926 and subsequent leases was pasture land and was used by the defendant as such. He kept sheep on the land, and did so for years without trouble. Mason's way of killing the rabbits which ran on the defendant's land from the spinneys was almost entirely by the use of snares. That these devices are potentially harmful or injurious to animals other than rabbits can hardly be denied. Mr. Miles, who is a veterinary surgeon, said in evidence that he had a Labrador dog which had been caught in snares six or seven times in its life. Then, as to sheep, the defendant's daughter, Mrs. Garner, who, apparently, created a favourable impression on the judge as a witness, said that in early December, 1950, she found about thirty of her father's sheep with snares attached to their legs. It is true that neither the Labrador nor these thirty sheep apparently suffered physical injury from being caught in the snares, but not much imagination is required to realise that injury might ensue, and, if imagination is not sufficient, proof of the possibility is afforded by the defendant's dead teg to which Mr. Miles was called in January, 1951. In these circumstances, it does not appear to me that it is a reasonable exercise of sporting rights to lay down quantities of snares in pasture that is occupied by sheep, except by arrangement with the farmer. It was suggested in argument that, even so, the remedy of the tenant is to seek redress in the courts rather than to remove the snares himself, but I cannot accept this contention. If a man finds something on his land which has no business to be there and is likely to injure his livestock he needs no order from the courts to obviate the danger. In my opinion, accordingly, Mason has no cause of action against the defendant in respect of the alleged interference with the snares or with Mason's attempts to use them.

It remains to consider the position of the plaintiff company. If I am right in the view that no sporting rights effectively passed to Mason in October, 1950, it follows that those which were reserved to the lessors by the lease of 1926 remained vested in the company, and, in relation to their exercise, the illegality of the company's agreement with Mason is irrelevant. It is contended by the company that the defendant invaded their rights in two respects, viz., by ferreting for rabbits on Oct. 22, 1950, and by procuring and instigating the Minister of Agriculture to gas the rabbits in the hedgerows. I am not at all satisfied that the defendant was not acting within his rights under the lease on both of these occasions. The negative covenant imposed on him was "not (subject to the provisions of the Ground Game Act) to shoot or otherwise sport on the land."

The words "or otherwise sport" appear to me to be referable to the earlier phrase in the reservation, "shoot, hunt, course", and as neither the ferreting nor the gassing come within that description I do not think that the defendant was, on either occasion, acting in breach of the covenant. He was, however, "killing" rabbits, and it is not altogether plain to me that he had not the right to do so (apart altogether from the Ground Game Act), although the rabbits when killed would belong to the lessors under the earlier reservation. The lessors reserved the game, etc., to themselves but only (in terms) a "liberty", and not an exclusive right, to kill them, and "killing" was not mentioned in the negative covenant. I appreciate that the defendant could not (for example) net partridges, but rabbits are a pest and I am doubtful whether taking the language as a whole, the defendant was not impliedly authorised to kill them. But, be that as it may, it seems to me that the October incident was within the defendant's powers under the Ground Game Act. Geoffrey Mason, who was of the party, had the defendant's written authority to kill the rabbits which he kept for himself as his "reward". As for the other two men who were with him they were only assisting him, and I cannot think that a person who is "authorised" for the purposes of the Act is not entitled to bona fide assistance.

As to the gassing, the allegation in the statement of claim is, not that the defendant gassed rabbits, but, as I have already indicated, that he procured and instigated the Minister to do so. In these circumstances, I doubt really whether the Ground Game Act is relevant, although it was repeatedly referred to by counsel on both sides in connection with this issue. It does not seem to me that the evidence bears out the complaint as pleaded. Mr. Smart said that his committee decided to gas only after it became obvious to them that persuasion (i.e., persuasion directed at the lessors) was of no avail. On Oct. 9, 1950, they authorised Mr. Smart to serve notices on both the defendant and Mr. Bennett, as representing the lessors. He visited the defendant on Oct. 10, notified him of this, and told him that, if he was willing that the committee should deal with the rabbits for him, an order would not be necessary. The defendant, accordingly, signed an agreement then and there for the gassing of the rabbits. No notice, therefore, was served on him, but one was served on Mr. Bennett on Oct. 14. Mr. Smart saw Mason on Oct. 13 and it seems that, as a result of the conversation which he then had with him, the principal gassing operations on the estate were held over until early in the following year. The agreement with the defendant, however, was implemented on Oct. 24, and it is of that gassing that the company complains. As, however, the committee had already decided to exterminate the rabbits by gassing before the defendant signed the agreement authorising them to do so on his land, it cannot be said that he procured and instigated the Minister, as alleged on Oct. 14. It is true that on Oct. 11 Mr. Smart had sent the defendant contract forms for his signature and that he returned the covering letter with encouraging remarks on the back, but I cannot see that this suffices to establish the company's case. And, indeed, an answer by Mr. Smart in examination in chief shows that the committee's decision to gas was not brought about by the defendant at all. On Oct. 18, 1950, the company's solicitors wrote to the Northamptonshire Agricultural Executive Committee with reference to the order of Oct. 14 which had been served on Mr. Bennett and suggesting that it had been inspired by the defendant. This suggestion was put to Mr. Smart when he was in the witness box and he repudiated it. "Of course not", he said. "My committee were only concerned with the rabbit infestation". In my opinion, accordingly, the company's charge against the defendant of procuration and instigation falls to the ground.

A For the above reasons I think that both the plaintiffs fail in their action and the appeal should be allowed.

R. v. BRIGHTON JUSTICES. Ex parte JARVIS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Sellers and Barry, JJ.), December 18, 1953.]

C Licensing—Licence—Occasional licence—Grant to holder of off-licence—Under-taking by licensee not to sell for consumption on premises—Licensing Act, 1953 (c. 46), s. 148 (1).

D Justices consented to the grant to the holder of a retailer's on-licence of an occasional licence in respect of other premises for which he held an off-licence, authorising him to sell intoxicating liquor outside normally permitted hours, the licensee undertaking not to sell during that time intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises. A rival trader applied for an order of certiorari.

E HELD: (i) the consent granted by justices under the Licensing Act, 1953, s. 148, for which application was made to and considered by them sitting in open court and as to which they had to exercise a discretion in deciding whether or not the grant of an occasional licence would be expedient for the convenience and accommodation of the public, was a judicial, not an administrative act, in respect of which the remedy of certiorari would apply.

R. v. Rotherham Licensing JJ. Ex p. Chapman ([1939] 2 All E.R. 710), and R. v. Torquay Licensing JJ. Ex p. Brockman ([1951] 2 All E.R. 656), applied.

F (ii) an occasional licence, which could be granted only to the holder of a retailer's on-licence, was an on-licence, and justices had no power to consent to the grant of such an occasional licence to the holder of an off-licence, restricting it so that it was in effect an off-licence, and, therefore, an order of certiorari would be made.

MOTION for an order of certiorari.

On Dec. 11, 1953, the respondent, Paul Andre Schremer Dauthieu, applied to justices for the county borough of Brighton under the Licensing Act, 1953,

s. 148, for their consent to the grant of an occasional licence. He stated that he was the holder of an on-licence at the Bear Inn, 45 North Street, Taunton, Somerset, and also traded as "Peter Dominic" at 64, London Road, Brighton, in respect of which premises he held an off-licence. The grounds of his application were that in the period immediately prior to Christmas great pressure was experienced by his staff in conducting his business, and, if the application were granted to cover this special occasion, it would benefit afternoon shoppers. He, accordingly, asked for an occasional licence to permit sales to the public between the hours of 2.30 p.m. and 6 p.m. on Dec. 19, 21, 22, 23 and 24, 1953, at 64, London Road, Brighton, and undertook to allow no sales for consumption on the premises. In reply to the chief officer of police he stated that he had been interested in the off-licence at 64, London Road, Brighton, since November, 1953. The justices gave their consent to the grant of an occasional licence to the respondent

"(being the holder of a retailer's on-licence in respect of the Bear Inn, 45, North Street, Taunton in the county of Somerset) authorising the sale by him of intoxicating liquor on Dec. 22, 23, and 24, 1953, between the hours of 2.30 p.m. and 6 p.m. in premises situated at 64, London Road, Brighton . . . on the occasion of Christmas shopping facilities."

Endorsed on the licence were the following words:

"This occasional licence was granted on undertakings given by the [respondent] (a) not to sell any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises between 2.30 and 6 p.m. and (b) to close the premises for sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption off the premises at 7 p.m."

The applicant, John William Charles Jarvis, a licensed victualler carrying on business at Park View Hotel, Preston Drive, Brighton, applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the consent to the grant of the occasional licence on the grounds:

"(i) that the justices had no power to grant the said consent in respect of (a) the occasion or (b) the period or (c) the premises for which the same was given; (ii) that the [respondent] did not state in his application for the said consent the occasion or any occasion for which an occasional licence was required by him; (iii) that the . . . justices gave the said consent subject to conditions which they had no power to impose; (iv) that in granting the said consent the justices exceeded their jurisdiction."

The applicant filed an affidavit stating that he was a member of the general purposes committee of the Brighton and County Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society and Friendly Association, and that in common with other members he was a rival trader to the business carried on at 64, London Road, Brighton; that the trade of the members, including himself, would be affected by the grant of an occasional licence to the respondent; and, in particular, that the respondent's premises would remain open for the sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption off the premises while other licensed premises would not be permitted to remain open for such trading.

J. G. S. Hobson for the applicant.

Harold Brown for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: By the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, s. 151, it is provided:

H

"(1) Where the appropriate consent has been obtained by the holder of a retailer's on-licence, the commissioners shall grant to him an excise licence (hereinafter in this section referred to as an 'occasional licence') authorising the sale by him of any intoxicating liquor to which his retailer's licence extends at such place other than the premises in respect of which his retailer's licence was granted, during such period not exceeding in Great Britain three weeks . . . at one time, and between such hours, as may be specified in the consent . . . (2) In the foregoing sub-section, the expression 'the appropriate consent' means—(a) in England or Wales, the consent of the justices granted on an application made in accordance with s. 64 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910; . . . Provided that, without prejudice to any discretion of the appropriate authorities aforesaid to refuse their consent or permission, they shall not grant it unless they are of opinion that the grant of an occasional licence is expedient for the convenience and accommodation of the public."

The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, is now repealed and replaced by the Licensing Act, 1953, s. 148 of which provides:

"(1) For the purposes of s. 151 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952 (which provides for the grant of occasional licences to the holders of retailers' on-licences who have obtained the appropriate consent), the expression 'appropriate consent' means consent granted by justices of the peace under this section. (2) The justices shall not hear an application for consent unless satisfied that the applicant has served on the chief officer of police at least twenty-four hours' notice of his intention to apply for the consent, stating the name and address of the applicant, the place and occasion for which the occasional licence is required, the period for which he requires it to be in force, and the hours to be specified in the consent. (3) Without prejudice to any discretion of the justices under this section to refuse their consent, they shall not grant it unless they are of opinion that the grant of an occasional licence is expedient for the convenience and accommodation of the public."

Sub-section (4) provides that the application is to be made to justices acting for the petty sessional area in which the place to which the application relates is situated, and the number of justices before whom the application is to be made is such as is required by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.

G

The first objection taken by counsel for the respondent is that, apart from the particular facts of this case, certiorari is a remedy that does not lie here, because this is an administrative and not a judicial act. I can only say that that argument is made, if I may so put it, about sixty years too late. It has been held since Sharp v. Wakefield (1), Boulter v. Kent J.J. (2), and that class of case, that the acts of justices in relation to licensing matters are judicial. It seems to me clear that R. v. Rotherham Licensing J.J. Ex p. Chapman (3) and R. v. Torquay Licensing J.J. Ex p. Brockman (4) are recent authority for the proposition that certiorari (although in those cases it was mandamus) will lie. The court finds no difficulty in saying that the giving of this consent, for which application is made to and considered by justices sitting in court and as to which they have to exercise a discretion in deciding whether or not the grant of an occasional licence would be expedient for the convenience and accommodation of the public, is a judicial act, and, therefore, the consent which they have given is an order which can be brought up and reviewed by this court.

H

The respondent is the holder of a retailer's on-licence at the Bear Inn, Taunton. He also holds some off-licences in Brighton and other south coast towns. For this purpose it may be remembered that the main division is between on-licences and off-licences, on-licences permitting the consumption of intoxicating liquor on the premises during certain permitted hours, and off-licences permitting the sale, but not the consumption, of intoxicating liquor at the premises during the same permitted hours.

The respondent thought that it would be convenient for the public (and, I have no doubt, profitable for himself) if he could sell at or deliver from his shop at Brighton intoxicating liquor all day irrespective of the permitted hours. Accordingly, he applied to the Brighton justices, not in his capacity of a Brighton licensee, but in his capacity of the holder of a licence at Taunton, for the grant to him of an occasional licence. It seems an astonishing procedure, but it was thought out as a way of getting round the Licensing Act, 1953, s. 148. I am surprised that in the circumstances the justices entertained the application. The grounds for the application were that there was great strain on the respondent's assistants during Christmas week and he thought that it would be convenient for everybody concerned if he could sell intoxicating liquor over the counter during the afternoon when other licensed premises in Brighton would not be allowed to do so. The justices consented to the grant of an occasional licence, authorising him to sell intoxicating liquor on Dec. 22, 23, 24, between the hours of 2.30 p.m. and 6 p.m. in premises situated at 64, London Road, Brighton "upon the occasion of Christmas shopping facilities." The occasion of Christmas shopping might be an "occasion", but I do not know how "shopping facilities" can be an "occasion". However, I am not going to determine this case merely on that point. Then they put on the licence:

"This occasional licence was granted on undertakings given by the [respondent] (a) not to sell any intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises between 2.30 and 6 p.m. and (b) to close the premises for sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption off the premises at 7 p.m."

The justices can grant only a full on-licence. That is what an occasional licence must be. Whether or not they can impose any conditions I do not know. But what they have done here is to say: "We will give you an occasional licence, that is to say, a full licence, on the terms that you use it only as an off-licence and sell at places where you have got an off-licence."

In fact, however, the justices have no power to consent to the grant of such a licence. There is no power to turn an off-licence into an on-licence in this way, and no power to restrict an on-licence into an off-licence. If the justices consent to the grant of an on-licence the licensee can sell only during, and for as long as, the permitted hours. If, on the other hand, he has an off-licence, he cannot have granted to him an on-licence which is in effect an off-licence merely to enable him to sell intoxicating liquor during hours when his off-licence does not allow him to do so. The object of an occasional licence (which is granted, for example, for a flower show, or a race meeting, or a festival occasion which may last as long as three weeks) is to give the public a chance of getting refreshment when attending at that particular place. Assuming for this purpose, without deciding the point, that other licensees are not interested persons, the issue of certiorari is discretionary and not as of right, and I think that this is eminently a case in which we should exercise our discretion and make an order because, if this state of affairs were allowed to continue, it would be an obvious way of getting round the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1953, and the justices would be acting in a way which, in our opinion, the law does not permit. The application, therefore, is granted.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. I think that the justices misconceived the position here. They consented to the grant of an on-licence for premises where no on-licence was required and where there was no occasion to grant one. Then they sought to turn what was obviously an on-licence, granted to the holder of a retailer's on-licence, into something which was an off-licence and restrict it in a way which I do not think that they were empowered to do.

BARRY, J.: I agree.

PARKINSON v. H. & J. PLUMPTON.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), December 10, 1953.]

Master and Servant—Wages—Regulation—Catering worker—Minimum remuneration—Employment of two persons at joint wage above minimum for single worker—Claim by one worker for minimum wage—Competency—“Lodging”—Sleeping accommodation—Provision of unfurnished room—Provision of full board without lodging—Catering Wages Act, 1943 (c. 24), s. 9 (1), s. 10 (1)—Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 433), sched. I, para. 3, cols. 1, 2, 3; para. 22 (6) (7).

By an oral agreement made between the plaintiff and her husband and the defendants, the plaintiff and her husband were employed by the defendants to look after a garage with a café attached at a joint weekly wage of £4 10s. The plaintiff and her husband were given full board and were also provided with an unfurnished room on the premises in which they were to live. The employment began in February, 1949, and came to an end in May, 1950. On a claim by the plaintiff to be paid the statutory minimum wage to which she alleged she was entitled as an assistant in charge under the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and the schedule to the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1947, sched., para. 2, and the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1949 (which replaced the order of 1947), sched. I, para. 3, col. 3, being 70s. per week under the order of 1947 and 80s. under the order of 1949, amounting in all after certain deductions to £238 5s. 10d.,

HELD: the Act of 1943 did not apply to the employment of two or more persons together at a joint wage, and, therefore, the plaintiff had failed to prove the breach of any provision of the Act and her action must fail.

Per curiam: even if the Act and orders had applied to a joint employment, the plaintiff could not claim under col. 2 of para. 3 of sched. I to the order of 1949 (which laid down a scale of minimum wages where the employer supplied “full board” and “lodging”) because the unfurnished room provided by the defendants did not constitute “lodging” within the meaning of para. 22 (7) of sched. I to the order, nor could she claim under col. 3 of para. 3 (which applied where neither full board nor lodging was provided) because in this case full board was provided.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1949, has been repealed and replaced by the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 637).

ACTION for arrears of wages.

The defendants were the owners of garages in Lancashire with cafés attached, and by an oral agreement between them and the plaintiff and her husband they employed the plaintiff to look after a café and her husband to attend to the adjoining garage at a joint wage of £4 10s. per week with commission at the rate of ten per cent. of the profits. The plaintiff and her husband were so employed from February, 1949, until May, 1950. They were provided with an unfurnished room on the premises in which to live and were also given full board. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that as a catering worker her employment was governed by the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and she was entitled to the minimum wages laid down by the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1947, and the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1949, which replaced the 1947 order on Apr. 11, 1949. For the period ending on Apr. 10, 1949, the plaintiff claimed that, as a female assistant in charge in provincial area B, under the schedule to the order of 1947, para. 2, she was entitled to a wage of 70s. per week, and thereafter, as a female assistant in charge over twenty-one years old in provincial area B, under the order of 1949, sched. I, para. 3, col. 3, she was entitled to a wage of 80s. per week. The plaintiff's claim, after certain deductions had been made, and allowing for £40 paid to her by the defendants, amounted to £238 5s. 10d.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The question which arises for decision is whether the plaintiff has suffered an under-payment in her wages, contrary to the provisions of the Catering Wages Act, 1943. On this point I feel great doubt and difficulty. I cannot put my finger on any provision of the Act which has been broken because I do not think that this question of joint engagement was ever contemplated by the Act. Section 9 (1) of the Act states:

"If a contract between a worker to whom a wages regulation order applies and his employer provides for the payment of less remuneration than the statutory minimum remuneration, clear of all deductions, it shall have effect as if for that less remuneration there were substituted the statutory minimum remuneration clear of all deductions . . ."

The contract in the present case provides for a joint remuneration of two people of £4 10s. It is admitted that, if that £4 10s. was the plaintiff's remuneration alone, it would fulfil the requirements of the statute and orders made thereunder. But when you engage two people jointly and agree to pay a joint sum of money, it seems to me that you agree to pay two people, and any action in law brought on the agreement must be a joint claim. Each owns only half of the whole. It is impossible, however, to find any provision in the Act that where there is a joint employment the joint remuneration is to be treated as divided equally or anything of that sort. I am satisfied that if the plaintiff had sued for the £4 10s. she could have recovered it, although the defendants might have had a right to have the husband added. This £4 10s. was paid jointly, and, as I put it in the argument, it would be an extraordinary thing, assuming that the plaintiff, when employed alone, was entitled to £4 a week and also assuming that the agreement was: "I will engage you and your wife (i.e., two people) at a wage of £12 a week", if the wife could then say: "The plaintiff can now come and claim £4 extra because no provision has been made in the contract that £8 is the husband's wage and £4 the wife's wage."

Counsel for the plaintiff has contended that the matter is concluded in his favour by s. 10 (1) of the Act which provides:

"For the purpose of determining whether the remuneration paid or agreed to be paid to a worker to whom a wages regulation order applies is less than the statutory minimum remuneration clear of all deductions the net remuneration obtained or to be obtained by him in cash from his employer after allowing for his necessary expenditure, if any, in connection with the employment shall, subject to the provisions of this section, be deemed to be the remuneration paid or to be paid to him . . ."

I do not think that this section is meant to provide more than a method of calculating remuneration. In my opinion, the words "obtained by him in cash" are meant to emphasise that the employee is entitled to the money prescribed without any deduction.

The other difficulty which arises in the case is this. The scale of remuneration is now governed by the Wages Regulation (Unlicensed Place of Refreshment) Order, 1949. That provides, by para. 1 of sched. I, that, subject to the provisions of certain paragraphs,

"the weekly minimum remuneration for the workers to whom this schedule applies (other than occasional workers) shall be . . . (ii) for female workers (other than manageresses), in accordance with the provisions of para. 3."

If you look at para. 3 of sched. I you find first set out the grade or description of the worker. The scale for a week of forty-seven hours is set out in col. 2 where the employer supplies the worker with full board and lodging for seven days a week, and in col. 3 where the employer supplies the worker, not with full board and lodging, but with meals while on duty. "Full board" and "lodging" are thus defined by para. 22 which provides:

"(6) 'Full board' means not less than four meals a day of good and sufficient quality and quantity. (7) 'Lodging' means clean and adequate accommodation and facilities for eating, sleeping, washing and leisure."

Therefore, lodging must obviously include facilities for sleeping and washing. It does not mean a bare room. The defendants say that they did not provide lodging in this sense, and, therefore, col. 2 of para. 3 does not apply. One must give an ordinary, common-sense, interpretation to the words, and I cannot find that an unfurnished room, which was what the defendants provided for the plaintiff and her husband, complies with the description "accommodation for sleeping". No doubt, the room in question could be used as a bedroom, but merely because an empty room can be used as a bedroom I do not think it can be regarded as being sleeping accommodation. I think that sleeping accommodation must be a room where there is accommodation for sleeping—in other words, a room furnished with a bed, although I am not sure that, under such vague drafting, sleeping accommodation is anything more than a bed. There was no bed provided by the defendants and Mr. Plumpton (a member of the defendant firm) did not give any evidence which was sufficiently definite for me to find that he offered to furnish a room or any rooms for the plaintiff and her husband.

The words of col. 3:

"Where the employer supplies the worker with neither full board nor lodging but supplies her with meals of good and sufficient quality and quantity whilst on duty", are obviously meant to deal with the servant who lives out and wants a meal while she is on duty. Some days she may have two meals, some days three meals, some days only one. There we are dealing with a case where the contract is to supply a person with a meal while on duty, but here the contract was to provide full board, and, as col. 3 only applies where the employer does not contract to give full board or lodging, I do not see how I can apply it. I think this is a casus omissus, and that the draftsman has forgotten to provide for the case where, as here, board is provided, but not lodging within the meaning of this schedule. I suppose it was thought that full board would only be supplied where lodging was provided, and, as I have said, lodging seems to be put out of account here. These people were there full time, and so, therefore, you have got this unfortunate hiatus. One always tries to construe words so as to give them a sensible construction and prevent their failure, but I do not know of any canon of construction which enables me to construe "where the employer supplies the worker with neither full board nor lodging" to include a case where the employer supplies full board but no lodging. I cannot re-write the legislation. I must enter judgment for the defendants.

BARROW GREEN ESTATE CO. v. WALKER'S EXECUTORS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), December 18, 1953.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Dilapidations—Compensation—Claim by landlord—Allegation of lack of good husbandry—Matters to be considered by arbitrator—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 57 (1).

In determining the claim of a landlord to recover from a tenant of an agricultural holding compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 57 (1), in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, the holding caused by non-fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, an arbitrator is bound to have regard to the terms and conditions of the lease or agreement under which the holding is held, and any other contractual agreement between the landlord and the tenant in relation to the holding, and also to the Agriculture (Maintenance, Repair and Insurance of Fixed Equipment) Regulations, 1948, in so far, if at all, as they apply.

FOR THE AGRICULTURE ACT, 1947, s. 10 (3) and s. 11 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 1, p. 165; and FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 57 (1), see ibid., Vol. 28, p. 72.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of His Honour JUDGE GORDON CLARK at Reigate County Court dated Oct. 6, 1953, on a Case stated by an arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, by which order the learned judge reversed the arbitrator's decision that, in an arbitration to determine the claim of landlords to recover from tenants of an agricultural holding compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 57 (1), the arbitrator was either bound or entitled to have regard to the terms and conditions (i) of the lease or agreement under which the holding was held, (ii) of any other contractual agreement between the landlord and the tenant in relation to the holding, and (iii) of the Agriculture (Maintenance, Repair and Insurance of Fixed Equipment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 184), in so far, if at all, as they applied.

The landlords claimed compensation under s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948 in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, the holding. The tenants disputed the landlords' claims on the grounds that most of them were not properly chargeable and, in any case, were excessive, that the claims sought to ignore many of the landlords' obligations under the lease, and that the landlords were not entitled to evade their obligations and throw the burden thereof on the tenants. The lease contained covenants on the part of both parties with regard to the repair and cultivation of the holding.

The landlords contended that evidence of the lease and the terms thereof and evidence of any other contractual obligation entered into between the landlords and the tenants was inadmissible for the purpose of varying, diminishing or affecting compensation. The tenants contended that the arbitrator, in considering a claim for compensation under s. 57 (1), must have regard to the terms and conditions of the tenancy on which the holding was held and the obligations of the parties thereunder.

A. C. Goodall for the tenants.

J. J. Dean for the landlords.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE GORDON CLARK on a Case stated by an arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. The claim was by the landlords under a lease dated Jan. 23, 1939. The lessee was one, David Walker, who died in 1950. A notice to quit was served on his personal representatives as the tenants and they quitted on Sept. 29, 1952. No question arises as to that. The landlords claimed compensation from the personal representatives, as tenants, in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, the holding under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 57 (1), which provides:

A "The landlord of an agricultural holding shall be entitled to recover from a tenant of the holding, on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy, compensation in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, any part of the holding or anything in or on the holding caused by non-fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry."

The question of law which is posed by the Case Stated is:

B "In an arbitration to determine the claim of a landlord to recover from a tenant compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 57 (1), is the arbitrator (a) bound or (b) entitled to have regard to the terms and conditions (i) of the lease or agreement under which the holding was held, (ii) of any other contractual agreement between the landlord and the tenant in relation to the holding, and (iii) of S.I., 1948, No. 184, [the Agriculture (Maintenance, Repair and Insurance of Fixed Equipment) Regulations, 1948] in so far, if at all, as the said statutory instrument applies to the tenancy?"

D The arbitrator answered those questions in the affirmative, although I am not clear whether he thought he was bound or merely entitled to look at these documents and instruments. The landlords appealed to the county court judge, who reversed that decision and decided that those documents could not be considered.

E Before I refer to the other sections of the Act of 1948 which, I think, are relevant, I might refer to the Agriculture (Maintenance, Repair and Insurance of Fixed Equipment) Regulations, 1948, which were made under the Agriculture Act, 1947, s. 37 (1). They are still in force, although the rule-making power in s. 37 of that Act has been repealed and replaced by a rule-making power in s. 6 of the Act of 1948. No one disputes that this statutory instrument is still in force. Regulation 1 provides:

F "The provisions set forth in the schedule hereto relating to the maintenance, repair and insurance of fixed equipment, shall be deemed to be incorporated in every contract of tenancy of a holding, whether made before or after the commencement of Part III of the said Act, except in so far as they would impose on one of the parties to an agreement in writing a liability which under the agreement is imposed on the other."

G That is to say, that if and so far as the claim in the present case came under the regulations and the schedule thereto, the arbitrator must have regard to the terms of the original tenancy in order to see whether a liability which under the regulations was imposed on the landlords or tenants was under the tenancy agreement imposed on the other party. So far as the point of law is concerned, it was common ground before the learned judge and before us that this statutory instrument is in the same category as the contract itself because, if I may put it in this way, the machinery by which this instrument attains its object is by deeming that its provisions will be incorporated into the contract. If one cannot look at the contract, one cannot look at the provisions which are deemed to be incorporated in it.

H Before the learned judge, counsel who was then appearing for the tenants lumped these three classes of documents together and referred to them as the contract of tenancy. The words of s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948 are:

"... non-fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry."

Those rules are to be found in Part II of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and this Part of the Act has not been repealed. Section 9 provides:

"The following provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for the purpose of securing that owners of agricultural land fulfil their responsibilities to manage the land in accordance with the rules of good estate management, and that occupiers of agricultural land fulfil their responsibilities to farm the land in accordance with the rules of good husbandry."

Section 10 deals with good estate management and maintaining and repairing fixed equipment as part of estate management. Section 10 (3) provides:

"The responsibilities under the rules of good estate management of an owner of land in the occupation of another person shall not in relation to the maintenance and repair of fixed equipment include an obligation to do anything which that other person is under an obligation to do by virtue of any agreement."

We then pass to s. 11 (1) which provides that the occupier of an agricultural unit shall be deemed to fulfil his responsibilities to farm it in accordance with the rules of good husbandry if he is maintaining a reasonable standard of efficient production, while keeping the holding in a condition to enable such a standard to be maintained in the future. In sub-s. (2) there are set out matters to which regard must be had, but without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-s. (1) in considering what good husbandry is. It is, I think, relevant to notice that in the main, as one would expect, the matters are clearly matters for the tenant. For instance, s. 11 (2) (b) refers to the manner in which arable land is being cropped so as to maintain the land clean, and s. 11 (2) (c) refers to seeing that the unit is properly stocked. Other matters mentioned in s. 11 (2) are:

"(d) the necessary steps are being taken to secure and maintain crops and livestock free from disease and from infestation by insects and other pests; (e) the necessary steps are being taken for the protection and preservation of crops harvested or lifted, or in course of being harvested or lifted; (f) the necessary work of maintenance and repair is being carried out."

E

There, at any rate, in para. (f), one moves into the area of items which might fall on the tenant or on the landlord, and varying obligations would be found in different leases. Section 11 (3)—and this is relied on by counsel for the landlords in support of the decision of the learned county court judge—contains no express reference to the obligations under any agreement. It provides:

"The responsibilities under the rules of good husbandry of an occupier of an agricultural unit which is not owned by him shall not include an obligation to carry out any work of maintenance or repair which the owner of the unit or any part thereof is under an obligation to carry out in order to fulfil his responsibilities to manage in accordance with the rules of good estate management."

G

That would seem to provide that there should be no overlap rather than to be dealing expressly with the terms of the agreement in favour of the tenant.

The Agriculture Act, 1947, s. 37 (1), under which the statutory instrument to which I have already referred was made, assists in solving this problem. It provides:

H

"The Minister may, after consultation with such bodies of persons as appear to him to represent the interests of landlords and tenants of holdings, make regulations prescribing terms as to the maintenance, repair and insurance of fixed equipment which shall be deemed to be incorporated in every contract of tenancy of a holding, whether made before or after the commencement of this Part of this Act, except in so far as they would impose on one of the parties to an agreement in writing a liability which under the agreement is imposed on the other."

The Act thereby empowers the Minister to deal in detail with the maintenance and repair of fixed equipment and includes an express provision that the regulations must not be deemed to impose on one party a liability which under an agreement is imposed on the other.

- A With that examination of those sections, I will return to s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948. The submission made on behalf of the landlords seems to me to be one which, on general principles of construction, would require the plainest possible words for one to adopt it in construing this sub-section. What it would mean is this. Let me assume—and it is, indeed, the case here—that under the contract of tenancy the landlord has undertaken expressly an obligation in respect of maintenance and repair which, had the contract of tenancy been silent on the point, would have fallen on the tenant either under the regulations or under the general principles which would be applied in such a matter by an arbitrator. Let me assume that the landlord has failed to carry out his obligations and that if the tenancy continued he could be sued. Without begging any question as to the measure of damage, I will assume that the cost of making good the maintenance and repair which he had failed to carry out would be £500. The lessee having died, the landlord realises that the relatives do not want to retain the property and that the tenant will shortly be quitting. If the landlord is right in this case he could say to himself: "Not only must I not now maintain what I ought to have maintained and repair what I ought to have repaired, but I hope that it all gets rather worse by the time the tenant quits. Assuming then the cost of doing what I should have done is £700, I shall be able to recover £700 under s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948." It would, indeed, be surprising if Parliament had conferred such a windfall on landlords. Counsel for the landlords said with some force that there may be sections in the Act which confer benefits on tenants and it would not be surprising if one finds somewhere benefits conferred on the landlord. That may well be, but one would not expect to find a benefit conferred on bad landlords, i.e., those who have not carried out their obligations. I think these words in s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948

"... non-fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities . . .",

- F cannot be construed as including an obligation which, under the contract of tenancy, the landlord has himself undertaken to perform. Reliance was placed as against that construction on the fact that, under s. 57 (3), a landlord may, in lieu of claiming compensation under s. 57 (1), claim compensation in accordance with a written contract of tenancy. I do not think that that helps the argument. It is, I think, to cover the possibility of a contract of tenancy which imposes on the tenant a liability greater than that which the Act imposes on him. It was, no doubt, considered wrong to deprive the landlord of a right to proceed under such a contract.

- G I need not refer in detail to s. 7 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, except to say that I think that reinforces the argument for the tenant. The learned judge referred to s. 10 and s. 11 of the Act of 1947, and he based his decision in part on the absence of any reference in s. 11 (3) to the agreement. I am bound to say that, having regard to the general provisions of that Act, I am led to the conclusion that they were not intended to shift burdens expressly undertaken by one or the other except in the case where express words were used. I would have expected to find a reference in s. 11 (3) to the agreement, but there may be some explanation consistent with my construction of s. 57 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. I do not propose to go into it in detail because, even if an argument can be based on the absence of any reference there to the agreement, I am quite clear that that would not entitle one to construe s. 57 (1) as including a responsibility which by contract the landlord himself had undertaken. Counsel for the landlords referred to s. 65 of the Act of 1948 which provides that one cannot contract out of the right which the Act confers for compensation, but I do not think that is material in the present case.

For these reasons, with respect to the learned judge, I have come to a different conclusion, and I would allow the appeal and would answer the question by saying that, in my view, the arbitrator is bound to have regard to the terms and conditions of the lease or agreement under which the holding was held, and to any other contractual agreement between the landlord and the tenant in relation to the holding, and to the regulations of 1948 in so far, if at all, as they apply.

DENNING, L.J.: By virtue of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, the tenant of agricultural land is under a responsibility to farm the land in accordance with the rules of good husbandry. The question in this case is whether the tenants can, by contract, shift this responsibility on to the owners of the land. This question does not arise in regard to the actual cultivation of the land, but only in regard to the maintenance and repair of fixed equipment. Let me give an instance. "Fixed equipment" includes hedges and fencing. If there had been nothing in the contract of tenancy, the tenants would have been bound, under the statutory regulations, to provide all the material and labour to keep up the hedges and fences, but under the contract of tenancy, the landlords were bound to provide the material (such as the posts and wire) and the tenants were bound to provide the labour. The landlords say that, despite the contract, they can impose on the tenants the responsibility of providing the material, and they say that, if the tenants do not provide it, the landlords can, at the end of the tenancy, get compensation for any deterioration on that account.

The question depends on the true interpretation of the Acts. It is quite clear from s. 9, s. 10 and s. 11 of the Act of 1947 that Parliament intended that the fixed equipment should be properly maintained and repaired, and that it should be maintained either by the owner or the occupier, but those sections do not make it clear on whom the responsibility should fall. That only appears from other parts of the Act and from the regulations made thereunder. These show that if the contract of tenancy is silent on the matter, then by the regulations the tenant is bound to maintain and repair the fixed equipment, but if and in so far as the contract of tenancy puts the responsibility on the landlord, then the contractual responsibility remains intact. There is nothing in the Acts which absolves the landlord from his contractual responsibility, but, on the other hand, there is much to preserve it. I need only mention s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1947, which shows that, in order to ascertain their respective liabilities, the Minister can call for a sight of the contract, and s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1947 which says that the regulations must not contradict the contract. Much reliance was placed by the landlords on s. 10 (3) and s. 11 (3) of the Act of 1947, but those provisions are designed only to ensure that there shall be no overlap.

In my opinion, therefore, the arbitrator, in assessing the responsibility of the tenant to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry, must take into account any specific obligations which by contract are placed on the landlord. The tenant cannot be made to pay for the landlord's own breaches of contract. I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the only point of substance which can be urged in support of the landlords' contention is the difference in phraseology which the legislature used in s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1947 as contrasted with that used in s. 11 (3) of that Act, the difference being that, whereas in s. 10 (3), contained as it is in a section which deals with the responsibilities of the owner in relation to good estate management, it is enacted that these responsibilities

" . . . shall not in relation to the maintenance and repair of fixed equipment include an obligation to do anything which that [the person in occupation of the land] is under an obligation to do by virtue of any agreement " in s. 11 (3) there is excepted from the responsibilities of the occupier in relation to the rules of good husbandry

“ . . . an obligation to carry out any work of maintenance or repair which the owner of the unit or any part thereof is under an obligation to carry out in order to fulfil his responsibilities to manage in accordance with the rules of good estate management ”,

A which means there the statutory rules of good estate management, or so it is suggested, as distinct from contractual responsibilities. What the explanation of the difference in the language is—the express reference to an agreement in s. 10 (3), and no such express reference in s. 11 (3)—I am not sure. But, as I say, it is, to my mind, the only point which is of any substance or weight in favour of an argument which leads to such remarkable results as have been indicated in the course of the discussion. I think it would be giving it a weight which it is quite unable to bear as a basis for the view which the landlords seek to found on it. The possible results have been illustrated by SOMERVELL and DENNING, L.JJ., and it seems to me plain that the heavier the responsibilities which a landlord contractually undertook, the more inevitably he would resort to s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948 instead of resorting to his right under the covenants, because he would then recover from the tenant more and more in respect of the damage caused by his own contractual omissions. It seems to me to be almost a ludicrous result and it would need language far clearer than is to be found in any of the statutory provisions to which we were referred to justify such a finding.

D I would add in conclusion that, whatever the intention was in omitting from s. 11 (3) the reference to the agreement which is to be found in s. 10 (3), it seems to me plain that, in order to ascertain what the landlord's obligations are in relation to good estate management, as also in order to ascertain what the tenant's duties are in relation to good husbandry, one has to look at the contract. One is compelled to do that in express terms by s. 10 (3), and, as I think, by virtue of compelling inference under the provisions of s. 11 (3). For these reasons, and for the reasons which my brethren have indicated, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

JAMES ARCHDALE & CO., LTD. v. COMSERVICES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), December 8, 1953.]

Negligence—Contracting out of liability—Exception clause—General words—Clear intention of parties.

The defendants were employed by the plaintiffs to re-decorate the plaintiffs' premises under a contract which, by cl. 14 (b), provided: "The contractor [the defendants] shall be liable for and shall indemnify the employer [the plaintiffs] against and . . . shall insure against any liability, loss, claim . . . in respect of any injury or damage whatsoever to any property real or personal in so far as such injury or damage arises out of or in the . . . execution of the works, and provided always that the same is due to any negligence . . . of the contractor, his servants or agents . . . and subject also as regards loss or damage by fire to the provisions contained in cl. 15 of these conditions". Clause 15 (b) provided that the ". . . existing structures and the works and unfixed materials (except plant, tools and equipment) shall be at the sole risk of the employer as regards loss or damage by fire and the employer shall maintain a proper policy of insurance against that risk . . .". While the work of re-decoration was in progress, a fire, which the court found to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants, broke out on the plaintiffs' premises, causing damage to the building. On a claim under cl. 14 (b) in respect of the cost of repairs to the building, the plaintiffs relied on the principle that general words in an exception clause do not ordinarily except the party seeking to rely on the exception from liability for his own negligence or that of his servants.

HELD: the principle relied on by the plaintiffs was merely a rule of construction and had no application where the parties had clearly expressed their intention; on the true construction of the contract, in so far as cl. 14 (b) dealt with loss or damage by fire, the parties had clearly expressed their intention that it should be read subject to cl. 15 (b) under which the risk of fire was on the plaintiffs; and, therefore, the defendants were not liable.

AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF EXCEPTION CLAUSES IN A CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, p. 327, para. 456.

Case referred to:

(1) Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 244; [1945] K.B. 189; 114 L.J.K.B. 196; 172 L.T. 153; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of HILBERY, J., at Worcester Summer Assizes, dated May 28, 1953.

The defendants, Comservices, Ltd., were employed by the plaintiffs, James Archdale & Co., Ltd., who were engineers and manufacturers of machinery, to re-decorate the plaintiffs' factory and office premises under a contract which was in the form of and included all the matters contained in the standard agreement of the Royal Institute of British Architects and schedule of conditions for building contracts as issued in 1952. Clause 14 (b) of the contract between the parties provided:

"Injury to property. The contractor shall be liable for and shall indemnify the employer against . . . any liability, loss, claim or proceedings in respect of any injury or damage whatsoever to any property real or personal in so far as such injury or damage arises out of or in the course of or by reason of the execution of the works, and provided always that the same is due to any negligence, omission or default of the contractor, his servants or agents or of any sub-contractor or to any circumstances within the contractor's control; and subject also as regards loss or damage by fire to the provisions contained in cl. 15 of these conditions."

Clause 15 (b) of the contract provided:

A "The existing structures and the works and unfixed materials (except plant, tools and equipment) shall be at the sole risk of the employer as regards loss or damage by fire and the employer shall maintain a proper policy of insurance against that risk, which policy and the receipt for the last paid premium for its renewal he shall upon request produce for inspection by the contractor and, if any loss or damage affecting the works is so occasioned by fire, the employer shall pay to the contractor the full value of all work and materials then executed and delivered calculated as provided by cl. 9 of these conditions . . ."

B While the work of re-decoration was in progress a fire broke out on the plaintiffs' premises, causing damage to the building of the machine tool assembly shop and the machinery and plant. In a claim for, inter alia, £2,858 15s. 4d. in respect of the cost of repairs to the building, the plaintiffs alleged that the fire was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants, and that the defendants were, therefore, liable under cl. 14 (b) of the contract. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs were precluded from recovering such sums in respect of damage to the building because cl. 14 (b), which provided that the liability of the C defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs against damage to property which arose during the execution of the work and was caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants, was expressly, in respect of fire risk, made subject to cl. 15 (b) which placed on the plaintiffs the duty to insure against fire. D HILBERY, J., found that the fire was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants, but held that, on the true construction of cl. 14 (b) and cl. 15 (b), the defendants were protected from liability to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of damage by fire to the buildings.

E SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the plaintiffs referred to cases which deal with exception clauses in relation to the negligence of the party claiming the benefit of the exception. Any clause, of course, has to be considered according to its actual wording, but, speaking generally, I think one can summarise the cases in this way. General words in an exception clause do not ordinarily except the party seeking to rely on the exception from liability for his own negligence or that of his servants. There is an F exception to what I may call that prima facie approach if, looking more closely into the subject-matter, it is found that substantially the only scope for the operation of the exception clause is the negligence of the servant of the person who is seeking the benefit of it. In that case, although the words are general, such a clause has been construed as excluding a liability for negligence. An example of this exception to what I call the prima facie approach will be found in G Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (1). I do not think that cases dealing with what I call an ordinary exception clause in a contract, where there is a primary obligation under the contract and then an exception clause, afford any great assistance in construing the present clauses, but, no doubt, it is right that one should bear in mind those decisions. I think it is worth noting (and this relates to the principle applied in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (1)), that cl. 14 (b) in H the main operates on the negligence of the contractor or his servants or agents. It is true that it brings in negligence of a sub-contractor, or, presumably, his servants or agents, for which, normally, at common law the contractor would not be liable. It also contains what I should describe as the rather cryptic words "or to any circumstances within the contractor's control". But it is worth bearing in mind that by far the most probable scope of its operation would be the negligence of the contractor or his servants or agents. There is another point which I think has some importance, and that is that both cl. 14 (b) and cl. 15 (b) contain obligations to insure, imposed in the one case on the contractor and in the other case on the employer. Indeed, if one looks at cl. 14 (b), one finds that it was unnecessary to set out that the contractor should be liable for the negligence of his own servants or agents, and, in so far as that part of the subject-matter is concerned, the operative words are those creating the obligation to insure. Having those two points in mind, I am quite clearly of opinion that the learned judge was right and that the natural construction of these two clauses, read together, is that, in so far as loss or damage by fire come within the earlier words of cl. 14 (b), that is to be taken out of cl. 14 (b) altogether. It is then dealt with by cl. 15 (b) under which the sole risk is on the employer, and he must insure.

These questions do not bear of much elaboration, but I think the phrase contained in cl. 15 (b) which was referred to in argument, viz.,

tends, apart from what I may call the general lay-out of the two clauses, to reinforce the conclusion to which I have come. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: This is not the ordinary case of a clause simply providing which party is to bear the loss. The clauses in this case are directed to the additional question: Which party is to insure? The contractor is to insure against the risk of injury to persons. He is also to insure against the risk of injury to property, save for this—cl. 14 (b) expressly says that loss or damage by fire is in a category by itself. The employer is to insure against the risk of fire. When viewed in relation to insurance it is quite plain that the risk of fire is on the employer however it is caused (even though caused by the negligence of the contractor's servants) and he is the person who must insure against it. I agree, therefore, with my Lord that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. The principle which was established or recognised by the cases to which counsel for the plaintiffs referred can and ought to be invoked wherever the parties to a contract leave their intention in doubt. But when the parties have clearly expressed what their intention is, there is no necessity to refer to the principle. The principle is one of construction and no more, and it is not entitled to the status of a rule of law.

Construing cl. 14 (b) and cl. 15 (b) of this contract by themselves I have little doubt that they bear the meaning which SOMERVELL, L.J., has attributed to them, for the reasons which he has given. If so, it would be quite wrong to attribute a different meaning simply by reason of a principle of construction which has been evolved for the solution of cases of a similar type, but where the parties have not expressed themselves sufficiently clearly.

With regard to the suggestion that the plaintiffs are liable to pay the defendants for damage by fire caused to the work by the negligence of the defendants, I think cl. 15 (b) has in that respect been clumsily worded, but the intention of the parties, I think, is reasonably clear, and the draftsman's mind was directed to the receipt of the policy moneys under the insurance policy which is contemplated by the sub-clause, and the payment was to be made only out of those moneys. I do not think that that element throws very much light on the problem which we have to solve. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. LAING.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), October 14, 15, 19, 20, 21, 22, December 7, 1953.]

Privy Council—New South Wales—Bank—Current account—Demand by customer for payment of credit balance—Onus of proof of balance—Pleading—Plea of “indebitatus assumpsit”—Effect of plea of “never indebted”—Rules made under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1899 (No. 21) (New South Wales), r. 65.

New South Wales has retained the system of pleadings which obtained in England under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the provisions of which, and the rules made thereunder, being in substance reproduced in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1899, of New South Wales, and the rules made under that Act. By r. 65 of those rules: “To causes of action to which the plea of ‘never was indebted’ is applicable . . . the plea of non assumpsit shall be inadmissible, and the plea of ‘never was indebted’ will operate as a denial of those matters of fact from which the liability of the defendant arises.”

From January, 1947, to February, 1951, the respondent, the plaintiff in the action, had a current account with the appellant bank, the defendant, into which he from time to time paid sums amounting in the aggregate to over £100,000. At intervals during this period he drew cheques on the account which were met by the bank. By October, 1950, he had come to suspect that eight cheques, drawn for a total amount of £19,412 10s. 9d., which had been debited to the account, had been forged, and in February, 1951, he presented eight other cheques through the Bank of Australasia to the bank for amounts exactly corresponding to that of the cheques which he claimed had been forged. The bank refused to meet these cheques, and he claimed £19,412 10s. 9d. from it by specially indorsed writ. In pursuance of the procedure under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1899, the plaintiff filed a declaration based on the old “indebitatus assumpsit” count in the following terms: “For money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff and for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant”, and he claimed £19,412 10s. 9d. To this declaration the bank filed the plea of “never indebted”. At the trial neither party gave oral evidence, the plaintiff putting in evidence a copy of his current account and a letter from the bank to the Bank of Australasia returning the eight disputed cheques as admissions by the bank entitling him to succeed, and the cheques themselves as evidence of his demand. The case turned on a point of pleading—the effect in the circumstances of the case of a plea of “never indebted”.

HELD: English authority and the wording of r. 65 made it plain that on the issue raised by the plea of “never indebted” the onus of proving the fulfilment of conditions precedent was on the plaintiff: Hudson v. Bilton (1856) (6 E. & B. 565), and Broomfield v. Smith (1836) (1 M. & W. 542), applied; in a customer and banker case one such condition precedent was the existence in the customer’s account of funds sufficient to meet the customer’s demand, and it was for the customer to establish this sufficiency as subsisting at the time of demand; the only evidence consisted of the current account and the defendant bank’s letter to the Bank of Australasia, neither of which in themselves, nor the two in combination, amounted to an admission by the defendant bank that the plaintiff’s account contained sufficient funds to meet his demand; and, therefore, the plaintiff had not discharged the onus on him.

APPEAL by the Bank of New South Wales, the defendant in the action, against a judgment of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, dated Oct. 7, 1952, affirming a judgment of McCLEMENS, J., in the Supreme Court, dated May 19 and 20, 1952.

K. A. Ferguson, Q.C., and C. L. D. Meares (both of the Australian Bar) for the respondent (the plaintiff).

Dec. 7. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: This is an appeal by the defendant in the action against a judgment of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales given on Oct. 7, 1952. By that decision the Full Court dismissed an appeal from a judgment of May 19 and 20, 1952, of McCLEMENS, J., in an action in which the jury was, by consent, dispensed with at the trial. McCLEMENS, J., found a verdict and entered judgment for the plaintiff for £19,412 10s. 9d. in circumstances hereinafter appearing.

From January, 1947, to February, 1951, the plaintiff was a customer of the defendant bank and had a current account with it, into which in that period he from time to time paid sums amounting in the aggregate to over £100,000. At intervals during this period cheques were presented to the bank drawn on this account, and were met by the bank. By Feb. 8, 1951 (indeed, earlier, in October, 1950), the plaintiff had come to believe or suspect that some of the cheques debited to his account had been forged. These were eight cheques totalling £19,412 10s. 9d. The effect of debiting these cheques to the plaintiff's account was to reduce the credit balance, by Feb. 8, 1951, to about £18. On that date the plaintiff presented to the defendant bank through the Bank of Australasia eight other cheques for amounts exactly corresponding to that of those which he claimed were forged. If they were forged, the bank should not have honoured them, and, if it had not done so, there would, on Feb. 8, 1951, have been £19,412 10s. 9d. in the account and about £18 to spare, and the eight cheques of that date could, accordingly, have been met. The bank returned the eight cheques of Feb. 8, 1951, to the Bank of Australasia indorsed "refer to drawer: bona fide dispute state of account arising alleged forged cheques". The plaintiff customer thereupon, by specially indorsed writ of Feb. 16, 1951, claimed £19,412 10s. 9d. as money "received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff". Particulars followed of the amounts of the "forged" cheques totalling £19,412 10s. 9d.

The real issue raised by these events was whether the eight suspect cheques were in fact forged or in fact genuine and authorised mandates to draw on the plaintiff's account, and it might not unreasonably have been expected that the parties, or that one of them on whom the onus lay, would give evidence in the box to deny or to affirm the authenticity of the signatures on these cheques of the plaintiff as drawer. However, in the events which happened the pleadings were so framed as, in the view of both parties, to make it unnecessary for either of them to give oral testimony at all. The case was made to turn on a point of pleading. This seems to their Lordships a regrettable development. The case cannot be understood without bearing in mind that New South Wales has retained the system of pleadings which obtained in England before the Judicature Acts—in fact, that established under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the provisions of which, and the rules made thereunder, are in substance reproduced in the Common Law Procedure Act (New South Wales) of 1899, and the rules made under that Act. In pursuance of this procedure the plaintiff, on Mar. 1, 1951, filed a declaration based on the old “indebitatus assumpsit” count, in the following terms:

“For money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff and for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant.”

And the plaintiff claimed the sum of £19,412 10s. 9d.

It may be noted, though their Lordships are of opinion that this does not influence the result: (i) that there was a “variance” between the writ and the declaration, since the declaration relied on money had and received and money lent, and the writ, originally, on the former only. This was adjusted by an amendment at the trial, adding to the writ the words “for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant and” before the words “for money received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff . . .”; (ii) that the particulars given under the writ as it originally stood, as particulars of money had and received, and stating that certain sums were subtracted from the plaintiff’s account by forged cheques, could hardly stand as particulars of “money lent” after the writ was amended, except, possibly, as to the total specified of £19,412 10s. 9d. The amount “lent” to the bank might be measured or particularised by the gross amounts paid in, or by the credit balance at a given time, but assuredly not by the amounts (rightly or wrongly) debited to the account by the bank.

However, no application was made based on the insufficiency of the particulars in relation to the added claim for money lent either for further and better particulars or for a stay or for an order to strike out the writ, and their Lordships think nothing turns on this insufficiency.

To the declaration framed on the indebitatus count for money lent and money had and received the bank filed the plea of “Never indebted”. By his replication the plaintiff joined issue on this plea.

At the trial at nisi prius before McCLEMENS, J., and a jury of four, the jury, as already stated, having been dispensed with by consent at a certain stage, neither party gave nor called oral evidence. The plaintiff, having called on the defendant bank to furnish a copy of his current account, tendered it in evidence, and also relied on the letter of the defendant bank to the Bank of Australasia. The current account showed credits over a long period amounting in the aggregate to over £100,000, and debits which (including the eight disputed cheques) reduced the balance, as on Feb. 8, 1951, to £18 odd. The letter from the defendant bank to the Bank of Australasia, dated Feb. 12, 1951, reads as follows:

“Dear Sir, W. R. J. Laing. With reference to certain cheques itemized hereunder, bearing date Feb. 8, 1951, drawn by W. R. J. Laing, presented by you for payment and returned to you herewith with the answer ‘Refer to drawer—bona fide dispute state of account arising alleged forged cheques’ indorsed thereon, we advise that certain funds which the drawer may have considered were at his disposal and which would have been sufficient to meet such cheques are the subject of a bona fide dispute arising out of alleged forgeries.

These documents were tendered by the plaintiff and admitted in evidence (together with other letters which are immaterial to the issue). The plaintiff also tendered the eight cheques of Feb. 8, 1951, referred to in the letter of Feb. 12, 1951, solely as evidence of a “demand”, which, under the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (1), is an essential precondition of a customer’s cause of action when suing a bank for a debt due from it in respect of a current account. It is clear that the plaintiff relied on A, B and C cumulatively as admissions by the bank sufficient to entitle him to succeed. The argument is somewhat elliptically recorded, the formula “argument ensued” occurring repeatedly. Plaintiff’s counsel seems to have claimed in the court of first instance (as he certainly did on appeal to the Full Court) that he had paid money into his current account in excess of the sum claimed and that the last-named sum had been demanded by the cheques of Feb. 8, 1951, for £19,412. Defendant’s counsel, at the close of the plaintiff’s case, asked for a non-suit, but this issue was neither argued nor persisted in, since defendant’s counsel resiled from it and proceeded to ask instead for a “direction verdict”, viz., a direction to the jury that the plaintiff had made out no case. Defendant’s counsel proceeded to argue that on Feb. 8, 1951, there were no funds in the plaintiff’s account sufficient to meet the eight cheques then presented. Counsel for the plaintiff then, as already indicated, asked for leave to amend the writ (which had been limited to “money had and received”) so as to read

“amount due by the defendant to the plaintiff for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant and for money had and received by the defendant and dealt with in the manner following:—.”

Then followed particulars of the eight cheques said to have been forged. Counsel for the bank did not oppose this amendment, subject to costs. Counsel for the plaintiff made it clear that he was not suing for the dishonour, as such, of these eight cheques. He merely relied on the presentation of another eight cheques of the same amounts on Feb. 8, 1951, as a “demand”.

F

The jury were then discharged by consent and the learned judge, on May 20, 1952, gave judgment for the plaintiff, having reached the conclusion that he could not have directed a jury that the plaintiff had made out no case. After observing that the real issue in the case, viz., the genuineness vel non of the eight (earlier) cheques had been burked or evaded by the parties and that the result of their doing so was to reduce the issue in the main to a technical point of pleading, he proceeded to summarise the arguments presented before him and to hold that there was some evidence (on the pleadings as they stood) to submit for consideration by a jury that

H

“the money was lent, that the money was demanded back, and that the money has not been paid.”

The learned judge indicated that in his view the proper plea in such a case as that before him was not “never indebted” but “payment”, an issue which loomed large in the decision, later on, of the Full Court of the Supreme Court. It would seem to follow from this opinion that, in the absence of a plea of “payment”, no evidence could be given of drawings on the account which would, in law, amount to part repayments of the loan or loans. Notwithstanding this, the

A learned judge disagreed with the plaintiff's submission that while the credit items in the account are admissions by the bank and evidence for him, the debit items are "not evidence for the bank, or against" the plaintiff; and says that the plaintiff, having put in this document, must take the document as it stands as a whole. Yet when, on the second day of the hearing, the bank puts forward this contention, he appears to reject it, and adheres to the decision which he had adumbrated in favour of the plaintiff, basing himself on (i) the presentation of the eight cheques on Feb. 8, 1951, and the notation of the bank thereon, (ii) the bank's letter of Feb. 12, 1951, as affording some evidence, on the pleadings as they stood, to go to a jury that money was "lent, demanded back, and not repaid." He seems at this stage to have treated the account, of which he had ruled that both sides—debits as well as credits—were equally valid and binding, either B as affording no evidence in favour of the bank, or as affording no evidence in favour of either party.

Counsel for the plaintiff does not seem to have relied exclusively on these factors, (i) and (ii), either before the trial judge or the Full Court. He relied also on the account. He alleged, in effect, that, on the common count for "money lent", the money lent was represented by the gross payments in to the credit side of his account, and that this, plus a demand for an amount not exceeding the C payments in, was (on a plea of "never indebted") the sole precondition of the bank's liability to repay him that amount. He argued further that the only matters which could be raised in answer to such a claim under the plea of "not indebted"—the only plea entered in this case—were either that the money was not "lent" (in the sense above indicated) or that no demand was made. On a D plea of "payment" the depletion of the account by authorised withdrawals could be proved, but not under a mere plea of "never indebted".

The learned judge, having decided for the plaintiff on the ground indicated, the defendant, by notice of appeal filed on May 28, 1952, appealed to the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (STREET, C.J., OWEN and HERRON, JJ.). In his judgment (with which in substance though not in detail the other two judges agreed), STREET, C.J., accepted the submission that on an indebitatus E count for money lent, to which "never indebted" and nothing else was pleaded, the onus on the plaintiff is as follows:

"Coming now to the pleadings in the action, the relationship of the parties being that of creditor and debtor, the cause of action was properly framed as an action in debt in the form of a count for money lent. To this count F there might be many and various defences, but the only plea put on the file was one of 'never indebted' and this defined the issue between the parties. The count for money payable for money lent involves the allegation that money was in fact lent to the defendant under a contract, express or implied, in terms capable of giving rise to a presently payable debt, and it involves also the allegation that in fact the money was payable at the time when the G action was brought. The plea of 'never indebted' in the case of an express contract denies the contract of loan, that is, it denies that the money was lent on a promise capable of requiring repayment at the date when the action was brought. [The italics are their Lordships'.] In the case of an implied contract, such as the present, which arises out of the proved relationship of banker and customer, it denies the matters of fact from which a promise H to repay was capable of being inferred. In other words, it denies the loan, and nothing more. Though the money is owed by the bank when it has been received from the customer, it is not in fact repayable until demand is made, but the assertion of the making of the necessary demand is contained in the allegation that the money was 'payable', as this performs the same function as the allegation in a count framed in assumpsit that 'all conditions were fulfilled and all things happened and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff' to sue. A plea of 'non assumpsit' does not put this allegation of performance of conditions precedent in issue any more than it puts in issue the breach alleged. No question arises here, however, in this respect, as the respondent in fact proved the demand, and having proved the relationship of banker and customer and the deposit of large sums of money, far more than sufficient to meet the cheques of Feb. 8, 1951, he thereby provided prima facie proof of a debt payable at the time of action brought . . . The bank now argues that the respondent, having put in evidence the whole of the bank's statements relating to his account, both the credit and the debit sides, he must fail because he has proved that at the date of the demand the bank only owed him a balance of £18. The appellant's argument is that the bank's statement shows that there was not sufficient money owing to the respondent at the crucial date to meet the cheques drawn on Feb. 8, 1951. This argument is fallacious. Constant reference was made to the balance shown in the books of the bank on Feb. 8, but this means nothing by itself. It does not represent a deposit by the [plaintiff] nor a payment by the bank. It is merely the arithmetical result of a mechanical addition of both the debit and the credit entries, and is a mere summary of the arithmetical effect of those entries. It results from the fact that the books purport to show that while large sums have been paid in by the [plaintiff], other large sums have also been paid out to him by the bank, and the balance is reached by reason of the assertion that, while the bank admits receiving money, it also paid out to the [plaintiff] practically the same total as that paid in. It is true that there are cases where both sides of an account, even if tendered by a party for the purpose of using one side only, must be taken into account also in favour of the other party; but these are cases where both sides of the account are relevant to the issues raised between the parties by the pleadings . . . The plea which was filed denying the loan by the [plaintiff] is, on the bank's own books, admittedly unsupportable, for they record the payments to the bank relied upon by the [plaintiff]. To seek to assert that, despite these substantial payments to the bank, only £18 was owed on Feb. 8, 1951, involves necessarily the assertion that money had been repaid to the [plaintiff] in such amounts as to reduce his credit balance to that figure."

The gist of this judgment is that the implied contract between customer and banker is to this extent on all fours with the contract between any other creditor and debtor: each payment into the account is a loan and creates a debt. The plea "never indebted" merely puts in issue the payments in—the credit side of the account.

It is quite true that the debtor bank may prove, if it can, that the amount credited has been reduced by authorised withdrawals to vanishing point (or, in the case of an overdraft, below that point) and that it suffices for a bank, refusing to meet a demand for £x, to show that by the time of the demand it has thus been reduced to a point where it falls short of £x. But, so the argument runs, the bank must, in order to prove this, set up a plea, not of "never indebted" but of "payment"—the appropriate plea where a debt is alleged to have been repaid in part or in whole—and no such plea was set up in this case originally, nor was any request for leave to amend in that sense ever asked for, though it would have been granted on terms as certainly as the plaintiff's amendment of his writ.

The relevant rules under the Common Law Procedure Act of New South Wales may here with advantage be set out—

"64. In all actions on simple contract, except as hereinafter excepted, the plea of non assumpsit, or a plea traversing the contract or agreement alleged in the declaration, shall operate only as a denial in fact of the express contract, promise, or agreement alleged, or of the matters of fact from which the contract, promise, or agreement alleged may be implied by law.

"Exempli gratia.—In an action on a warranty, such pleas will operate as a denial of the fact of the sale and warranty having been given, but not of the breach; and, in an action on a policy of insurance, of the subscription to the alleged policy by the defendant, but not of the interest, of the commencement of the risk, of the loss, or of the alleged compliance with warranties.

"In actions against carriers and other bailees for not delivering or not keeping goods safe, or not returning them on request, and in actions against agents for not accounting such pleas will operate as a denial of any express or implied contract to the effect alleged in the declaration but not of the breach.

"65. To causes of action to which the plea of 'never was indebted' is applicable, as provided in sched. III to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1899, and to those of a like nature, the plea of non assumpsit shall be inadmissible, and the plea of 'never was indebted' will operate as a denial of those matters of fact from which the liability of the defendant arises. [The italics are their Lordships']

"Exempli gratia.—In actions for goods bargained and sold, or sold and delivered, the plea will operate as a denial of the bargain and sale, or sale and delivery, in point of fact; in the like action for money had and received, it will operate as a denial both of the receipt of the money and the existence of those facts which make such receipt by the defendant a receipt to the use of the plaintiff.

"67. In every species of action on contract, all matters in confession and avoidance, including not only those by way of discharge, but those which show the transaction to be either void or voidable in point of law, on the ground of fraud or otherwise, shall be specially pleaded.

"Exempli gratia.—Infancy, coverture, release, payment, performance, illegality of consideration either by statute or common law, drawing, indorsing, accepting, etc., bills or notes by way of accommodation, set-off, mutual credit, unseaworthiness, misrepresentation, concealment, deviation, and various other defences must be pleaded.

"73. Payment shall not be received in evidence, in any case in reduction of the debt or claim, without a plea of payment. Provided that in respect of any sum for which the plaintiff has specifically given credit in his particulars of demand, or in the special indorsement, if any, on the summons, no such plea shall be necessary."

The case seems to their Lordships to depend on the answer to two questions: A. What does a plea of "never indebted" and what does it not, put in issue? In particular, does it put the plaintiff to proof of the performance of conditions precedent to the present payability of the debt? B. Whatever onus it throws on the plaintiff, did the plaintiff discharge that onus in this case? On these issues their Lordships are indebted to counsel on both sides for much interesting and helpful argument.

A. As to the first issue, there is curiously little English case law which is directly in point. In BULLEN AND LEAKE'S PRECEDENTS OF PLEADINGS, 3rd ed., 1868, at the top of p. 463, the following passage occurs under the heading of "Indebitatus Counts":

"If the plaintiff relies on an express contract which was subject to any conditions before the absolute liability of the defendant attaches, he is bound to prove under an issue raised by this plea the happening or performance of those conditions."

And cf. ibid., pp. 35-37 and p. 462.

The principle here stated was applied by cases such as Hudson v. Bilton (2) and Broomfield v. Smith (3). In Hudson v. Bilton (2) a liquidated sum in money was payable when a certain ship "sailed". The count was an indebitatus count, and the plea was "never indebted". The ship put out over the bar and put back, the captain being still ashore. The question was whether this amounted to her "sailing". The plaintiff failed because on these facts he did not establish that the ship had sailed; but this decision clearly assumed that proof of this fact, on the pleadings, rested on him. In Broomfield v. Smith (3) there was an indebitatus count for the price of goods sold and delivered and a plea of "never indebted". There was no plea in confession and avoidance. The sale and delivery were proved, but there was a term in the contract that the goods were sold on a period of credit, and at the time of the claim this period was unexpired. The plaintiff succeeded before the court of first instance, but failed on appeal, because the expiration of the period of credit was held to be a condition precedent to his cause of action and he had not established it. If the plaintiff's proposition had been well founded the defendant could not have succeeded on a plea of "never indebted", because performance of the conditions precedent (in this case expiration of the period of credit), would have been presumed in his favour. (See also Scott v. Parker (4), where, it is true, the plea was non-assumpsit, though the count was an indebitatus count, and Simmons v. Swift (5).)

Their Lordships are of opinion that not only these cases but also the wording of r. 65 make it plain that on an issue of "never indebted" the onus of proving the fulfilment of conditions precedent is on the plaintiff. They think the words at the end of r. 65 "from which the liability of the defendant arises" (contrasting with the wording of the preceding rule) are significant. The judgment of STREET, C.J., in effect holds that in such circumstances proof of the performance of conditions precedent to a presently payable debt is not on the plaintiff. His language, when he speaks of a "contract capable of giving rise to a presently payable debt", implies in the plaintiff's favour the presumption that a potential debt has, through fulfilment of conditions precedent, become an actual one. Their Lordships venture, with great respect, to think this is a misconception of the onus of proof on the pleadings as they stood in this case. The plaintiff must prove that the potential liability has ripened into an actual and present one. The question what it is that the plea of "never indebted" to an indebitatus count puts in issue can be approached on different lines. What is, for this purpose, a "debt" (the debt which is denied)? No doubt for some purposes and in some sense if B has lent £5 to A and A is under an obligation to repay B £5 in a week from now, this is in the interval a debt in the sense of debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro. But is this the type of debt to which the indebitatus counts are directed? Their Lordships think not. The counts are directed to a debt solvendum in praesenti: a debt "presently payable": and it is such a debt which the plea "never indebted", filed in answer to an indebitatus count, denies and puts in issue. A common money count is not available unless the debt is presently payable, and "never indebted" puts in issue its present payability. This plea does not put in issue the original contractual promise, which may have been subject to a condition precedent. It puts in issue the promise implied by law to pay presently, which only arises if and when such conditions have been performed, and, consequently, as the two cases cited above show, puts in issue the performance of those conditions and puts the proof of these on the plaintiff. (This is borne out by the language of r. 65.) In a customer and banker case one such condition precedent is the existence in the customer's account of funds sufficient to meet the demand on them. It is for the customer to establish this sufficiency as subsisting at the time of demand.

Their Lordships are fortified in the belief that this view is sound by the formulation by counsel for the plaintiff of the "special" count which would in the circumstances of this case have been appropriate if an indebitatus count had not been resorted to. It reads as follows:

"The plaintiff sues the defendant for that the plaintiff lent to the defendant £100,000 and the defendant promised that it would pay to or to the order of the plaintiff such sums as the plaintiff might from time to time demand, provided that at the time of any such demand there were sufficient funds in the plaintiff's account to meet the same. And the defendant paid the plaintiff on the demand of the plaintiff from time to time, certain specific sums and no more: so that at the time of the demand hereinafter referred to, there were left in plaintiff's account more than sufficient sums to meet the said demand and the plaintiff demanded £19,000 from the defendant which defendant has not paid nor has he paid any part of it."

A Such is the obligation where it is pleaded on a special assumpsit.

Their Lordships are of opinion that whether or not an indebitatus count is used to recover money lent, where the creditor is a customer and the debtor a bank on current account, the "peculiar incidents" of that relationship govern the legal position and determine what the plaintiff must prove. This is admitted as regards the necessity of demand, a requirement which, in the absence of special agreement, does not attach where an ordinary creditor-debtor relationship exists, and the debtor must "seek out" his creditor. But a further "peculiar incident" is that the bank is only indebted to the customer for the amount (which may be called "a balance" when it is arrived at by deducting authorised withdrawals from sums paid in) standing to his credit as at the time of demand. Of course, if the customer can prove that at this time the "balance" suffices to pay his demand, he succeeds. If the "balance" falls short of doing so, even by a penny, he fails altogether, another distinction which rails off the creditor-debtor relationship in the case of a customer and banker from that relationship in other cases.

B. On this footing, did the plaintiff discharge the onus on him? Their Lordships consider that he did not. If he had gone into the box and sworn that the eight disputed cheques were forged, and had been believed, he would unquestionably have discharged it. He would equally have shifted the onus to the bank if he had gone into the box and testified that only cheques A, B and C drawn on the account were genuine and that, after deducting these, there were still sufficient funds to meet the demand. He did neither. The only evidence before the court consisted of two documents: (i) the current account, produced by the bank; (ii) the bank's letter to the Bank of Australasia. Neither of these documents in themselves, nor the two in combination, amounts to an admission by the bank that at the date of demand, Feb. 8, 1951, the plaintiff's account contained sufficient funds to meet the demand for £19,412 odd.

E In these circumstances their Lordships have no choice but humbly to advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed. In so doing they cannot repress a regret that a matter of substance should have been allowed to turn on a question of technical form. The plaintiff-respondent should pay the costs of this appeal and of the proceedings in the Australian courts.

Appeal allowed.

The “further report” which is required by the Companies Act, 1948, s. 270 (1), before an order can be made for the public examination of an officer of a company, is necessary only in the case of a compulsory winding-up, and, where an application for such an order is made by a liquidator under s. 307 (1) of the Act, the fact that in a voluntary winding-up there can be no “further report” within s. 236 (2), s. 236 (3) and s. 270 (1) does not prevent the court from making the order, if it should decide to do so, provided that the report on which the application is based has been considered by the judge personally.

MOTION by the liquidator in the voluntary winding-up of a company to discharge an order made by the registrar on Dec. 7, 1953.

On receiving from the liquidator a report under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 334 (2), the Director of Public Prosecutions referred the matter to the Board of Trade, and the official receiver, who was appointed under s. 334 (3) to make a further investigation, presented a report, dated Mar. 18, 1953, in which he submitted that a former director of the company appeared to have committed a fraud on the company. An application by the official receiver for an order, under s. 270 (1), directing the public examination of the director was dismissed by the Court of Appeal on May 5, 1953, on the ground that the application was misconceived. The judgment of the Court of Appeal is reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 74. Following a suggestion made by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., in the course of his judgment, the liquidator applied to the court under s. 307 (1) of the Act of 1948 for the report of the official receiver to be considered by the court and for an order for the public examination of the director, or for such other order as might be deemed just, but his application was dismissed by the registrar.

Denys B. Buckley for the liquidator.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is a motion brought by the liquidator of the company in its voluntary liquidation asking that an order made by the registrar on Dec. 7, 1953, may be discharged, and also asking for further relief which, in the view I take of the procedure which should be followed, I need not further mention.

The matter arises in this way. The company, which was incorporated on Dec. 31, 1945, went into voluntary liquidation on June 1, 1950, and the present applicant was appointed liquidator. On July 23, 1952, the liquidator made a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions pursuant to the Companies Act, 1948, s. 334 (2). Following on that, an order was made on Feb. 5, 1953, appointing one of the assistant official receivers of the court to make a further investigation, and on Mar. 18, 1953, he presented a report in which he submitted that it would appear that a director of the company had during the life of the company committed a fraud. On this a summons was taken out on Mar. 19, 1953, by the assistant official receiver designed to lead to an order for the public examination of the director in question: vide s. 270 (1) of the Act. On Mar. 30, 1953, the summons came before ROXBURGH, J., who made no order thereon. The matter was taken to the Court of Appeal before which it came on May 5, 1953 [see Re Campbell Coverings, Ltd. (1)], when the Court of Appeal agreed with the conclusion of ROXBURGH, J., though for a different reason. In the course of his judgment SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., who delivered the leading judgment, having first dealt with the reasons which underlay the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., referred to the argument of counsel for the official receiver in which he had advanced the proposition that no report under s. 236 (2) was required, or, indeed, could be made, as the liquidation was a voluntary liquidation. It was the absence of that report and his view that it must be in existence to ground jurisdiction in the court to make an order, that led ROXBURGH, J., to the conclusion to which he came. The Master of the Rolls said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 76):

“With all respect to the learned judge, I agree with counsel that the requirement of a further report as specified in s. 236 (2) ought not to be regarded as a condition precedent to an order under s. 334 (3). The legislature is saying that certain powers may be exercised in a voluntary winding-up, those powers being powers which in a compulsory winding-up are exercisable only if certain things have been done which only can be done in a compulsory winding-up.”

The Master of the Rolls then reviewed a number of sections of the Act and for a different reason came to the conclusion that ROXBURGH, J., was right in refusing to make any order. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., then proceeded to throw out a suggestion which has, in fact, been followed. He said (ibid., 78):

“I do not think that that conclusion is, from the point of view of those concerned in this liquidation, a counsel entirely of despair. I have passed over, in my references, s. 307 (1), which provides: ‘The liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the court . . . to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound-up by the court’. An application under that section must be by the liquidator or a contributory or a creditor, and the present applicant is the official receiver. If, therefore, it is thought appropriate to set in motion the powers of that section, another applicant will have to be found to make the application. That application is not now before the court, and, therefore, it would not be right for me to express a final view on any problem which might arise if it were. But the view which I have taken, with all respect to ROXBURGH, J., on the question, must there be a ‘further’ report in a voluntary winding-up no less than in a compulsory winding-up, applies in the case of s. 307 as in the case of s. 334. I cannot suppose that when Parliament says that the court may, on application, exercise any of the powers in a voluntary winding-up which it may exercise in a compulsory winding-up, it was saying at the same time that, if the powers in a compulsory winding-up require the existence of conditions which could be only satisfied in a compulsory winding-up, then those powers could not in any event be available in a voluntary winding-up. Such a conclusion seems to me to be in conflict with the express purpose and sense of s. 307 (1). I am aware that in so stating I am expressing a view which is not in accordance with the note which the learned editors have made in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 12th ed., p. 568, and I am, therefore, all the more diffident in expressing a final conclusion on the matter.”

The Master of the Rolls went on to say that, “as at present advised”, his view was as he had stated, and he then proceeded to point out that, assuming that there was jurisdiction to make an order by virtue of s. 307, it would not necessarily follow that the court would, in fact, make the order. He continued (ibid., 79):

“ . . . for reasons which I have already indicated, I say no more about what might happen if an application was made under s. 307. It is possible that other points may arise which have not been discussed before us today.”

The suggestion of the Master of the Rolls was followed, and on Nov. 19, 1953, a summons was issued by the liquidator asking that the report of the assistant official receiver should be considered and for an order that the director in question should be directed to attend for public examination. On Dec. 7, 1953, the learned registrar refused to make any order on the summons and put his reasons in the form of a note which shows that he gave very careful consideration to the matter. Now the question comes before me by way of a motion to discharge the order of the registrar. The simple question is whether the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls as being his view as then advised is a view which should be followed on the ground that, on careful investigation, there is nothing which should operate to prevent its application. It is true that, as I have said, the Master of the Rolls expresses what he states to be a view “as at present advised”, but, as I read his judgment, the only reason why he did not treat his then view as a concluded and final view was, not because he had any doubt as to the soundness of the reasoning expressed in the passage which I have read from his judgment, but because further investigation might disclose some good reason against the application of that reasoning. He decided as part of his judgment that there was no need, in the application of s. 334 to a voluntary liquidation, to have produced the further report requisite, under s. 270 (1), in the case of a compulsory liquidation, and he states definitely, in a passage which I have quoted, that that reasoning must apply in the case of s. 307 (1) no less than in the case of s. 334. In the face of that reasoning I should feel, in any case, bound to follow it and to apply it if the further investigation which has now been made should disclose nothing to prevent its application. But after careful consideration of the matter I would desire, with respect, to associate myself with that reasoning, and it, therefore, only remains for me to express my view on the result of the more detailed investigation which has since been made by the learned registrar involving the citing of a number of authorities.

The only two cases which, it appears to me, in any way approach this question are Re 1897 Jubilee Sites Syndicate (2) and Re Medical Battery Co. (3). The Jubilee Sites case (2) concerned a petition by the official receiver for the compulsory winding-up of the company, which was being wound-up voluntarily subject to the supervision of the court, and one of the grounds put forward was that a public examination was desirable. In the course of his argument counsel for the official receiver said ([1899] 2 Ch. 205):

“The private examination held under s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, has turned out to be insufficient, and what is required is a public examination under s. 8 of the Act of 1890. But s. 8 only applies when a compulsory winding-up order has been made, and the official receiver, therefore, now applies for that form of order under s. 14 of the Act of 1890. If this is not a case contemplated by the framers of that provision, it is difficult to say when the section does apply.”

The voluntary liquidator was represented by counsel and he objected to the making of a compulsory order, but put forward no suggestion that there was any other method of obtaining a public examination. WRIGHT, J., did not deal with this matter at all in his judgment. It is plain that it was never argued, and, although the case would appear to have proceeded on the basis that in order to obtain an order for public examination it would first be necessary for those who sought the order to obtain an order for compulsory winding-up, it is not an authority for saying that s. 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, which corresponds to s. 307 of the Act of 1948, could not be invoked. Indeed, the reason why this point was overlooked may be that the Act which was invoked was the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which itself, by s. 8, introduced public examination.

Re Medical Battery Co. (3) was also a case in which a compulsory order was sought, and counsel for some of the creditors said in his argument ([1894] 1 Ch. 446):

- A “The company ought to be wound-up by the court in order that there may be a public examination under s. 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. Such an examination cannot be directed to be held in a winding-up under the supervision of the court.”

- B No doubt that statement was correct, but the corollary does not follow that there must necessarily be a compulsory liquidation in order that a public examination can be directed. It may well be that it was what was said in the arguments in those two cases that led to the statement in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 12th ed., p. 568 (which is a repetition of a statement which first found its place in the 10th edition, at p. 419, in respect of the corresponding sections of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908), that:

- C “To give the court jurisdiction to proceed under this section it is essential —(A) That the official receiver makes a ‘further report’ under s. 236 (2). Semble, therefore, an order for public examination under this section cannot by virtue of s. 307 be made in a voluntary winding-up, nor can such an order be made in a winding-up under supervision (s. 315 and sched. XI).”

- D The rest of the authorities to which my attention has been directed do not appear to me to affect the matter, and they do not disclose even the establishment of such a practice as might make the court hesitant to invoke s. 307 in the present case. Even if they did that but no more, on a question of jurisdiction the matter would have to depend in the end on the interpretation of the language of the statute and not on any practice which might have grown up. When one turns to s. 307 (1), one finds language which, on the face of it, is perfectly clear and is also wide and unfettered by any context to be found in the section:

- E “The liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the court to determine any question arising in the winding-up of a company, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court might exercise if the company were being wound-up by the court.”

In view of that wide language, it appears to me, with respect, that the reasoning of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., ought to be followed. After considering the reasoning underlying the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., the Master of the Rolls said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 78):

- G “As I have already indicated, it seems to me that if Parliament in terms states that powers vested in the court in a compulsory winding-up shall be available also (on application) in a voluntary winding-up, it cannot have been supposed that steps would have been taken in a voluntary winding-up which only arise and which can only be taken, in a compulsory winding-up.”

- H I further respectfully agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., that that reasoning must apply in the case of s. 307 no less than in the case of s. 334. Therefore, when one turns to s. 270 (1), although it appears, on the face of it, that the section is to apply only in the case of a compulsory winding-up, it must also be applicable in a voluntary winding-up if the court should exercise the power conferred on it by s. 307 (2). The second condition in s. 270 (1), namely, “and the official receiver has made a further report”, is a condition the existence of which, by the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls to which I have already referred, must be confined to the case where there is a compulsory winding-up. If the court desires to make an order under s. 307 (2), it cannot be any bar to that order that, if the liquidation had been a compulsory liquidation, there would have to have been a further report. It may be thought curious that this is the result, when one considers that in the case of an application for a public examination in a compulsory liquidation a number of steps have to be taken to make sure that an undoubtedly serious step is not taken except in proper circumstances, with the consequence that a certain amount of security or protection is given to the individual whose examination is asked for, and who, in the nature of things, has played no part in the proceedings leading up to the making of the order. But although such a consideration may pass through one's mind in construing the provision relating to the making of an order for a public examination in a compulsory liquidation, yet where one finds the legislature, in such clear terms as the language of s. 307, giving this wide power, it becomes impossible to cut that language down merely because a complete procedure may not be found to be laid down if that section is invoked in a voluntary liquidation for the purpose of obtaining an order for a public examination. But I think, on consideration, that the difficulty is not one of any substance, because in the case of an application for an order for a public examination there is the overriding safeguard, in s. 270 (1), that the report on which the application is based must be considered by the judge personally, and, quite obviously, when the court decides under s. 307 (2) to exercise the power under s. 270 (1) in a voluntary liquidation, it must be furnished with the necessary material for considering whether or not the serious step should be taken of ordering a public examination. For those reasons, applying the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls, which, as I said, I regard as binding on me, but with which also I respectfully agree, I propose on this motion merely to discharge the order of the registrar so that the matter may go back to him with a view to the next step being taken, namely, that I shall be furnished with the report on which the application for the public examination of the director in question is based.

Order accordingly.

Re BAGSHAW (deceased). WESTMINSTER BANK, LTD. v.
TAYLOR AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 13, 1954.]

Charity—Gift to named charity—Hospital carried on, at date of will, by charitable institution named in will—Name and objects of charity altered before death of testatrix—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health before death of testatrix—Application of gift to new objects of charity.

By her will, dated July 17, 1942, the testatrix, who died on June 27, 1951, gave her residuary estate to the "B. and District War Memorial Cottage Hospital". At the date of the will that was the correct name of a charity which came into existence in 1921 with the object of providing a cottage hospital for poor persons of the district as a permanent memorial to men of the district who had fallen in the 1914-18 war. The charity was maintained by voluntary contributions and was managed by a governing body of subscribers. Its property was vested in trustees, and it was regulated by rules and a trust deed, dated Dec. 31, 1921, which contained, inter alia, the following clause: "If at any time hereafter in the opinion of a two-thirds majority of the governing body a cottage hospital cannot be maintained the trustees shall hold the capital and income of the trust premises for the time being subject to the trusts hereof upon trust to apply the same as capital or as income for such charitable purposes and objects and in such manner for the benefit of the inhabitants of the said parish of Bakewell and the surrounding parishes as the governing body shall in their absolute discretion think fit the governing body having power to settle any scheme or schemes for such last mentioned application." On Mar. 28, 1946, a resolution was passed, in accordance with the clause, that a cottage hospital could not be maintained and that the governing body should draw up a scheme for the future administration of the charity. By resolutions, dated May 23, 1946, and Mar. 27, 1947, respectively, the name of the charity was changed to "the B. and District 1914-18 War Memorial Charity", and its objects were altered, the new objects being to provide (a) such additional hospital benefits of a charitable nature for the benefit of the inhabitants of the district as might not be provided under the National Health Service Act, 1946, and (b) charitable assistance for necessitous ex-service men or women of the district or their dependants. The charity continued to maintain the hospital, under a resolution enabling it to do so, until July 5, 1948, when the hospital vested in the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946. From that date the hospital had been carried on by a hospital management committee on behalf of a regional hospital board. The rules of the charity were revised in accordance with the resolutions of 1946 and 1947, the revised rules being adopted in April, 1949. At the date of the testatrix's death the charity was being carried on under its new name and in accordance with the new rules and the trust deed. On a summons by the executor of the will to determine who was entitled to the gift of the residue, HELD: the gift was to a plainly identified charity which existed at the date of the will under the name which was mentioned in the will; the objects and name of the charity having been legally altered under the terms of the trust deed, the charity remained the same charity notwithstanding the alterations; and, therefore, the gift was for the general purposes of that charity.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the residuary estate of the testatrix, Jane Bagshaw, ought to be paid or transferred to the trustees of the Bakewell and District 1914-18 War Memorial Charity, to be applied for the objects of the said charity, or to the Sheffield No. 3 Hospital Management Committee, to be applied for the purposes of the Bakewell and District Cottage Hospital, or whether it devolved as on an intestacy to the next of kin.

By her will, dated July 17, 1942, the testatrix gave her residuary estate to "the Bakewell and District War Memorial Cottage Hospital absolutely." At the date of the will that was the name of a charity which came into existence in 1921 as an unincorporated charitable institution, with the object of providing and establishing a cottage hospital for the reception and relief of sick or temporarily disabled poor persons resident within five miles of the parish of Bakewell, Derby, as a permanent memorial to officers and men of the district who had fallen in the 1914-18 war. The charity was wholly maintained by voluntary contributions and was managed by a governing body of subscribers. Its property was vested in trustees and it was regulated by rules and by a trust deed, executed on Dec. 31, 1921. Clause 8 of the trust deed provided:

"If at any time hereafter in the opinion of a two-thirds majority of the governing body a cottage hospital cannot be maintained the trustees shall hold the capital and income of the trust premises for the time being subject to the trusts hereof upon trust to apply the same as capital or as income for such charitable purposes and objects and in such manner for the benefit of the inhabitants of the said parish of Bakewell and the surrounding parishes as the governing body shall in their absolute discretion think fit the governing body having power to settle any scheme or schemes for such last mentioned application."

The cottage hospital was carried on continuously from 1921 to 1946 when the governing body became anxious about the future, particularly after the National Health Service Bill (now the National Health Service Act, 1946) was introduced in the House of Commons on Mar. 21, 1946. On Mar. 28, 1946, a resolution was passed, in accordance with cl. 8 of the trust deed, that a cottage hospital could not be maintained and that the governing body should draw up a scheme for the future administration of the charity. By a resolution dated May 23, 1946, the name of the charity was changed to "the Bakewell and District 1914-18 War Memorial Charity." By a resolution dated Oct. 10, 1946, the governing body, while maintaining the opinion expressed in their resolution of Mar. 28, 1946, resolved to continue a temporary hospital service. On Mar. 27, 1947, it was resolved (i) that, on the assumption that the hospital premises and their endowments would, on the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946 (July 5, 1948), vest in the Minister of Health and the regional hospital board, the Bakewell and District 1914-18 War Memorial Charity should be continued under the terms of cl. 8 of the declaration of trust dated Dec. 31, 1921, and (ii) that until the appointed day and thereafter any funds vested, or which might after the date of the resolution vest, in the charity should be applied at the discretion of the trustees for new objects, and the committee were directed to revise the rules accordingly. By the new rules:

"The objects of the charity are, primarily, the provision of such additional hospital, medical, and other benefits of a charitable nature for the inhabitants of the parish of Bakewell, and surrounding parishes within a radius of five miles from the memorial cross in Bakewell, and, secondarily, towards such relief as is charitable amongst necessitous ex-service men or women of the war 1914-18 or the war 1939-45 or their dependants resident in the parishes aforesaid, and the provision of any necessary assistance ”.

Until July 5, 1948, the charity continued to carry on the hospital, and from that date it was carried on, under its original name, by the second defendants, the Sheffield No. 3 Hospital Management Committee, on behalf of the Sheffield Regional Hospital Board. The functions of the hospital were the same as they were before July 5, 1948, except that admission to the hospital was no longer confined to poor persons or to persons resident within five miles of the memorial cross in Bakewell. On Apr. 13, 1949, at a special general meeting of the subscribers to the charity, the revised rules were adopted. On June 27, 1951, the testatrix died, a spinster. She was survived by her father, the third defendant, and her mother, the fourth defendant. At the date of her death the charity was being carried on in accordance with the revised rules and the trust deed.

DANCKWERTS, J., stated the facts, and said: The fund comprising the testatrix's residuary estate is claimed, not only by the charity as constituted under the new name and with new objects, but also by the Sheffield No. 3 Hospital Management Committee which, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, carries on the hospital in the hospital buildings which were formerly owned by the charity. It is claimed on behalf of the hospital management committee that this was a bequest which operated, not in favour of the charity whose name appears in the will, and which now bears a different name and has different objects, but for the purposes for which the hospital buildings were used at the date when the testatrix made her will, and it is also claimed that, in substance, those purposes are maintained at the present time through the operations of the hospital management committee. A claim is also made, on the basis of failure of the trusts, by the next of kin of the testatrix. The last-mentioned claim seems to me one which must fail in any event, because it is plain on the authorities that either there was a gift to the charity which still exists or there was a gift for the purpose designated by the description contained in the will of the testatrix.

It is well established by cases such as Re Faraker (1) and Re Lucas (2) that a charity founded as a perpetual charity can never come to an end, even though its objects may be altered, and, indeed, its name may be altered, according to due process of law. In each of those two cases, a scheme established by the Charity Commissioners had altered the name and objects of the charities concerned. In the present case, the alteration has not been effected by means of any scheme made by an outside body such as the Charity Commissioners or the court, but the objects and the name have been legally altered through the machinery provided in the trust deed created by the founders of the charity itself. It seems to me that there is no distinction whatever in principle between the alteration by one method and the alteration by the other method, and the charity remains the same charity, though its name and objects have been altered. It seems to me that the gift was to a plainly identified charity which existed, at the date of the will of the testatrix, under a particular name which is found in the will, and the gift takes effect in favour of that charity and in favour of no other charity. Therefore, it seems to me that it is merely a gift for the general purposes of the charity described correctly by the testatrix as the Bakewell and District

War Memorial Cottage Hospital, but now known as the Bakewell and District 1914-18 War Memorial Charity. Order accordingly.

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), January 15, 1954.] B

Justices—Clerk—Presence in retiring room while justices consider decision—Matrimonial proceedings.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: In a statement made in the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division on Nov. 16, 1953 ([1953] 2 All E.R. 1306) about C clerks to justices being present when the justices have retired to consider their decision, LORD GODDARD, C.J., said (ibid., 1307) that the ruling of that court did not apply to justices when exercising jurisdiction in matrimonial cases as they were then subject to the directions and control of this Division. Before making any pronouncement in response to several requests for a ruling by this court on the subject, I wished to consult the judges of this Division. I now have D their authority to say that they agree with the statement I am about to make. I am also authorised by LORD SIMONDS, L.C., to say that he approves of it. VAISEY, J., also asks me to say that he agrees with it.

I wish to say at the outset that it rarely happens that an allegation of undue interference by the clerk in the decision of a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, is made a ground E of appeal to this Divisional Court. Nevertheless, it is at least as important in cases of this class as in cases of other classes dealt with by courts of summary jurisdiction that the decision should be that of the justices themselves and not that of the justices and their clerk, and that, not only should this be so in fact, but that nothing should be done to give the parties or the public the impression that the clerk is influencing the decision. I am, therefore, in complete agreement with F
LORD GODDARD, C.J., that it should not be regarded as a matter of course that, if justices retire to consider their decision, the clerk should retire with them. Moreover, whether the justices invite the clerk to retire with them or send for him in the course of their deliberations, I agree that the clerk should always return to his place in court as soon as the justices release him, leaving them to complete their deliberations alone. Bearing in mind that domestic proceedings are often G lengthy and may involve points of law in relation to the complaint itself or to the amount of maintenance, and that this court insists that a proper note of the evidence must be kept, and that, in the event of an appeal, justices must be prepared to state the reasons for their decision, I recognise that more often than not justices may properly wish to refresh their recollection of the evidence by recourse to the clerk's note, or to seek his advice about the law, before coming H to their decision.

Having regard to the high standard of care which is generally shown by courts of summary jurisdiction in dealing with these domestic proceedings, I do not think it is necessary for me to say more than that I am confident that justices taking part in them may be trusted to act, and to ensure that they appear to act, on the fundamental principle that they alone are the judges.

WRAITH v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Glyn-Jones, J.), November 12, December 19, 1953.]

Coal Mining—Statutory duty—Security of travelling road and working place—Reconstruction of disused roadway—Fall of stone from roof—Availability of timber for roof support—“Removal of roof supports”—Provision of temporary supports—Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), s. 49, s. 51, s. 52 (1)—General Regulations (Coal Mines), 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 8.

- A By the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 49: “The roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure, and a person shall not, unless appointed for the purpose of exploring or repairing, travel on or work in any travelling road or working place which is not so made secure.” Section 51:
- B “Where the work of erecting the supports of the roof and sides of working places is done by the workmen employed therein, a sufficient supply of timber or other material suitable for supports shall be kept at or within ten yards of every working place where, in pursuance of this Act, supports are required to be erected . . .” Section 52 (1): “In any part of a mine where any
- C work is being carried out which necessitates the removal of roof supports, temporary supports shall, in all cases, be set so as to secure the safety of the persons employed.”

- The plaintiff was employed by the defendants in their mine in the reconstruction of a disused roadway which had fallen into disrepair so that over much of its length the pressure of the surrounding earth had crumpled the steel arches formerly supporting the roof and falls of roof had almost buried
- D the crumpled steel arches. In many places the heap of debris on the floor reached up to and above the height of the arches and there was an almost continuous cavity in the roof. The system of work was to clear a short length of roadway of debris and then fix a new arch girder above which were placed horizontal timber runners. Across the runners were placed pieces of timber so as to form a continuous strip of covering
- E timber projecting about eighteen inches to two feet beyond the last new arch girder which had been fitted and protecting a workman in the roadway from a fall of roof from immediately above him. The workmen next cleared the roadway sufficiently to make room for the next arch girder which was placed about three feet from the first, and then the old distorted arch or arches, which by this time carried no weight, were removed. When the
- F plaintiff was engaged in clearing debris prior to removing one of the old arches a large stone fell from the roof about six or seven feet away from the last new arch girder and rolled on to his hand which was crushed. In an action against the defendants for breaches of their statutory duty as laid down in the above sections,

- G HELD: (i) if a roadway has fallen into disrepair because it is not used and is no longer needed, it ceases to be a road within the meaning of s. 49 except so much of it as has been reconstructed, and, therefore, there was no road at the point where the stone fell.

- (ii) section 49 draws a distinction between a roadway and a working place; a roadway does not become at any given spot a working place because at that place men are employed to repair it; and, therefore, the place where
- H the plaintiff was injured was not a working place within the section.

(iii) (applying the dictum of LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines, Ltd. [1953] 2 All E.R. 488) s. 49, did not, in the circumstances of the case, impose on the defendants any duty to make the roof secure as the section permitted workmen to be sent to a road or place which was insecure for the purpose of repairing it.

(iv) if, contrary to the above findings, the defendants were in breach of s. 49, the burden was on them under s. 102 (8) of the Act to prove that it was not reasonably practicable to make the roof secure, which burden, on the evidence, they had not discharged.

(v) section 51 contemplates circumstances such as those which exist when colliers who work in the getting of coal at the coal face are required to put in props, and even if it was proved (which it had not been) that there was not a sufficient supply of timber within ten yards, it was doubtful whether that section had any application to the facts of this case.

(vi) the work was not such as necessitated the removal of supports under s. 52 (1), as, when the time came for the removal of the old arches, they were no longer serving as roof supports.

(vii) if, contrary to the above findings, there had been a breach of duty by the defendants, no material responsibility should be allocated to the plaintiff for his breach of duty to withdraw from the working place under reg. 8 of the General Regulations, 1913.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19. GLYN-JONES, J., read the following judgment. On June 6, 1952, the plaintiff suffered injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a coal miner by the defendant board at its Houghton Main Colliery, when a large stone fell on the back of his right hand and crushed it against a steel arch girder. He claims in this action compensation for his injury by way of damages for negligence and for breaches of statutory duty on the part of the defendants.

The facts are as follows. There was a roadway connecting Houghton Main Colliery with certain workings, no longer in use, forming part of the neighbouring Grimethorpe Colliery. The roadway had not been used for a considerable time and had fallen into disrepair in two respects. First, as the result of the pressure of the surrounding earth the steel arches supporting the roof and side of the roadway had been forced inwards and were crumpled. Secondly, over much, probably most, of the length of the roadway there had been falls from the roof which had buried or almost buried the crumpled arch girders so that not only was the roadway impassable, but also, above the heaps of debris, there was an almost continuous cavity in the roof. In many places, and particularly at the spot where the stone which injured the plaintiff fell, the heap of debris on the floor reached to the height of the old arches and, indeed, above them. Some three or four months before the accident the defendant board began to reconstruct this roadway, and during one shift each day two miners called Shone, who were father and son, were employed thereat. The system of work was this. First of all, a short length of roadway was cleared by loading the fallen debris into tubs; next the roof and sides were ripped down sufficiently to make room for a new arch girder or ring which was fixed in position. Above the arch girder were two pieces of timber known as runners, one end of each of which was wedged above the arch girder so that the runners lay horizontally along the length of the road. They were set not quite parallel to one another, but diverging

A a little as they ran forward. Across them were placed side by side pieces of timber about three feet to four feet long so as to form a continuous strip of covering timber which would protect a man standing or working in the centre of the roadway from a fall of roof from immediately above him. Taking advantage of the protection of this strip of timber which projected beyond the newly fixed ring towards the point where the next ring was to be fixed, the men next cleared the roadway sufficiently to make room for the next ring which was placed about three feet away from the first. Once the next ring was in position the next task was to remove and carry away the old distorted ring which by this time carried no weight and was a mere obstruction in the roadway. In each shift the two men at work would not normally do more than put up one ring or arch girder, clearing and ripping the roof and sides as far as was necessary for this purpose, removing the old ring and leaving, after they had finished, the ends of the last two runners projecting forward with or without covering timber across them. The distance between the rings varied a little and so did the lengths of the timbers used for runners; thus, the extent to which the runners projected beyond the last ring to be fixed varied, though as a rule it was about eighteen inches to two feet. On the day of the accident the plaintiff was ordered to work with Arnold Shone, whose father, who had been in charge of this work, on that shift was away sick. That day was the first on which the plaintiff had been employed in this roadway, but he was an experienced miner and had done somewhat similar work elsewhere. When the two men, Arnold Shone and the plaintiff, reached the place they found that the men working on the previous shift had not removed the old crumpled ring which stood beneath the last pair of new rings. D Surrounding this ring was a quantity of debris and, projecting beyond the last ring, were the ends of the last two runners with one or two pieces of covering timber across them. Arnold Shone placed more covering timbers across the runners so as to form a strip projecting about eighteen inches to two feet beyond the last ring. The two men then set to work under the protection of the roof of the last completed section of new roadway to shovel up the debris and load it into tubs and also to remove the old ring which the night shift had left. E The plaintiff, who had been kneeling while shovelling rubble, placed his right hand on the top of the crumpled arch next beyond the last fitted ring to help himself to his feet, and, as he did so, a large stone fell from the roof some six or seven feet away from the last ring, rolled down a heap of debris, which at this point rose to a height above the crumpled arch, on to the back of the plaintiff's hand and crushed it against the arch girder, causing the injury of which he complains. F

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the allegations of negligence at common law; found on the evidence that it was not established that it was reasonably possible to take steps to ensure that the roof of the disused roadway was supported beyond the point to which it had been reconstructed, nor that there was any safe means of providing temporary protection beyond that point; said that, in his opinion, the defendant board was not guilty of negligence at common law; and continued:] G I turn to the alleged breaches of statutory duty. It is said, first, that the roof from which this stone fell was the roof of a travelling road or working place within the meaning of s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911; secondly, that by that section there is imposed on the mineowner an absolute duty that such a roof should be secure and that the fact that the stone fell is of itself proof that the roof was not secure; and, thirdly, that the duty created by the statute was owed as well to the plaintiff H and Shone as to any other workman, even though they, the plaintiff and Shone, were the very men employed by the defendants in the performance of the defendants' duty to make the roof secure. To this the defendants reply, first, that the roof from which the stone fell was not the roof of a roadway or working place; secondly, that on its true construction s. 49 does not create a duty owed by the defendants to men actually appointed for the purpose of repairing and making secure an insecure roof; and, thirdly, that in any event the defendants had established the defence provided for them by s. 102 (8) of the statute, namely, that it was not reasonably practicable to prevent the breach or breaches, if any.

I am of opinion that, if a roadway in a mine has ceased to be used as a roadway and has been allowed to fall into disrepair because it is no longer needed, it ceases to be a roadway within the meaning of s. 49 and there is no duty on the mineowner to keep the roof and sides of a disused roadway secure. So much of it as had been reconstructed, but only so much, became a roadway and the defendants then came under a duty to keep the roof and sides of that much of it secure, but the point from which the stone fell was beyond the point at which the reconstructed roadway ended.

I have to consider whether this place may have been a working place within the meaning of s. 49. If the spot where the plaintiff and Shone were working is to be called a working place rather than a roadway, it seems to me that the expression, "the roof of a working place" cannot be limited to the reconstructed roof but must be construed as extending at least to that area of roof above and beyond the spot where the plaintiff was working, from which a fall might put the plaintiff in peril. In my opinion, the section, however, draws a distinction between a roadway and a working place. I do not think that a roadway becomes at any given point a working place merely because at that place men are employed to repair it. If I am wrong and the place where the plaintiff and Shone were was a working place, then I am of opinion that the point from which the stone fell was part of the roof of the working place and the roof had not been made secure.

The next question is whether or not the defendants owed to the plaintiff any duty under s. 49 to make the roof of this roadway or working place secure. Stapley v. Gypsum Mines, Ltd. (1) was a case in which the House of Lords was invited to discuss the construction of reg. 7 (3) of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, a regulation in similar terms to s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE in his speech said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 488):

"There was in this case, in my opinion, no breach by the respondents, by themselves, or by any servant or agent, of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, made under s. 86 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. The respondents carried out their obligations under reg. 7 (3) to the letter, if the first line and a half of that regulation be read with the last two and a half lines. If the respondents detail X. and Y. to repair a defect in the walls or roof to restore safety, they cannot possibly, it seems to me, be told that they are breaking the regulation by permitting the repairers to work in a working place which, pending the completion of the repair, is insecure."

The actual decision of the House in that case turned on other considerations and LORD PORTER, LORD REID and LORD TUCKER each stated that he thought it unnecessary to decide the question on which LORD ASQUITH had expressed his opinion, while LORD OAKSEY made no reference to it. I do not think, therefore, that I can treat this question as having been determined by the House of Lords, but I humbly state my agreement with the view expressed by LORD ASQUITH and I hold that in the circumstances of this case s. 49 does not impose on the defendants a statutory duty owed to the plaintiff to make the roof of this roadway or working place secure.

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the duty imposed on the board by the first line and a half of the section was absolute and universal and that the last two and a half lines did not in any way limit the generality of what came before them, but were intended merely to cast on individual workmen a duty not to travel along or work in a road or in a working place, the roof or sides of which were not secure. It may be that these last two and a half lines do cast such a duty on individuals, but I am satisfied that they also cast on the defendants a duty not to permit workmen, other than those appointed for the purpose of exploring or repairing, to go along or into a road or working place which is not secure, and thus by implication the statute, in my view, does permit the defendants to send workmen to a road or place which is insecure for the purpose of repairing it. I am mindful of the fact that in Edwards v. National Coal Board (2), TUCKER, L.J. said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 745):

A "There is no dispute that the joint effect of s. 49 and s. 102 (8) is to impose on the mineowner the absolute duty to make the roof and sides of every travelling road secure . . . "

But in that case the point I have to decide did not arise, for the injured plaintiff was a man who was not employed to repair a roadway which had become insecure, and to such a man, that is to say, a man who has not been employed to repair an insecure roadway, the defendants clearly do owe a duty to make the road or working place secure, and that is qualified only by the defence provided by s. 102 (8). I prefer not to hold, unless I am bound by authority, that the statute provides that there is a duty on the mineowner to make secure the roof of a working place before he sends repairers in to make secure the roof of the working place, and I think I am fortified in this conclusion by the fact that LORD ASQUITH, whose opinion I have cited, was a member of the Court of Appeal which decided Edwards' case (2).

C Assuming, however, that I am wrong and that the defendants were in breach of a statutory duty owed to the plaintiff under s. 49, I have further to find whether or not it has been shown that it was not reasonably practicable to prevent or avoid the breach. I take the definition of "reasonably practicable" from the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Marshall v. Gotham Co., Ltd. (3), and, in particular, from the judgment of JENKINS, L.J. If in the reconstruction of this roadway the defendant board has done all that is capable of being done to make the roof and sides secure within the limits of what it is reasonable to do according to the best assessment of what is necessary and sufficient that could have been made at the relevant time, then the defendants have done all that is reasonably practicable. The plaintiff has not called evidence which satisfied me that there were other means whereby the system of work could have been made safer so as to prevent or limit the risk of a fall from the roof. But on the assumption, contrary to my earlier finding, that there was a duty owed to the plaintiff to make the roof secure, the burden is on the defendant board to prove that it was not reasonably practicable to make it secure. The defendants have called only one witness, the deputy, Wilkinson. I have no evidence from any mine manager or mining engineer that no better system of preventing falls could have been devised according to the best assessment which could have been made at the relevant time. If the point arises, I am bound to find, I think, that the defendants have not discharged the burden of proving that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent a breach of s. 49, if, contrary to my view, there was such a breach.

I next consider the alleged breach of s. 51 of the statute. I doubt whether this section has any application to the facts of this case. If the section had been intended to mean that wherever the work of erecting supports of the roof and sides of a working place was being done a sufficient supply of timber should be kept at or within ten yards of the working place, it would have been easy to say so. The section says, however, that the requirement that a supply of timber is to be kept at or within ten yards applies only where the work of erecting the supports is done by the workmen employed at the working place. Obviously, in one sense, it is true that a workman who erects supports at a working place is working at the working place while he is erecting the supports. In my opinion, however, the section contemplates circumstances such as those which exist when colliers who work in the getting of coal at the coal face are required, as the coal is removed, to put in props to support the roof over the space from which the coal has been removed. I do not think the section applies to repairers in fixing arch girders and timber supports to a roadway in course of reconstruction. The danger against which the section is intended to guard is that workmen, to whose work the setting of supports is merely incidental, may neglect to put in sufficient supports if there is not timber close at hand, for if they are employed on contract work it is unremunerative to spend their time searching further afield for timber. If a repairer, whose work consists primarily in setting arch girders and timber supports, has no arch girders or timber, his work comes to an end. Assuming, however, that the section applies, I am not satisfied that there was any breach of it, for I am disposed to accept Mr. Wilkinson's evidence that there was timber by the side of the reconstructed roadway within ten yards of the place where the plaintiff was working. In any case an adequate supply need not have included eight-foot runners, and any shorter runners would not have prevented this accident.

Lastly, as to the alleged breach of s. 52 (1), I am of opinion that the work was not such as necessitated the removal of roof supports, for the old crumpled arch girders were doing little to support the roof and in any event when the time came for their removal the roadway had been reconstructed above them and by that time they were no longer serving as roof supports.

I now turn to another matter. By their defence the defendant board charged the plaintiff with a breach of statutory duty in that, if there was not sufficient timber or other suitable material, then it was the plaintiff's statutory duty under reg. 8 of the Coal Mines General Regulations, 1913, to withdraw from the working place and report the circumstances to the deputy in charge and that it was the plaintiff's own breach of statutory duty in not withdrawing that caused this accident. Since I find that there was no breach by the defendant board, it follows that there could not have been a breach by the plaintiff of this statutory duty; but if, contrary to my view, there was a breach by the defendant board, it follows that there was a corresponding breach by the plaintiff of his duty to withdraw, but I should not be disposed to allocate to the plaintiff any material responsibility for the injury he suffered on the ground of this breach.

For these reasons my judgment in this case must be for the defendant board.

MARTIN-SMITH v. SMALE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 11, 1954.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Consent of agricultural land tribunal subject to condition—Condition not complied with—Validity of notice—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 25 (5).

Agriculture—Agricultural land tribunal—Appointment of members—Delegation by Minister of Agriculture to chairman of duty to appoint other members—Agriculture Act, 1947 (c. 48), sched. IX, para. 15.

A landlord applied under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (2), for the consent of the Minister of Agriculture to a notice to quit which she proposed to serve on the tenant of an agricultural holding. Consent was given, and under s. 25 (4) the tenant appealed to the agricultural land tribunal. The tribunal gave its consent to the notice, subject, under s. 25 (5), "to the condition that the landlord appoints a bailiff approved by the Hertfordshire Agricultural Executive Committee before taking possession." On Aug. 12, 1952, notice to quit expiring on Sept. 29, 1953, was given, and before it expired the landlord appointed P. as bailiff. The report of the agricultural executive committee on P., dated Oct. 1, 1953, was not entirely favourable, and on that ground the tenant disputed the effectiveness of the notice to quit.

HELD: even if the condition attaching to the consent of the tribunal were not complied with, that was a matter to be enforced by the Minister and not one of which the tenant could take advantage, and the notice to quit was effective.

SEMLE, the Minister of Agriculture may delegate to the chairman of an agricultural land tribunal the duty, under the Agriculture Act, 1947, sched. IX, para. 15, of appointing the other two members of the tribunal.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 24 and s. 25, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, p. 46 et seq.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of PEARSON, J., in chambers, dated Dec. 8, 1953, dismissing an appeal by the tenant against the decision of Master DIAMOND, dated Nov. 26, 1953, giving the landlord liberty to sign final judgment against the tenant for possession of land known as Northchurch Farm, Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire, within twenty-one days, and mesne profits.

The landlord claimed possession of the land and mesne profits from Sept. 29, 1953, until possession at the rate of £200 per annum. The landlord alleged that the tenancy was duly determined by a notice to quit given on Aug. 12, 1952, and expiring on Sept. 29, 1953, but that the tenant failed to quit and deliver up possession. On June 17, 1952, the landlord obtained the consent of the Minister of Agriculture to serve the said notice to quit. The tenant appealed to the agricultural land tribunal, and on July 30, 1952, the tribunal gave its consent to the notice subject to the condition that the landlord appointed a bailiff approved by the Hertfordshire Agricultural Executive Committee before taking possession. The landlord appointed one R. N. Page as bailiff. On Oct. 1, 1953, the agricultural committee advised the landlord as follows:

"The committee has formed the opinion that although Mr. Page is young and comparatively inexperienced, nevertheless he appears to be a keen and enthusiastic young man, and it is quite possible he will manage the farm in a creditable manner although it is felt he still has quite a lot to learn concerning farm management."

The landlord applied under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, for leave to sign final judgment. The tenant in his affidavit stated that he had received no notification of the appointment of a bailiff nor of his approval by the agricultural executive committee. He contended that the agricultural land tribunal was unable in law to grant a conditional consent to the giving of a notice to quit, or, if it could do so, that no notice to quit could operate unless the condition had to be satisfied before the notice to quit had been served.

Viscount Hailsham, Q.C., and Dare for the tenant.
E. D. Smith for the landlord.

DENNING, L.J.: In this case, the landlord of an agricultural holding of 148 acres in Hertfordshire claims possession from a farmer to whom it was let. By reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1) and (2), the landlord was not able to give an effective notice to quit unless she first obtained the consent of the Minister. She, therefore, applied for the consent of the Minister. The agricultural executive committee inquired into the matter and recommended that the Minister should give his consent. According to their findings the landlord was a lady who was relinquishing public duties and proposed to take up farming with her son. She had the farm house of Northchurch Farm, but not the land (148 acres) attached to it because it was let to the defendant. The tenant farmed a good deal of other land besides these 148 acres. The agricultural executive committee recommended that consent should be given on the ground that the tenant's general farming standard was low, and that, if he was farming a smaller area, his standard might improve. They found that the house and land of Northchurch Farm should be brought into one occupation, and that the grounds on which the landlord desired to terminate the tenancy were both desirable and in the interests of good estate management. They considered that the degree of hardship involved would be equal on each. So the agricultural executive committee recommended the Minister to give his consent, and he gave it.

Thereupon the tenant appealed (as he had the right to do) to the agricultural land tribunal. The tribunal also gave its consent. The formal decision said that the tribunal

"having satisfied itself that all parties have appeared before it or have been duly summoned to appear and having heard the case tendered by the parties and having inspected the said land hereby gives its consent to the operation of the said notice to quit intended to be served relating to the said land."

But the tribunal added this condition:

"subject to the condition that the landlord appoints a bailiff approved by the Hertfordshire Agricultural Executive Committee before taking possession."

The consent of the tribunal was given on July 30, 1952. On Aug. 12, 1952, a notice to quit was given by the owner to terminate the tenancy on Sept. 29, 1953. Shortly before the notice expired, the landlord appointed a Mr. Page as bailiff. On Oct. 1, 1953, the agricultural executive committee made a report on Mr. Page of a somewhat qualified character which was not a whole-hearted approval because of his youth. On this account it is said that the condition was not fulfilled, and that the tribunal's consent was inoperative.

In my opinion, even if this condition was not fulfilled (on which I express no opinion) it is not a matter of which the tenant can take advantage. This condition was imposed by the tribunal in the interests of the community at large, and it is the duty of the Minister to enforce it and no one else. Section 29 of the Act shows that, if a condition is not fulfilled, the Minister may take possession of the land and deal with it as he thinks fit, but it does not nullify the notice to quit or the consent to it. The tenant ought to have gone out before any question arose about the fulfilment of the condition. The landlord was not bound to appoint a bailiff until the tenant had gone out. The notice to quit was good because the tribunal had previously consented to it, and the tenant has no defence to the claim.

A There was another point which was not raised before the judge, but has been raised for the first time in this court. It is suggested that the tribunal was not properly constituted because the members of it were not validly appointed. The agricultural land tribunal is constituted under sched. IX to the Agriculture Act, 1947. Under paras. 14 (1) and 15 of that schedule there is to be a chairman of the tribunal appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and there are to be two members of it appointed by the Minister, one to be appointed from a farming panel and one from an owning panel. An affidavit was put in to suggest that the members who sat with the chairman were not validly appointed because the chairman had appointed them, and not the Minister, but when one comes to read the affidavit there is really no evidence to support the suggestion. It refers to a case which was heard by the tribunal in October, 1951,—nine months previously—
B—in which the chairman had said, in reply to a question by someone at the hearing, that he as chairman appointed the two other members of the tribunal who sat with him. The affidavit goes on to say in para. 4:

“I verily believe that the said statement of the said Sir Cecil Oakes as to procedure is a practice which operates in the eastern province of the agricultural land tribunal, and that such practice operated in this case.”

C But there is no evidence that it did operate in this case. Inquiries could have been made whether the practice did operate in this case, but the affidavit does not suggest that any inquiries were made, and in the absence of any inquiries I do not think that we should take any notice of the suggestion. I am far from saying that the Minister may not delegate to the chairman the duty to appoint the other members of the tribunal. It may be that in law he can do so, but
D it is not necessary for me to pronounce on that because the evidence here is not sufficient to raise it. It was not raised before the judge at all; it has not been raised since this matter was heard by the tribunal eighteen months ago, and in those circumstances I do not think that we should give effect to it. Accordingly, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed.

E ROMER, L.J.: I agree. Under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 25 (5), the tribunal had power to impose such conditions as appeared to them requisite for securing that the farm in question to which the notice to quit related would be used for the purpose for which the landlord proposed to terminate the tenancy. The purpose for which the landlord proposed to terminate the tenancy was not merely in order that she might farm the land
F in conjunction with her son, but that they might farm it in the interests of efficient farming, and that language is the language also of s. 25 (1) (a) of the Act. That was the purpose before the tribunal and in relation to which they had power to impose a condition.

G The condition which they attached to their consent to the operation of the notice to quit was that the owner should appoint a bailiff approved by the Hertfordshire Agricultural Executive Committee before taking possession. That condition was a perfectly valid one to impose having regard to the purpose for which the landlord proposed to terminate the tenancy. But whether it was a good condition (as I myself firmly believe it was) or whether it was a bad condition, I cannot see that it was a matter of which the tenant could complain. If anyone was to challenge the validity of that condition it would surely be the H landlord, because it was not intended to operate, and, in fact, having regard to the contract between the landlord and the tenant, could not operate, until the tenancy had come to an end, and when the tenancy came to an end it follows that the tenant would have no further interest in the farm. The person who would have the sole interest in the farm would be the landlord, and, if his ownership was going to be fettered by this condition, it would be for him to complain and not the tenant. Accordingly, it appears to me that there is no ground for holding that the tenant here has any defence.

On the other point, I entirely agree with what DENNING, L.J., has said. It seems to me that there is no evidence worthy of the name—indeed, no real evidence at all—sufficient to suggest with any degree of conviction whatever that the appointment of these two independent members of the tribunal was invalid in the manner suggested, and that, therefore, the tribunal was irregular and its procedure invalid. I entirely agree that the tenant ought not to have leave to defend on that ground.

Appeal dismissed. A

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, in calculating the principal value of the estate of George Wolsey, deceased, for purposes of estate duty, the amount to be deducted as the amount of the burden of an annuity of £850 a year, payable to Grace Mary Eleanor Wolsey pursuant to a deed of separation made on Feb. 26, 1926, was (a) the sum which the plaintiffs, the executors of the will of the said George Wolsey, would have had to pay at the date of the deceased's death, for purchasing a British government annuity of the same amount; or (b) the sum which the plaintiffs would have had to pay at the said date for purchasing an annuity of the same amount on the basis of the price of consols at that date; or (c) the sum which the plaintiffs would have had to pay at the said date for purchasing an annuity of the same amount from a first-class British life assurance company; or (d) some, and, if so, what, other sum.

B George Wolsey, the deceased, separated from his wife, Grace Mary Eleanor Wolsey, on or about Feb. 26, 1926, and on that day a deed of separation was executed pursuant to which the deceased became liable, inter alia, to pay Grace Wolsey an annuity of £850 a year during her life. By his will, dated Aug. 3, 1940, the deceased appointed the Westminster Bank, Ltd. and Lily Rivola Wolsey, the plaintiffs, to be executors thereof. The deceased died on May 10, 1947. His C widow is still living and aged about sixty-nine years. The net principal value of his estate, subject to the deduction of the correct amount in respect of the liability represented by the said annuity, was £71,286 10s. 10d. Disagreement arose between the executors and the Inland Revenue as to the sum to be deducted, in computing the principal value of the deceased's estate, as representing the amount of the liability attaching to the estate at the date of the deceased's death by reason of the existence of the annuity, and the executors sought the determination of the court as to the correct method of ascertaining the sum to be deducted.

D HIS LORDSHIP drew attention to the fact that the summons was taken out under R.S.C., Ord. 54A, for the construction of a statute, i.e., the Finance Act, 1894, s. 7 (1), and the procedure was authorised in relation to estate duty by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933. The summons should not, however, be entitled in the matter of any statute or estate, but should E be an ordinary originating summons inter partes entitled merely in the form A. v. B.

F HARMAN, J.: The question to be determined concerns the valuation of a debt or incumbrance which falls to be deducted from the estate of George Wolsey, deceased. The debt or incumbrance in question is an annuity, and the annuitant is a creditor, or a potential creditor, of the deceased's estate, so ranking for payment before any beneficiary under the will. It follows that the provisions which the deceased made in his will as to this annuity, and, indeed, any other G provisions in the will are, in my judgment, irrelevant for the purpose of any question which I have to determine. This annuity is an incumbrance for which the whole of the deceased's estate is liable, and the assets are ample, to secure the annuitant in her rights which were given her by a separation deed made on Feb. 26, 1926, between her and her husband, the deceased.

H Only one section of the Finance Act, 1894, is involved and that is s. 7, which provides:

“(1) In determining the value of an estate for the purpose of estate duty allowance shall be made . . . (a) for debts . . . or incumbrances . . . and any debt or incumbrance for which an allowance is made shall be deducted from the value of the land or other subjects of property liable there-to . . . (5) The principal value of any property shall be estimated to be the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, such property would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death of the deceased . . .”

This annuity is property and s. 7 (5) can be construed as applying to the valuation of the annuity. There is another possible view, as was pointed out by counsel for the plaintiffs, viz., that s. 7 (5) applies only to assets and not to liabilities, and that after the commissioners have reached their opinion as to the principal value of the assets of any estate, then one must deduct the debt or incumbrance under s. 7, arriving at its value as best one may, and that the opinion of the commissioners has no particular weight in the matter. I do not think I need decide which of those two views is the true one because, if it were open to the commissioners as it were to set up a prima facie case by their opinions, they have not elected so to do.

There have been long negotiations between the plaintiffs and the Estate Duty Office as to the method by which this annuity should be valued, but they have been unable to arrive at any conclusion. The difference lies within a narrow compass and has, before me, resolved itself largely into a dispute, first, as to the tables on which the calculation of the annuitant's expectation of life is to be based, and, secondly, as to the rate of interest the estate should be assumed to be earning for this purpose—both highly artificial matters. The considerable period which has elapsed since the testator's death has been occupied by the disagreements of two actuaries who have made it clear that neither is prepared entirely to accept the other's premises. The first difference between them appears to be that one wishes to go on the consols rate of interest and the other on the average rate of interest earned by trustee securities at the time of the deceased's death. Secondly, one wishes to use the Registrar-General's tables of mortality for the whole country and the other wishes to use the yardstick employed by actuaries in general which is a publication by the Institute of Actuaries called "The Mortality of Annuitants, 1900-1920". The result is that no decision has been reached and the summons asks "whether, in calculating the principal value of the estate for purposes of estate duty, the amount to be deducted as the amount of the liability of an annuity of £850 a year payable to Grace Mary Eleanor Wolsey pursuant to a deed of separation made on Feb. 26, 1926, is . . .",

and then are set out three different methods of calculation.

In the course of a very long and learned argument it was rightly pointed out that this annuitant has nothing to do with the administration of the deceased's estate. If an instalment of her annuity be not paid she can bring a creditor's administration suit, but she cannot bring a suit to protect the future instalments of her annuity. On the other hand, she cannot be obliged, so far as I can see, to accept anything less than the whole estate as a satisfaction for her annuity. She is not bound either to take a lump sum or to accept an appropriated sum to answer her claims or contingent claims. The matter differs from the ordinary case of an annuitant under a will, and, therefore, also differs widely from cases where the estate is insolvent and the annuities are valued for the purpose of paying an abated sum to the annuitants on principles which the Court of Chancery has followed for a great number of years, with certain variations as required.

The valuation of this annuity is a highly artificial matter because, as I say, there is no right in anybody to force a lump sum on the annuitant. To my mind, a good practical method of making a valuation is to consider what might occur if all the beneficiaries under the will, being sui juris, all wishing to wind-up the estate and take what capital they could at once, called on the executors to satisfy the annuitant in order to free the rest of the estate: then, supposing that she was recalcitrant and refused to be satisfied in that way, the executors might prudently ask for the direction of the court in the matter. They might, as junior counsel for the Crown says they should, rely on their own fortitude and distribute the whole estate excepting such sum as they considered proper, but I do not think the executors are bound to take that line. It is quite possible, if they went to the court, that, as all parties except the annuitant desired the estate to be wound-up at once, the court would say: "Give the annuitant the best security she can have for her annuity and then she cannot have any cause of complaint." If the executors set aside consols, the interest on those consols might be reduced. Whatever calculation of an actuarial kind be made, the circumstances of the future cannot be foreseen.

A But if the annuitant were provided with the best kind of annuity which society, as we know, it can provide, then she could not be heard to complain. Therefore, I think, when one is considering the burden on this estate which this annuity may be said to represent, it is the burden of procuring the best security which the annuitant can have for her money, short of preserving the whole estate until the end of her life in order to answer her claims. If that be right, the answer is that the true encumbrance to be deducted under s. 7 (1) is the cost, at the relevant date, of buying an annuity from the National Debt Commissioners on the government tables. As it seems to me, that is a convenient way of measuring this kind of liability and it prevents the sort of technical argument between actuaries which has been carried on in this deliberate manner for the last few years. It provides a rule of thumb which seems to me to be a reasonable one.

EVE, J., took a somewhat similar view in Re Castle (1), where the facts were rather different. In that case there was a gift of an annuity where the annuitant elected to take payment of a capital sum and the question raised was, on what basis the capital value should be ascertained. The judge said that it was desirable that there should be a standardised rule in these matters, and he thought that a government annuity should be purchased or the capital value should be calculated by reference to the government tables and not to the price at which the annuity could be purchased from an insurance company. That, he considered, was the course an executor should follow. That seems to me to be merely a matter of convenience. In my view, in a case of this sort, where the parties have not succeeded in reaching an agreement, it provides a measuring rod of a not unsatisfactory kind. I observe that as long ago as 1853 in Ford v. Batley (2) SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., said (17 Beav. 304):

"The annuitant is entitled to have the best security for his annuity, which is a government security. I am, therefore, of opinion that he is entitled to a government annuity."

That I quote to show that that is the best kind of security an annuitant can have. Although in law she has no right to have such an annuity, yet, as this artificial valuation has to be made, it seems to me to be a convenient way of measuring the burden imposed on the estate.

KRAKAUER v. KATZ.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 12, 1954.]

Court of Appeal—Interlocutory appeal—Further evidence—Discretion of court—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4.Practice—Summons—Issue before service of notice of change of solicitors—Waiver of irregularity—R.S.C., Ord. 7, r. 2 (1), (6).Practice—Want of prosecution—Dismissal of action—Unexplained delay for twelve years—R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 1.

In an interlocutory matter before the judge in chambers, counsel for the defendant was asked whether he required an adjournment in order to answer the plaintiff's affidavit. He said that he did not. On appeal, the defendant sought to adduce further evidence by affidavit.

HELD: R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, gave an appellant in an interlocutory matter no right to adduce further evidence; the admission of further evidence was within the discretion of the court; and in the present case it would not be right to exercise the discretion in favour of the defendant.

On June 19, 1941, the plaintiff issued a writ which was duly served on the defendant, and on July 25, 1941, the defendant entered an appearance by solicitors. No action was taken by the plaintiff until Nov. 19, 1953, when notice of change of the plaintiff's solicitors was given to the defendant, followed by a notice of intention to proceed with the action. The defendant also changed his solicitors, and on Nov. 27, 1953, his new solicitors filed a notice of change and on the same date took out a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. By virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 7, r. 2 (1) and (6), the change of solicitors took effect only after service of the notice of change to the other side. No point was taken before the master that the issue of the summons was irregular. The plaintiff could not explain his delay to the satisfaction of the court.

HELD: (i) the issue of the summons before the notice of change of solicitors was served on the plaintiff was an irregularity which could be waived, and the plaintiff had waived it by not raising the point before the master.

(ii) in view of his failure to take any step for twelve years, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to proceed with the action.

PER DENNING, L.J.: I am disposed to agree that, by analogy with the Limitation Act, 1939, if a plaintiff allows an action to go to sleep for six years, the court in its discretion will usually dismiss the case for want of prosecution, unless the plaintiff can show some good reason why he should be allowed to go on with it.

AS TO IRREGULARITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, p. 60, para. 97; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 969-975, Nos. 5044-5090.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendant from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., in chambers, dated Dec. 11, 1953, allowing an appeal from a decision of Master DIAMOND, given on Dec. 2, 1953, that the action be dismissed for want of prosecution. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., set aside the master's order and allowed the plaintiff to proceed with the action.

On June 19, 1941, the plaintiff issued a writ which was duly served on the defendant, and on July 25, 1941, the defendant entered an appearance by solicitors. On Nov. 19, 1953, notice of change of the plaintiff's solicitors was filed, and served on the defendant's solicitors. On Nov. 27, 1953, the defendant filed notice of change of solicitors and on the same day issued a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. Before the judge in chambers it was argued that the summons should have been taken out after the service of notice of change on the plaintiff's solicitors. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., exercised his discretion in favour of the plaintiff, taking into account, inter alia, the fact that at the time when the defendant issued the summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution he was not technically in order.

Lester for the plaintiff.

DENNING, L.J.: A preliminary point has arisen whether in an interlocutory matter this court can or should admit further affidavits on behalf of the defendant. It was suggested that an appellant on an interlocutory matter has a right in this court to adduce further evidence by affidavit. I am clearly of opinion that he has no such right. It is a matter of discretion in this court whether or not further evidence by affidavit should be admitted.

In exercising our discretion in this case, there is an overwhelming obstacle in the way of the defendant. At the hearing below the judge in chambers asked his counsel whether he wanted to answer the affidavit of the plaintiff and whether he wanted an adjournment so to do, and his counsel said that he did not. Counsel thus took his stand on the evidence as it then stood before the judge; and it would be contrary to the right exercise of our discretion if we were to allow counsel for the defendant to go back on that position and to introduce further evidence in this court.

We must, therefore, proceed with the case on the evidence as it stood before the learned judge.

[The court heard argument.]

DENNING, L.J.: The facts in this case are somewhat striking. On June 19, 1941, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendant claiming damages for breach of contract, or, alternatively, an account. The writ was served on the defendant and an appearance was entered on his behalf on July 25, 1941, by his then solicitors, and the plaintiff's solicitors ought to have delivered a statement of claim within ten days thereafter. Time may not have run during the vacation, but at all events the statement of claim ought to have been delivered in due time after entry of appearance. In point of fact, the plaintiff did nothing. He did nothing for over twelve years, and in October, 1953, by his solicitors, he wrote to the defendant intimating that this claim was being revived, and eventually his solicitors gave, by letter dated Nov. 27, 1953, notice of their intention to proceed with the action. The defendant went to new solicitors, who gave notice of change and took out a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The summons came before Master DIAMOND, who took the view that after twelve years the action should be dismissed for want of prosecution. The plaintiff appealed to CROOM-JOHNSON, J., who took the opposite view and said that the action was not to be dismissed.

The learned judge was much influenced by a technical point. When the new solicitors, Messrs. Simmons & Simmons, filed notice of change at the Central Office, they issued at the same time the summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, whereas they ought to have served a copy notice of change on the plaintiff's solicitors before they issued the summons, because under R.S.C., Ord. 7, r. 2 (1) and (6), it is quite plain that the copy notice ought to be served before the change is effective. So there was an irregularity, but it caused no injury to anyone. It was merely a day wrong in the order of procedure. When the summons to dismiss came before the master no point was taken on this irregularity. The matter was argued on the merits and the master dismissed the action. I am clearly of opinion that thereafter it was not open to the plaintiff's solicitors to avail themselves of this irregularity. Order 70, r. 1, shows that non-compliance with the rules does not render the proceedings void, but they can be dealt with as the court thinks right. It is the right thing for the court to ignore that irregularity.

The real point is whether the plaintiff, having done nothing for twelve years in this action, should now be allowed to revive it. An affidavit was put in on his behalf, in which he said that his solicitors' offices were destroyed by enemy action and they could not proceed with the case, but when inquiries were made, it turned out that his solicitors' offices were destroyed before the writ was issued. They were destroyed on May 10, 1941, and the writ was issued on June 19, 1941. There was no difficulty in proceeding with the action. The defendant's solicitors were on the record all the time. Even if the plaintiff could not proceed with the claim during the war owing to various difficulties, there was no reason why he should not have pursued it during the eight years since that time. I am disposed to agree with what counsel for the defendant suggested, namely, that, by analogy with the Limitation Act, 1939, if a plaintiff allows an action to go to sleep for six years, the court in its discretion will usually dismiss the case for want of prosecution, unless the plaintiff can show some good reason why he should be allowed to go on with it. In this case, it is not six years, but twelve years, and I am quite clear that after this length of time the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to go on with the action. I think the appeal should be allowed, and the order of the master restored.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. The plaintiff, in the affidavit which he swore in these proceedings on Dec. 11, 1953, made a considerable point about his alleged ignorance of the whereabouts of the defendant throughout a long period of years, but it appears that it was not until some months after the writ was issued (and after he should have delivered his statement of claim) that he heard that the defendant was interned in the Isle of Man. He knew then where the defendant was, and also he apparently knew in 1952, because he had an offer, so he says, from a man who knew the defendant. In any event, the plaintiff's knowledge of the personal whereabouts of the defendant during the whole time was a matter of little consequence, because the defendant had entered an appearance by a well-known firm of solicitors who were still carrying on their business—but that is what he says. It does not appear to be the reason which his solicitors gave in the letter which they wrote on Oct. 2, 1953. In that letter, which they wrote to the defendant, they say:

“We understand that you have full details of our client's claim and our client has delayed pressing you because at the time your financial circumstances were such that it would have been impossible for you to pay. He now understands that you are in a far easier financial position . . .”

There is not a word there about not having proceeded before because he did not know where the defendant was. There may be some cases where it would be right to allow an action to proceed even though there has been nothing done for twelve years, and where it would be right to make no order on a summons taken out by the defendant to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. There may be such cases, but I am abundantly clear in my mind that this is not one of them. This is a case where, apparently, the real cause of the plaintiff's not having proceeded with the action before is that he thought the defendant was not worth pursuing, and the action only came to life again when he discovered that the defendant's financial position had improved. I think this is a clear case where the action should be dismissed.

On the question of practice which my Lord has dealt with, I entirely agree with what he says. It seems to me quite plain that the non-compliance with the requirements of Ord. 7, r. 2 (6), which was the only provision of the rules which was not complied with in strictness in the present case, was one which it is open to the other side to waive; and I am clearly of the opinion that the plaintiff's solicitors, by appearing before the master after they had received the notice which sub-r. (6) requires to be given, and having argued the case before the master, must be taken to have waived the strict compliance with that sub-rule. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

RABIN v. MENDOZA & CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 12, 1954.]

Discovery—Production of documents—Privilege—Document obtained as result of negotiations without prejudice—R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 18.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants, a firm of surveyors, for a negligent survey of a dwelling-house which the plaintiff purchased. Before the action was commenced, the parties met with a view to reaching a settlement. The interview took place without prejudice, and the parties agreed that the defendants should try to obtain insurance cover against the risk of defects developing in the plaintiff's house, and for that purpose procure another surveyor's report, which the defendants obtained. The defendants claimed privilege from production and inspection of that report on the ground that it was prepared as the result of a discussion without prejudice between the parties.

HELD: the report was obtained as the result of an express or tacit agreement that it would not be used to the prejudice of either party, and, therefore, production of it would not be ordered.

DICTUM OF LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in Whiffen v. Hartwright (1848) (11 Beav. 112), applied.

AS TO WHEN PRODUCTION CAN BE RESISTED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 378-402, paras. 458-483; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 18, pp. 120-122, Nos. 705-717.

(1) Whiffen v. Hartwright, (1848), 11 Beav. 111; 11 L.T.O.S. 197; 50 E.R. 759; 18 Digest 143, 924.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PEARSON, J., in chambers, dated Dec. 21, 1953, affirming the order of Master BURNAND, who refused to order production and inspection of documents of the defendants which the defendants swore came into existence as a result of a discussion without prejudice between the parties.

Lester for the plaintiff.

Eastham for the defendants.

DENNING, L.J.: This appeal raises an interesting point on discovery. The plaintiff has brought an action against a firm of surveyors alleging negligence in the surveying of property. Before the action was commenced, the plaintiff's solicitor called on a partner in the defendant firm (who has since died) and told him that the plaintiff had had trouble about the survey which the defendants had made, because a building society had refused to lend money on the house. The interview was without prejudice. At that interview an understanding was reached that the defendants would make inquiries as to the possibility and the cost of obtaining insurance cover with a view to an insurance company giving an indemnity against any possible risk of defects developing in the house so that any litigation could be avoided entirely. After that interview the defendants instructed another firm of surveyors to make a report, with a view to putting up a proposition to the insurers so as to obtain cover. The report was obtained, but no settlement was reached. The question is whether the defendants are bound to produce the documents passing between this other firm of surveyors and the defendants, particularly the report. The defendants have scheduled the documents in their affidavit of documents, but they claim privilege from production of all the letters and reports on the ground that "all of the said letters and reports were prepared and made as a result of and in pursuance of to the best of my knowledge and belief a without prejudice discussion between the plaintiff's solicitors and"

the partner in the defendant firm.

The question for us to decide is whether that claim for privilege from production is a good claim. This is not an ordinary case of legal professional privilege. The documents were not prepared for the purposes of litigation or for the purposes of obtaining the advice of the solicitors. They were prepared in order to avoid litigation. It is said, however, that apart from legal professional privilege, there is a separate head of privilege on the ground that the documents came into existence on the understanding that they were not to be used to the prejudice of either party. "Without prejudice" does not appear as a head of privilege in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, but in BRAY ON DISCOVERY, p. 308, it is said:

"The right to discovery may under very special circumstances be lost by contract as where correspondence passed between the parties' solicitors with a view to an amicable arrangement of the question at issue in the suit on a stipulation that it should not be referred to or used to the defendant's prejudice in case of a failure to come to an arrangement."

That proposition is founded on Whiffen v. Hartwright (1), where LORD LANGDALE, M.R. (11 Beav. 112), refused to order the production of letters which passed without prejudice,

"observing, that he did not see how the plaintiff could get over this express agreement, though he by no means agreed, that the right of discovery was limited to the use which could be made of it in evidence."

LORD LANGDALE, M.R., there affirms the undoubted proposition that production can be ordered of documents even though they may not be admissible in evidence. Nevertheless, if documents come into being under an express, or, I would add, a tacit, agreement that they should not be used to the prejudice of either party, an order for production will not be made.

This case seems to me to fall within that principle. This report was clearly made as a result of a "without prejudice" interview, and it was made solely for the purposes of the "without prejudice" negotiations. The solicitor for the plaintiff himself says in his affidavit that at the time of the interview it was contemplated that steps such as these should be undertaken. I find myself, therefore, in agreement with the decision of Master BURNAND and the learned judge that this is not a case where production should be ordered. The appeal, therefore, should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. On the first question, the question whether the report is entitled to the protection of the without prejudice quality, if I may so describe it, which characterised the interview which took place, it is, in my opinion, abundantly clear that it is. The affidavit of Mr. Manches, a partner in the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiff, who attended the conference with Mr. Mendoza, a partner in the defendant firm, says in para. 4:

"The interview terminated upon the understanding that Mr. Mendoza would make inquiries of the possibility and cost of obtaining insurance cover and then come and see me again and let me know what he was prepared to do, after which I would take my client's instructions."

Then Mr. Hyams says in one of his affidavits that it was in pursuance of the understanding that was arrived at at that interview that they instructed Donaldson's to make an independent survey for production to the insurance company who they hoped would lend the money. In fact, a letter which Mr. Hyams wrote to Donaldson's on Jan. 24, 1952, makes it quite plain that that was so.

It seems to me plain in those circumstances that the only object of obtaining the report was to implement the understanding that Mr. Manches refers to in his affidavit, and that understanding was arrived at at the interview which was without prejudice. Therefore, in my judgment, the protection extends to the report which was obtained in pursuance of that understanding.

Then comes the question whether, notwithstanding that, it ought to be produced. I think there is no question that it ought to be disclosed in the affidavit of documents, because it relates to a matter in question in the proceedings, and the defendant has rightly disclosed it; but he has disclosed it in Part II of the schedule to his affidavit, and he claims immunity from production and inspection. I quite agree with what my Lord has said, that this claim is justified, partly on the ground on which LORD LANGDALE, M.R., decided Whiffen v. Hartwright (1), and partly because it is a matter for the discretion of the judge under R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 18. It seems to me that it would be monstrous to allow the plaintiff to make use—as he certainly would—for his own purposes as against the defendants of a document which is entitled to the protection of “without prejudice” status. In those circumstances, I agree with what my Lord has said, and this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

FISHER v. BARRETT & POMEROY (BAKERS), LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, J.J.), January 20, 1954.]

Food and Drugs—Proceedings against manufacturer—Sale of food unfit for human consumption—Proceedings taken under Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 9 (1) (a), s. 9 (2), s. 83 (3).

The respondents, a firm of bakers, sold a bread roll to retailers who re-sold it to a firm for use in their canteen, where, while it was being prepared for sale for consumption, it was found to contain part of a smoked cigarette. The respondents were charged under s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, with selling a roll which was intended for, but was unfit for, human consumption, contrary to s. 9 of the Act. The magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that where a statute contained a provision of specific application to a category of offenders—here s. 9 (2) of the Act—it was the intention of that statute that that category should be proceeded against under that provision, and that, therefore, the prosecution was misconceived.

HELD: the only question was whether the roll sold was unfit for human consumption, and, if so, whether the respondents, as manufacturers, were liable, and, accordingly, the proceedings had been correctly brought under s. 83 (3) and s. 9 (1) (a) of the Act, and the case must be remitted to the magistrate to be heard and determined.

FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, s. 9 and s. 83 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 392, 458.

CASE STATED by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bow Street Magistrate's Court on Sept. 17, 1953, the appellant, Stanley George Fisher, a sanitary inspector, preferred an information under s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, against the respondents, Barrett & Pomeroy (Bakers), Ltd., alleging that in June, 1953, they sold to Leigh Bakeries, Ltd., of 165, Drury Lane, Holborn, a bread roll, which was intended for, but was unfit for, human consumption, in that it contained part of a cigarette, contrary to s. 9 of the Act, and which Leigh Bakeries, Ltd., subsequently sold to Eastern Carpets, Ltd., of 4, Newton Street, Holborn. Before the respondents were called on to plead it was contended on their behalf that the proceedings were brought “under s. 9” of the Act which contained two sub-sections, sub-s. (1) (a) and sub-s. (2), under either of which the proceedings could be brought, and that, as the course taken by the respondents might differ according to the sub-section used, the appellant should elect whether he was proceeding under s. 9 (1) (a) or s. 9 (2). It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the prosecution was brought under s. 83 (3) of the Act, but that s. 9 (1) (a) must be relied on, being the sub-section which created the offence of selling food intended for, but unfit for, human consumption, and these words were quoted in the information. The magistrate was of opinion that the appellant should elect and that his contention should be taken as an election to proceed under s. 9 (1) (a), and the summons was, accordingly, amended.

The case proceeded and the following facts were found. The respondents sold the bread roll, with others, it being unfit for human consumption in that it contained the end of a smoked cigarette, to Leigh Bakeries, Ltd., who sold the roll, with others, to Eastern Carpets, Ltd. Eastern Carpets, Ltd. had the roll in their possession for preparation for sale at their canteen, but, on discovering on completion of the preparation that the roll was unfit for human consumption, they withdrew it from sale. The roll was intended by the respondents, by Leigh Bakeries, Ltd. and by Eastern Carpets, Ltd. at all material times up to the time of its withdrawal from sale, for human consumption by an ultimate purchaser. At the conclusion of the appellant's case it was submitted by the respondents that no case had been made out for them to answer. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the word "sells" in s. 9 (1) (a) of the Act must be interpreted to mean "sells by retail" or, at least, "makes a sale other than the sale contemplated by s. 9 (2)" of the Act since there was a presumption that Parliament enacts nothing in vain, and, if a sale of the type described in s. 9 (2) were an offence under s. 9 (1) (a), then s. 9 (2) would be otiose and unnecessary. Inasmuch as Eastern Carpets, Ltd. had the roll in their possession for the purpose of preparation for sale, and inasmuch as the relevant food and drugs authority had made no adjudication under s. 83 (3) of the Act in respect of Eastern Carpets, Ltd., it must be taken for the purpose of proceedings that Eastern Carpets, Ltd. had committed an offence against s. 9 (1) (a) in respect of the roll. In the premises, the offence, if any, committed by Leigh Bakeries, Ltd., with which offence the respondents were charged by virtue of s. 83 (3) of the Act, was an offence against s. 9 (2) of the Act, and hence outside the provisions of s. 9 (1) (a) of the Act. The respondents were gravely prejudiced by being charged under s. 9 (1) (a) and not under s. 9 (2) in that they were deprived of the opportunity of putting forward a defence under s. 9 (3) of the Act, that defence not being available to persons charged with offences under s. 9 (1) (a).

The magistrate, without hearing the appellant further, dismissed the information on the ground that, in the premises, the prosecution was misconceived in that, contrary to the intention of the Act, the proceedings were brought under s. 9 (1) (a) instead of under s. 9 (2) and the appellant appealed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: Section 83 (3) is the sub-section which really matters in this case, and I think the mistake that has been made is that too much attention has been paid to s. 9 (1) (a). Section 83 (3) is in these terms:

"Where it appears to the authority concerned that an offence has been committed in respect of which proceedings might be taken under this Act against some person and the authority are reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint is made was due to an act or default of some other person and that the first-mentioned person could establish a defence under sub-s. (1) of this section, they may cause proceedings to be taken against that other person without first causing proceedings to be taken against the first-mentioned person. In any such proceedings the defendant may be charged with and, on proof that the contravention was due to his act or default, be convicted of, the offence with which the first-mentioned person might have been charged."

A This court has said on more than one occasion that in the case of a manufacturer or wholesaler the mere fact that he sold the goods may be an act or default. It generally is. The offence which had been committed here by someone was selling bread which was unfit for human consumption, which is an offence under s. 9 (1) (a). Having established that that is the offence, if the local authority are satisfied that some person other than the actual seller is, in fact, responsible for the condition of the goods, they can proceed against that person, which is what was done here. It follows that the only question was whether the bread roll sold was unfit for human consumption, and whether, in those circumstances, the respondents, as the manufacturers, were liable.

B At the hearing an application was made to the learned magistrate to put the prosecutor to his election whether he would proceed under s. 9 (1) (a) or under s. 9 (2), and it was said he ought to proceed under sub-s. (2), because, if he did not, he would deprive the defendants of a defence. The prosecutor, quite rightly, took the point that he was not bound to elect, and I do not think there was any question of election. The summons charged selling; that was the offence. Sub-section (2) of s. 9 deals, I think, with an entirely different matter. It is procedural, and is in these terms:

D "Where food in respect of which an offence under para. (a) of the preceding sub-section has been committed was sold to the offender by some other person, that person also shall, subject to the provisions of this section, be guilty of an offence."

E "Subject to the provisions of this section" refers to provisions which may give that person a defence in certain circumstances. That sub-section simply means that where A. is prosecuted for the offence of selling unfit food and that offence has been proved against him, the person who supplied that food to A. may also be prosecuted, and all that it is necessary to show is that he supplied the food in respect of which A. has been convicted. It is true that he is given a defence, if, for instance, he can prove that when he sold the food to A. it was in perfectly good order. Take, for instance, fish or game. The person who supplies fish to the fishmonger may have supplied it when it was in good order, and it may not be sold by the fishmonger till it has gone bad. Then, of course, the person who supplied it would not be guilty, but that is not this case. I think that undue attention was paid to s. 9 (2) and s. 9 (3), which have nothing to do with this case, whereas all that mattered here was s. 9 (1) (a) and s. 83 (3). The case must go back to the learned magistrate with an intimation that the information was perfectly good, that the offence was proved by the prosecution under the combined sections, and, that, therefore, it is for him to proceed to hear any evidence the respondents wish to bring forward or any submissions they wish to make. The appellant must have the costs of this argument.

MONTGOMERY v. A. MONK & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Birkett, L.J.J., and Vaisey, J.), January 15, 18, 1954.]

Building—Building regulations—Guard-rails on roof—Roof under construction—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 30 (1), (5), reg. 97.

Regulation 30 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, provides that "... every accessible opening in a roof ... through which any person is liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches, shall be provided with—(a) a suitable guard-rail or guard-rails . . . "

The plaintiff, a workman, was employed by the defendants in constructing a flat roof on their premises. The roof was constructed of three parallel concrete cross-runners, over which were placed concrete tiles fitted into grooves in the runners. No guard-rails had been provided by the defendants. In the course of construction, one row of tiles was found to be wrongly adjusted and had to be removed. In moving his position on the roof so that a fellow workman could take up one of the tiles, the plaintiff stepped backwards on to the edge of a tile, slipped, and fell from the roof to the ground, suffering injuries. In an action for damages for personal injuries, the plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under reg. 30 (1).

HELD: (i) the provisions of reg. 30 were not applicable to cases such as this where a roof was under construction, but dealt only with openings in a constructed roof, and, therefore, the defendants were not in breach of their statutory duty under that regulation.

(ii) the provisions of reg. 30 (1) did not apply, they being excluded by reg. 30 (5), and, therefore, the provisions of reg. 97 never became applicable.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of Mr. Commissioner GOODMAN ROBERTS at Liverpool Assizes, dated June 16, 1953.

The plaintiff, a workman, was employed by the defendant company in constructing a roof on their premises. The roof, which was flat, was made of three parallel concrete cross-runners, over which concrete tiles were placed, being fitted into grooves in the runners. As the tiles were placed on the runners they provided a solid structure on which the workmen could walk. No guard-rails had been provided by the defendants. On the day of the accident one row of tiles was found to be slightly out of adjustment and had to be removed. The plaintiff in moving from his position on the roof so that one of the tiles could be taken up by a fellow workman, stepped backwards on to the edge of a tile, slipped and fell off the roof to the ground below, suffering injuries.

In a claim for damages for personal injuries based on negligence and breach of statutory duty, the plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that there was, on the part of the defendants, a breach of the Building Regulations, 1948, reg. 5, or, alternatively, of reg. 30 (1) which provides that

"... every accessible opening in a roof ... through which any person is liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches, shall be provided with—(a) a suitable guard-rail . . . "

The plaintiff contended that, if reg. 30 (1) were inapplicable, reg. 97 was brought into operation. Regulation 97 provides:

"If the special nature or circumstances of any part of the work render impracticable compliance with the provisions of these regulations designed to prevent the fall of any persons engaged on that part of the work, then those provisions shall be complied with so far as practicable and except for persons for whom there is adequate handhold and foothold either there shall be provided suitable safety nets or safety sheets or there shall be available safety belts or other contrivances which will so far as practicable enable such persons who elect to use them to carry out the work without risk of serious injury."

The defendants contended that, if reg. 30 (1) were applicable prima facie, in the circumstances, by virtue of reg. 30 (5), they were exempted from liability to erect guard-rails. The learned commissioner found that reg. 30 (1) applied prima facie, but that, having regard to the nature of the work that was being done, reg. 30 (5) operated as a proviso excepting the work from the operation of the regulation altogether, and reg. 97 had no application, and, therefore, the defendants were not guilty of a breach of statutory duty.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff based his claim on negligence at common law and breach of statutory duty. It is to the latter point that the argument on the appeal was in the main directed. As to negligence at common law, the learned commissioner said:

"I am satisfied that the plaintiff has not shown a breach of duty, any failure to provide a safe working place in the sense of not providing guards or scaffolding or nets to prevent the plaintiff from falling as was pleaded."

With that finding I agree. It would, of course, have been quite impossible to provide guard-rails as they would have had to be moved as the work proceeded. It seems to me it is one of those cases where the work was carried on at a height, but one cannot say that it was an unsafe place.

As to the breach of statutory duty, in the statement of claim the plaintiff relied on reg. 5 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. The sidenote to that regulation is: "Provision of scaffolds and means of access". The regulation provides that there shall be

"Suitable and sufficient scaffolds . . . for all work that cannot safely be done on or from the ground or from part of the building . . ."

That regulation was not pressed in this court, and I think the finding as to negligence to which I have referred indicates that the work could be done safely from part of the building. Then reliance was placed on reg. 30, which deals with openings in roofs, floors and walls. Regulation 30 (1) provides:

"... every accessible opening in a roof . . . through which any person is liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches, shall be provided with—(a) a suitable guard-rail . . ."

Counsel for the plaintiff puts his argument in this way. He agrees that reg. 30 (1) is inapplicable and that fact, he submits, brings in reg. 97, which provides:

"If the special nature or circumstances of any part of the work render impracticable compliance with the provisions of these regulations designed to prevent the fall of any persons engaged on that part of the work, then those provisions shall be complied with so far as practicable and except for persons for whom there is adequate handhold and foothold either there shall be provided suitable safety nets or safety sheets or there shall be available safety belts or other contrivances which will so far as practicable enable such persons who elect to use them to carry out the work without risk of serious injury."

In answer to that argument, the defendants relied on reg. 30 (5), which says:

"Guard-rails . . . required by paras. (1), (2), (3), or (4) of this regulation may be removed or remain unerected—(a) where and when this is or becomes necessary in order to proceed with any . . . covering . . . of the opening . . ."

The learned judge said that he assumed that reg. 30 (1) applied prima facie. He also said that, having regard to the work which was being done, reg. 30 (5) was in the nature of a proviso excepting the work which was being done here from the regulation altogether, and, therefore, there was no room for the operation of reg. 97. There were no provisions to be complied with under reg. 30 (1) which would have been rendered impracticable by the circumstances because the regulation itself excused or excluded compliance with its earlier provision. As a matter of construction I think that is right, but, speaking for myself, I do not think that the words of reg. 30 are apt to describe the construction of a roof such as we are concerned with in this case. I should have thought it was dealing with openings in a roof and not with its construction. Counsel for the plaintiff referred us to various other regulations not relied on in the statement of claim, namely, reg. 22, reg. 24, reg. 26 and reg. 31. I do not consider them applicable, so the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed to rely on them does not arise.

That being so, I agree with the learned judge, although for slightly different reasons. I do not think reg. 30 or any other of the regulations applies at all, and, therefore, it is not a case where there are regulations which have to be modified by the operation of reg. 97. Accordingly, I think that the plaintiff fails on that basis of his claim. The learned judge did consider whether it could be said that the plaintiff had adequate handhold as well as foothold within reg. 97. I would have felt a difficulty in saying he had adequate handhold, but I do not want to give any opinion on that point because, as I have come to the conclusion that that regulation does not apply, I think it would be wrong to do so. For these reasons, I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

VAISEY, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

PRACTICE DIRECTION.Legal Aid—Costs—Costs awarded against assisted person—Form of order.

Where an order for costs is made against an assisted person, by the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 17, and in accordance with the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 2 (2) (e), a judge is required to assess the amount which the assisted person is to pay and may give a direction for that amount to be payable by instalments. The successful litigant in such a case may thereafter make a subsequent application to the court under proviso (ii) to reg. 17 (1) for the order to be varied on the grounds that there has been a change in the assisted person's circumstances.

Where the judge at the trial orders the assisted person to pay, whether in one sum or by instalments, a sum which must be less than the full amount of the costs, the order should direct that the costs are not to be taxed and judgment be entered without further order for the amount of costs which has then been determined; otherwise the judgment must direct taxation and this will involve the successful party in extra and unnecessary expense.

If the judge orders payment by instalments, he should be asked also to direct that on failure to pay any instalment the whole sum should become due; otherwise there is no means of enforcing payment until the time has elapsed for the whole of the instalments to be paid owing to the rule that there can be only one execution on a judgment. So, supposing an order is made for £5 a month for six months, if a default is made in paying the first or second instalment no execution could issue until the six months had elapsed.

Fresh forms for the drawing up of orders to embody these directions are being prepared.

E SNEDDON AND OTHERS v. LORD ADVOCATE.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon*, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott, Lord Reid and Lord Keith of Avonholm), November 11, 12, 16, 1953, January 25, 1954.]

Estate Duty—Gift inter vivos—Gift by way of settlement—"Property taken"—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (c. 12), s. 38 (2) (a) (as amended by Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (c. 7), s. 11 (1))—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).

By a deed of trust dated Dec. 19, 1946, the deceased appointed himself and others trustees and provided that the trust fund "consists of the sum of £5,000 sterling which is vested in the trustees and which, or investments representing the same, shall be held and applied for the trust purposes afterwritten" The trustees were given power to purchase, subscribe for, pay for and take up shares in (inter alia) C., Ltd., of which the deceased had control. On Dec. 21, 1946, the trustees applied for five thousand £1 shares in C., Ltd. On Dec. 24, 1946, the deceased paid £5,000 to the trustees, and on the same day they paid that sum to the company. The shares were allotted, and were still held by the trustees when, on Feb. 5, 1948, the deceased died. The shares were at that date valued at £9,250. The Crown claimed estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), in respect of the value of the shares.

Held (LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM, dissentiente): the "property taken" under the disposition made by the deceased within the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (a), was the sum of £5,000, and, therefore, that sum was liable to duty and not the shares purchased and retained by the trustees.

The House took time for consideration.

Jan. 25. The following opinions were read.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, on Dec. 19, 1946, William Galbraith Hetherington executed a deed of trust whereby he nominated himself and three others as trustees "for the ends, uses and purposes after-mentioned", and declared that

"the trust fund consists of the sum of £5,000 sterling which is vested in the trustees and which, or investments representing the same, shall be held and applied for the trust purposes afterwritten."

Then follow trusts in favour of the truster's daughter Elizabeth for her life, with remainders over. The trust deed gave the trustees wide powers of investment, including power to purchase, subscribe for, pay for and take up any shares or stock in a number of companies, including Creamola (England), Ltd. On Dec. 21, 1946, the trustees' solicitors, on the instructions of the trustees, applied for an allotment of five thousand new £1 ordinary shares of Creamola (England), Ltd., at par. On that date, and at the date of his death, the trustee was a director of that company and had a controlling interest in it. On Dec. 24, 1946, the truster, by cheque in favour of the trustees' solicitors, paid over to the trustees the sum of £5,000 to be held by them on the trusts declared by the deed of trust. On the same date, the trustees' solicitors sent their own cheque to Creamola (England),

Ltd., in payment of £5,000 due in respect of an application by the trustees for an allotment of five thousand new £1 ordinary shares in that company. These shares were allotted to the trustees and are still held by them. They were at the time of the truster's death, and still are, the only investment held by the trustees. The truster died on Feb. 5, 1948, and thus did not live for a period of five years after the execution of the deed of trust and the payment of £5,000.

A The Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), as amended by Finance Act, 1946, s. 47, provides [by reference to the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38] that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include (inter alia)

B “any property . . . taken under a disposition made by any person . . . purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made five years before the death of the deceased.”

Section 7 (5) of the same Act provides:

C “The principal value of any property shall be estimated to be the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, such property would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death of the deceased.”

D No one doubts that the truster made a disposition which comes within the section and that estate duty is payable on certain property which is deemed to pass on his death, but the question is: What is the property which is deemed to pass; is it the £5,000, or is it the trust fund constituted by the deed of trust, in its state of investment at the death of the truster, i.e., the Creamola shares? It is common ground that £9,250 was the value of the Creamola shares at the truster's death. Thus, no question as to value or as to the proper method of valuation arises in the present case.

E What, then, is the property which is deemed to pass? The statute says it is the “property taken” under the disposition made by the truster. My Lords, I feel no doubt that the property taken under that disposition was the sum of £5,000. That was the only property which passed from the truster, and it was the only property taken by the trustees from the truster under his disposition. They took that property, of course, as trustees for the beneficiaries under the deed of trust. The truster never owned the five thousand Creamola shares, and, therefore, those shares could not be “taken” under any disposition made by him. As soon as the trustees received the £5,000 it became in their hands a trust fund to be held on the trusts declared by the deed of trust, and it was, of course, proper for the trustees to invest that sum in some one or more of the numerous investments authorised by the trust deed. They invested it in the Creamola shares, but they did not take these shares under the disposition made by the truster; they took the shares because, in the exercise of their discretion, they decided to apply for them and because the company decided to allot them to the trustees.

G Some discussion arose in the course of the argument whether the “disposition” in the present case was the drawing of a cheque for £5,000 by the truster, coupled with the sending of the cheque to the trustees' solicitors, or was the execution of the trust deed by the truster. I think the former is the true view, because the trustees “took” nothing until the £5,000 reached their solicitors, but, to my mind, it makes no difference to the result of this appeal whether the “disposition” was made by the cheque or by the trust deed. In the former case, the disposition carried the sum of £5,000 and nothing else. In the latter case, the truster, by the trust deed, “disposed” of property which was to be vested by him in the trustees, and that property was again £5,000 and nothing else.

H At one time counsel for the Crown seemed disposed to place some reliance on the words in the trust deed:

“And I provide and declare that the trust fund consists of the sum of £5,000 sterling which is vested in the trustees and which, or investments representing the same, shall be held and applied for the trust purposes afterwritten”

In my view, these words are far, indeed, from helping the Crown. The trustor declares that the trust fund consists of £5,000. Must not the “property taken under the disposition” be the sum which he declares to be the trust fund? The words “and which, or investments representing the same . . .” in no way assist the Crown. They merely introduce the trusts on which the trustees are to hold the trust fund (already defined as the sum of £5,000) or the investments which the trustees decide to make with that fund. A

My Lords, if the gift of £5,000 had been made to a donee who was to retain it for his own benefit, there could surely have been no doubt that duty would have been payable, on the donor's death within five years, on £5,000 cash, even if the donee had forthwith invested the gift in Creamola shares and still held these shares at the donor's death. If authority were needed for this proposition, it is to be found in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1), applied and approved in A.-G. for Ontario v. National Trust Co., Ltd. (2) ([1931] A.C. 822, 823): see also A.-G. v. Oldham (3). There is, however, one case in which a distinction appears to have been drawn between a gift to a person for his own benefit and a gift to trustees for the benefit of persons entitled in succession. That is Re Payne (4). The three learned judges who formed the majority in the Second Division of the Court of Session in the present case all placed some reliance on Payne's case (4), but, in my view, it was wrongly decided. I can see no logical distinction, for the present purpose, between any of the following cases: (i) A.B. gives cash or transfers shares to C.D. for his own benefit; (ii) A.B. declares that he will henceforth hold a sum of cash or a block of shares in trust for C.D. for life with remainder to other beneficiaries; (iii) A.B. gives cash or transfers shares to C.D. and E.F. on trust for G.H. for life with remainder to other beneficiaries. In each case the property taken is the cash or shares which the donor gives or transfers or whereof he declares trusts. The tax under s. 2 (1) (c) is a tax on B

“property . . . taken under a disposition . . . purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos.” C

It is a tax on certain defined property, and it is necessary to look at the moment when the gift was made in order to see what that property was; it is not a tax on beneficial interests in property and it matters not whether the gift was made (to quote the sub-section) D

“by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise.” E

It is noteworthy that in Payne's case (4), SIMONDS, J., appears to have felt some doubt whether the words of the statute entitled him to “isolate gifts by way of settlement from all other forms of gift”: see [1939] 3 All E.R. 881. I think this doubt was well founded, and I cannot find any words in the statute which justify such isolation. It is also to be noted that the three members of the Court of Appeal, though they were unanimous in dismissing the appeal, all gave different reasons for their decision. F

Counsel for the Crown submitted that what was settled was a trust fund, and that a trust fund retains its identity as a trust fund notwithstanding any changes in its investment. I agree that the £5,000 became a trust fund as soon as it passed from the settlor to the trustees, but the property which the trustees “took” from the settlor was £5,000. I agree also that a trust fund, once constituted, retains its identity as the trust fund held on certain trusts, notwithstanding any changes which may be made in the investments constituting it, but that fact seems to have no relevance in the present case. It was suggested by counsel for the Crown that the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 39, supported the argument for the Crown, but I do not think that section throws any light on the matter. Its wording can readily be applied to the ordinary case where property actually passes on a death, but its effect becomes somewhat obscure G when applied to property which the deceased gave away during his lifetime, but within five years of his death. If the property were given to a person beneficially entitled thereto, it is impossible to suppose that that person would deliver an account under s. 39 "upon retaining the same for his own use", for at the time when he retains it for his own use he cannot tell whether the donor will or will not live five years. If the property were given to trustees on trusts for persons entitled in succession, they might still hold it on subsisting trusts at the donor's death, or they might have "distributed" it in his lifetime to persons becoming absolutely entitled (who would then "retain the same for their own use") or they might have "disposed of" it in some manner permitted by the terms of the trust. In any of these events, the words "upon . . . distributing or disposing thereof" do not fit the case, and in each case, as it seems to me, it is necessary to fall back on the words

"in any case within six calendar months after the death of the deceased."

Trustees who no longer held the property given to them by the deceased, but who held investments representing the original property on trusts which were still subsisting at the donor's death, would have to decide whether they ought to include in the account the property which they originally "took" from the donor, or the investments representing that property at the date of the donor's death. In my view, s. 39 afforded them no assistance in making this decision.

My Lords, I fully realise that difficulties as to the method of valuation arise in some cases if the property which is to be valued as at the date of the donor's death is property taken by a donee some years before. Some of these difficulties were discussed by the Lord President (LORD CLYDE) and by LORD SANDS in Lord Strathcona's case (1), and they were not agreed as to how these difficulties were to be solved. In my view, however, these difficulties arise, in the case, for instance, of a gift of a racehorse, by reason of the wording of the relevant statutory provisions. It is, perhaps, surprising that gifts inter vivos should be valued as at the death of the donor and not as at the date of the gift. The latter value represents that which was withdrawn from the donor's estate, and the statute is directed to preventing the avoidance of tax by such withdrawals. Further, if the latter value were taken for the purposes of estate duty, the donee would know that he would be charged with tax on that value, and no more, if the donor died within five years, and he could make provision for that event.

As matters stand, it would appear that the donee may receive a gift, e.g., of shares or chattels worth £5,000, sell the property for £5,000, and four and a half years later be charged with duty on a much larger sum, if the subject-matter of the gift has appreciated in value in the meantime. However, your Lordships have to interpret the statute as it stands, and in the present case no difficulties can arise, on any view, as to the method of valuation of the "property taken". This being so, I shall make no observations, which would necessarily be obiter, on the difficult questions as to valuation which may arise in other cases hereafter.

I would allow the appeal.

LORD MACDERMOTT (read by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON):

My Lords, the relevant statutory provisions have already been read and I need not repeat them. When property is made subject to estate duty by reason of these provisions, the assessment of the duty necessitates (i) the ascertainment of the property "taken" under the disposition purporting to operate as an immediate gift, whether outright or by way of settlement, and (ii) the valuation of the property as at the subsequent death of the person making the disposition. The question for determination in this appeal arises under (i) rather than under (ii), but the interval of time between the disposition and the death explains the dispute, as the amount of duty payable will be much greater if what happened during this interval respecting what was "taken" under the disposition is a relevant consideration. Thus, if the property "taken" under the disposition was the £5,000 given by the truster to the trustees and nothing else, the duty will be payable on that sum; but if, on the other hand, the property "taken" was something which at the date of the truster's death was the Creamola shareholding acquired with the £5,000, then the duty will be payable on £9,250, the value of that shareholding at that time. My Lords, I see no escape from the conclusion that the trustees took the sum of £5,000 under a disposition made by the truster. That is what passed from the truster to the trustees and that is what the truster himself describes in the trust deed as the trust fund. So far, there seems little room for contention. It is true that the application for the allotment of the Creamola shares was made in anticipation of the truster's payment and that that payment and the trustees' payment for the shares they had applied for were both made on the same day. But there is nothing in what was thus done so expeditiously to belie the terms of the trust deed, and it seems to me that the position is in all material respects exactly the same as it would have been had the trustees held the £5,000 for a longer period, say a month, before investing as they did. But was the property "taken" under the disposition the £5,000 and nothing else? That raises the real issue. The trustees contend for an affirmative answer to this question. The Crown submits that the property "taken" was something essentially different from the £5,000; that it was a fund with an identity which continued and persisted throughout the duration of the trust and despite any change of investment, and that, as such, it was represented as truly by the Creamola shares as it had been by the money with which they were acquired.

Now, in instances of the sort under consideration, in which one has to look both to the beginning and the end of the interval I have mentioned, it seems to me that a definition of "property" which would enable a fund thus settled to be followed from mutation to mutation so that its form at any given moment became the property "taken" under the settlement would be in no way repugnant to the general scheme and policy of the enactments relating to estate duty. The conception underlying such a definition finds expression in the definition of "settled property" in the Finance Act, 1894, s. 22 (1) (h), and is, in my judgment, quite compatible with the doctrine respecting an out and out gift as enunciated by LORD SANDS in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1) (1929 S.C. 808). I think there would be nothing irrational or inconsistent in treating absolute gifts and gifts in trust differently in this connection. In both cases a portion of the donor's estate is permanently alienated, but in one it is liberated so as to make its future traceability a mere matter of chance, while in the other the donor has himself done what he can to ensure traceability while the trusts he has declared endure.

In the circumstances of this appeal, however, the Crown is unable to call in aid any statutory definition. The relevant enactments do not use the expression "settled property" and the terms of the extended meaning given to "property" by s. 22 (1) (f) of the Act of 1894 are not wide enough to comprehend the investments purchased by a settled sum of money which is not the proceeds of a sale. Whether they would have been wide enough to apply had the truster transferred, say, £5,000 war loan instead of £5,000 is another question, but as it does not arise on the facts of this case I do not express an opinion on it. As matters stand, the Crown did not seek to apply these definitions, nor did it seek to found its case on the view expressed by CLAUSON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in Re Payne (4), a view which, if I may respectfully say so, places more weight on the provisions of s. 39 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, than those provisions are capable of bearing. In its substance, the case for the Crown rested on the validity of the submission already mentioned, namely, that the "property taken" was a trust fund, a species of property in itself, distinct from, while yet embracing, such property as might from time to time be subject to the trust. This conception of a trust fund as a continuing entity and a distinct form of property was advanced by the Crown in Re Payne (4), and was accepted by SIMONDS, J., who describes it in the following passage from his judgment ([1939 3 All E.R. 880):

"It is to be observed that the disposition may be by way of gift outright or by way of settlement. It is the latter class of case with which I have to deal, and I think it is the easier class of case. Where there is a settlement which persists to the date of death, it is not, I think, difficult to regard the trust property, in whatever state it may be at the death, as the same property as that which was taken under the disposition. The claim was thus formulated on behalf of the Attorney-General, namely, that the subject-matter of the gift is in each case the settled fund, that is, in this case the property originally made subject to the declaration of trust, subject to and with the benefit of the duties and powers vested in the trustees by the trust, including the power of investing money and varying investments, and that the settled fund as it actually existed at the death of the settlor is, therefore, the property deemed to be included in the property passing on death, and the valuation as at the date of death should relate to the investments and moneys representing the corpus of the trust fund at that date."

C In the Court of Appeal SCOTT, L.J., appears to agree with this view. He says ([1940] 2 All E. R. 123) that the property given "was simply the totality of equitable rights created by that declaration of trust in the beneficiaries under it", and later (ibid., 124) that

D "it is the settled fund, with its continuing, although changing, character under the investment trusts of the settlement, which constitutes the property charged with estate duty at the time when it passes or is deemed to pass."

But, perhaps, nowhere is the Crown's contention put more clearly than by LORD PATRICK when, in the course of his opinion in this case, he says (1953 S.C. 85):

E "The property taken is a trust fund, which from the moment of its creation has certain inherent characteristics imposed in part by the deed of trust and in part by the common law, and as such an entity it continues thereafter. It is the trust fund, in whatever form it may then happen to be, which falls to be valued at the time of the death of the donor."

F My Lords, a conception which has gained this degree of judicial support cannot be disregarded lightly. But I must confess that the more I reflect on it the more difficulty I have in seeing how it satisfies the first, essential requirement of the statute. Is a trust fund, considered in the sense of this conception, "property" as that expression is used in s. 2 of the Act of 1894? In my opinion, it is not. In the first place, such an abstraction does not seem to me to be "property" according to the ordinary meaning of the word, and there is no enactment to make that meaning inapplicable in this case. Secondly, the Act of 1894 does not appear to recognise any relevant distinction, as respects property which is subject to duty, between a trust fund and the items which happen to constitute it at any particular moment. Thus, in s. 1 of the Act of 1894 the duty is made payable on a provision which suggests that the creation of a trust fund was not regarded as producing a new species of property. And, thirdly, the conception, if it connotes nothing more than the property for the time being subject to the trust, has all the appearance of an attempt to harness the definition of "settled property" which is, admittedly, inapplicable; while if, in addition, it connotes the rights and obligations arising by virtue of the trust, then, as it seems to me, it necessarily involves consideration of the interests and rights of the beneficiaries; and that is an element which, as I understand the decisions of this House in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), and Christie v. Lord Advocate (6), ought not to be taken into account. What passes or is deemed to pass is the property settled and not the rights or obligations attached thereto by the settlor for the purposes of the trust.

For these reasons, my conclusion is that the submission of the Crown fails. That being so, it follows, in my opinion, that the "property taken" was the property taken immediately under the disposition, the sum of £5,000 and no more, for on this view of the Crown case nothing remains to justify looking beyond that sum to the state of its investment at the time of the truster's death. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

LORD REID: My Lords, by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, property passing on the death of the deceased is deemed to include, inter alia, property which would require to be included in an account under sections of earlier Acts if those sections were enacted in the Act of 1894 and were amended in certain respects. Those sections are s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, and the effect of this legislation by reference, so far as it concerns the present case, is that property passing on death is by the Act of 1894 deemed to include any property taken under a disposition, made by any person dying on or after June 1, 1881, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased. By later legislation this period of twelve months has been extended to five years, but otherwise no change has been made. It is not disputed that, in the ordinary case where a gift is made by transfer or delivery direct to the donee, the property taken is the same as the property given: it is the property which, by virtue of the disposition, ceases to belong to the donor. If the donor hands over money, that money is the property taken, and if the donor transfers shares, those shares are the property taken. But it has been held in this case by the Second Division, following the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Payne (4), that that is not so where the gift is to trustees to hold for beneficiaries: in that case the property taken is said to be something different from the property which has ceased to belong to the donor.

In this case the facts are simple and not in dispute. By deed of trust of Dec. 19, 1946, the late Mr. Hetherington nominated himself and the appellants as trustees for the purposes therein stated and provided that

Those purposes were, briefly, to pay to the truster's daughter, Miss Elizabeth Jamieson Hetherington, for her life rent alimentary use altogether the income of the trust fund, on her death leaving issue to pay the trust fund to her issue, and in the event of her dying without leaving issue surviving to pay the trust fund to her sister, whom failing, to the issue of her sister, whom all failing, to the heirs in mobilibus of the truster. In addition to ordinary powers of management and investment, the trustees were given power to purchase, subscribe for, pay for and take up any shares or stock of three named companies including Creamola (England), Ltd. The truster had control of that company. On Dec. 21, 1946, the trustees applied for an allotment of five thousand new £1 ordinary shares of Creamola (England), Ltd. On Dec. 24 the truster paid £5,000 to the trustees and on the same day they paid that sum to the company. The shares were duly allotted and were still held by the trustees as the trust fund when the truster died on Feb. 5, 1948. The value of the shares at that date is agreed at £9,250.

The Finance Act, 1894, s. 7 (5), provides that the value of any property shall be estimated to be the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, such property would fetch if sold in the open market at the time of the death of the deceased. If the shares then constituting the trust fund were held to be the "property taken" in this case, then the value of the gift for estate duty purposes would be £9,250.

The case of a gift direct to a donee was considered in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1). At that time gifts within three years of the donor's death were deemed to pass on his death, and Lady Strathcona died within three years of making gifts to each of her four children. In each case, the gift took the form of a transfer of war loan, shares of the Anglo-Persian Oil Co., Ltd., and stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., and the property taken was held to be these securities. LORD BLACKBURN dissented, holding that the subject of the gifts was really cash. One of the donees had sold part of the securities given to him before Lady Strathcona's death, but it was held in his case that this made no difference and that the value of each gift for estate duty purposes was the value at the date of Lady Strathcona's death of the whole securities which she had transferred to the donees. Different reasons were given by the Lord President and LORD SANDS, but on the particular facts they led to the same result.

The Lord President's view was that what is deemed to be included in the property passing on the death of the deceased is (1929 S.C. 805)

"... the identical subject of the former gift, just as it was at the date of the gift—and nothing other, nor more, nor less. It is therefore that subject—as it was when taken by the donee—which must, in my view, be deemed (contrary of course both to fact and to possibility) to be included in the property which actually passes on the donor's death."

If the subject of the gift was a promising young racehorse and before the death of the donor it had proved worthless or died, the Lord President thought that the Act required the commissioners to ascertain what would be the value at the date of death of an equally promising young racehorse and not to ascertain the value at that date of the horse which had in fact been given.

LORD SANDS was of a different opinion. He said (ibid., 807):

"The keys to the interpretation of that legislation are the ideas of property passing, and of property being deemed to pass although it does not actually pass. These ideas have been the subject of much judicial exposition and are now familiar, so I do not dwell upon them. It is enough that property which is deemed to pass upon death is upon the same footing as regards liability for estate duty as property which actually passes... The theory underlying a revenue Act must bow to its express provisions, but an appreciation of the theory may sometimes help to elucidation. It appears to me that the theory of the provisions here in question was, just as in the case of the 1881 Act, that, in order to avoid disappointment of the estate duty, the property donated should be treated just as if no donation had been made, and the property in question had remained part of the deceased's estate and had actually passed upon his decease."

This passage was quoted with approval by the Privy Council in A.-G. for Ontario v. National Trust Co., Ltd. (2). The grounds of judgment of the Court of Appeal in A.-G. v. de Prévile (7) appear to me to be to the same effect. It was held in that case that where a tenant for life released his life interest in favour of the remainderman and died within twelve months of that release, no duty was payable in respect of that gift. A. L. SMITH, L.J., said ([1900] 1 Q.B. 229):

"Considering that the group of sections in the Act of 1881 is dealing with the property of which deceased persons in fact die possessed, or would have died possessed if they had not given it away, in my opinion it is not the true reading of s. 38 that property must be brought into an account no matter whether it would or would not have had to be brought into an account if it had not been given away within twelve months of the death. It is only to be brought into an account if it would have had to be so brought but for the gift ”:

and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said (ibid., 231):

“ . . . s. 38 deals with what shall be included, and says in effect that it shall include not only property forming part of the estate and effects of the deceased at his death, but also property which he has parted with within three (now twelve) months before his death. Now, must not this mean, according to the ordinary rules of construction, property of the same kind as that dealt with in the antecedent legislation? That is to say, property in which the deceased had such an interest that, if he had not parted with it by a gift within twelve months before his death, it would have been estate and effects of a deceased, and therefore have been included in the property on the value of which the duty was granted? ”

That reasoning appears to me to cover the case of the racehorse discussed in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1), and to lead to the conclusion that if the racehorse had predeceased the donor no duty would be payable in respect of the gift.

I now turn to consider whether there is room for a different approach when the property is given in trust. One possible view is that one must look to see, not what passed from the donor to the trustees, but what was the property taken by the beneficiaries, they being the only donees. Another possible view which has been expressed is, if I understand it rightly, that one does look to see what is the property taken by the trustees, but that what the trustees take is not the same as what the donor gave: the trustees take in a fiduciary capacity and the rights which they take are different from those which the donor had. What they hold is a trust fund which is a continuing entity or corpus. These and other interpretations were discussed in Re Payne (4). The facts in that case were involved, but those parts of the judgments which it is necessary to consider do not depend on particular specialities and I think that it is enough to say that the settlor, in effect, conveyed to the trustees £10,000 and an option. The trustees exercised the option and bought shares: then there were changes of investments and receipts of bonus shares, and when the settlor died less than three years later the trust fund was worth about £50,000.

In the Court of Appeal all the lords justices held that duty was payable on the value of the fund at the settlor's death, but all for different reasons. SCOTT, L.J., said ([1940] 2 All E.R. 122):

“ The real—and, in my opinion, the only—issue on the first question is whether the property given by the settlor and ‘taken’ by the donees is in law to be regarded, as the appellants contend, as being a cheque for £10,000—that is to say, a gift to the trustees equivalent to that sum in cash—or, as the revenue contend, as being the totality of the equitable interests conferred by the declaration of settlement on the beneficiaries, covering the whole value of the settled fund and entitling them to have that fund administered as a single continuing corpus for their benefit in accordance with the trusts of the settlement ”.

SCOTT, L.J., then said that, in his view, the property given was simply the totality of equitable rights created by the declaration of trust in the beneficiaries; no other form or kind of property was the real subject of the gift, the transfer to the trustees of the legal title was mere machinery to effect the gift. I find that view at first sight simple and attractive, but for several reasons I cannot agree with it. In the first place, duty is, in general, payable on the passing of property and not on the creation of beneficial interests in it, and where something other than the passing of property, e.g., the cesser of an interest, is to attract liability, that is expressly stated. And then I do not see how to deal on this theory with a case where some of the beneficial interests do not vest immediately. The Act is dealing with dispositions purporting to operate as immediate gifts. If the trustees are directed, say, to hold for A in liferent and on A's death to convey to X, whom failing, to Y, there is no vesting of the fee until A's death and, therefore, no immediate gift to anyone of the beneficial interest in the fee. Let me suppose that the funds were conveyed to the trustees more than five years before the donor's death: if all the beneficial interests immediately vested there could be no liability to duty, but suppose the fee did not vest until the death of the liferenter and that took place before but within five years of the death of the donor. Is it to be said that because there was no vesting of the fee until within the five years, therefore there was no gift to the fief until within the five years and therefore duty is payable? But that would seem to be the result if one has to look at the taking of beneficial interests by the beneficiaries. Later in his judgment, SCOTT, L.J., seems to modify his view because he says (ibid., 124):

" . . . but it is the settled fund, with its continuing, although changing, character under the investment trusts of the settlement, which constitutes the property charged with estate duty at the time when it passes or is deemed to pass."

That appears to me to be quite a different conception, and I shall examine it later.

CLAUSON, L.J., put his judgment on a ground which, it seems to me, could be applied equally well to a direct gift to a donee, and would then lead to the conclusion that, where such a donee has sold the subject of the gift and re-invested the proceeds, he also is chargeable on what is in his hands at the donor's death and not on what he received from the donor but no longer holds. This would be contrary to the decision in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1), and, I think, contrary to the terms of the Act. The ground of judgment of CLAUSON, L.J., was not supported by the respondent in argument, and I do not think it necessary to say more than that I do not agree with it.

LUXMOORE, L.J., held that the gift was not a gift of £10,000, but was a gift of certain patent rights which on realisation yielded £10,000 to the trustees. Then, having referred to s. 22 (1) (b) of the Act of 1894, he said that it was admitted that if the property taken was the patents and patent rights, then estate duty was exigible on the value of the investments for the time being representing that property. I have found no other reference in the report to any such admission, and if it was made I do not think that it was rightly made. Section 22 is the definition section and sub-s. (1) provides:

(f) The expression ' property ' includes real property and personal property and the proceeds of sale thereof respectively and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale."

The provision is not a definition of " property ": it only provides that " property " is to have an extended meaning and include " proceeds of sale ", etc., unless the context otherwise requires. It is readily applicable where the Act is dealing with the holding of property for a period, but it appears to me to be inapplicable where the Act is dealing with property to be ascertained at a particular moment of time. If one is looking for property passing or taken at a particular time, the proceeds of a subsequent sale cannot have passed or been taken at that time because they did not then exist. I, therefore, think that this provision is excluded by the context here, but if I am wrong about that and this provision is applicable, it leads to a strange result: it can only apply where there are " proceeds of sale " of the original property and there can be no proceeds of sale of money. So this provision would bring in investments held for the time being if the original gift was something other than money, but would not bring them in if the original gift had been money. This is so unreasonable that it may afford an additional reason for holding the provision inapplicable to this kind of case, and, further, if it were applicable, I do not see anything which would exclude it where the original property was taken by an individual donee. That would mean that if he sold the original gift to him and re-invested the proceeds he also would only be liable in respect of the value of the investment held by him when the donor died. But it is, I think, settled law that an individual donee's liability is not altered by reason of his having sold the original gift before the donor's death; his liability must still be calculated with reference to the value of the original gift.

The Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of SIMONDS, J. SIMONDS, J., having said that it was clear that what the settlor settled was £10,000 and the option and that it was also clear that the only relevant date for the purpose of valuing property which passes is the date of death, proceeded ([1939] 3 All E.R. 879):

"The question of difficulty upon which the parties are at issue is what is the property of which the value has to be ascertained at the death of the deceased. The contention of the Attorney-General has already been stated: the property which passed on the death was the trust fund as it then existed. The plaintiffs on the other hand say that it is essential to see what was on Jan. 26, 1936, taken under this disposition made on that date; it was the sum of £10,000 and an option, and it is that property so taken which must be valued at the death. Each side points to the hardships and anomalies which the other view involves."

Then, having mentioned some of these hardships and anomalies, he said (ibid., 880):

"The real problem is to reconcile the two elements: (a) property taken under a disposition made in (say) 1936, and (b) a valuation to be made in (say) 1939."

If one were legislating that might well be said to be the real problem, but we must take the Act as we find it and the Act appears to me to set two quite distinct problems, the first of which must be solved before one reaches the second. The first is to determine what was the property taken, and, once that problem has been solved, the next is how to value that property. No doubt if the Act is ambiguous so as to leave open two methods of determining what was the property taken, then, if one method leads to a fairer result than the other when one comes to apply the direction of the Act as to valuation, that fact should be taken into account in solving the ambiguity, but it appears to me that that is as far as one can go in linking the two problems. I would agree that, if the statutory provisions can be so construed, it would be better that duty should be payable on the value of the investments held at the date of death of the donor than that it should be payable on the value of other investments originally held but later sold. In the present case, the investment acquired by the trustees appreciated, but in other cases it may have depreciated and then duty would have to be paid on a greater sum than the value of the trust fund when the liability arises: it would be more just that duty should be paid on the value of the investments out of which it must be paid. But I am unable to follow SIMONDS, J., in finding it possible to construe the Act so as to lead to that result. He said (ibid.):

"Where there is a settlement which persists to the date of death, it is not, I think, difficult to regard the trust property, in whatever state it may be at the death, as the same property as that which was taken under the disposition."

It is with regret that I find myself unable to regard, say, securities received from the donor and sold as the same property as other securities which have been bought with the proceeds of the sale of the first.

The grounds of decision of the majority of the Second Division in the present case are, perhaps, most concisely stated by LORD PATRICK in the following passage from his opinion (1953 S.C. 84):

"I cannot regard the property taken under an immediate out-and-out gift as being the same as the property taken under a deed of trust for the benefit of limited interests. Nor does the kind of object transferred affect the question: whether it is cash, or securities, or the rest. Let us suppose a person who owns £5,000 in cash. His rights in it are absolute. He can do what he likes with it. In particular, he can dispose of it inter vivos. If by an inter vivos transfer he conveys the £5,000 absolutely among various donees, the property taken is just what the donor had a moment before the transfer. It is £5,000 in absolute property. But, if he transfers the £5,000 under an inter vivos deed of trust for the benefit of various donees in limited interest, the property taken is something very different from what the donor had a moment before the transfer. No person and no agglomeration of persons now has the absolute right which he had to the £5,000. He has extinguished that right and created something new."

It is quite true that no person and no agglomeration of persons now has the absolute right which the donor had to deal with the £5,000. But, in my opinion, that does not mean that the rights of property in the £5,000 were diminished or altered. A thing given may pass from the donor to trustees, and then they may sell it. The buyer will have an absolute right just as the donor had, but the trustees cannot give to the buyer greater rights of property than they had themselves. The rights of property remain the same throughout, but while the thing is owned by the trustees their power to exercise those rights is limited.

I would express my conclusion in this way. The donor had certain rights of property. Either those rights must be taken or some other rights. Unless what is taken is the rights which the donor had, what has happened to the donor's rights? They have not disappeared. If, for example, trustees take a secured debt on behalf of beneficiaries, the trustees have the same rights against the debtor and the security as the donor had. What has happened is not that the property has changed, but that, by reason of their fiduciary position and of the directions of the truster, the trustees do not have the same freedom to deal with the property as the truster had: they are obliged to use the rights of property which have come to them in certain ways and precluded from using them in other ways, but the property remains the same. I agree with the opinions of LORD SANDS in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1) and A. L. SMITH and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., in A.-G. v. de Prévile (7). A gift is taxed on the footing that if the property given away had not been given the donor would still have had it at his death. Of course, he might have sold the property and spent the proceeds; but no one suggests that that can be considered. Or he might have sold the property and re-invested the proceeds: where the gift is to an individual donee no one has suggested that that can be considered. The re-investment cannot be deemed to have been in the donor's possession and to have passed on his death. I cannot see how there can be any difference where property is conveyed to trustees unless, in that case, the whole basis of liability is different.

The argument was that in all cases other than those where there is a declaration of trust it can be said that property which in fact passed at an earlier date is deemed to have passed at the donor's death, but that this cannot be said where a donor simply makes a declaration of trust with himself as the sole trustee. In that case, it is argued, no property actually passes when the gift is made and the "property taken" must be the rights conferred on and taken by the beneficiaries under the declaration of trust. But that view only leads to another difficulty. If the terms of the declaration are such that there is no immediate vesting of the fee, then on that view I do not see how there can be any immediate gift of the fee because there cannot be a gift until there is someone to take it. What happens in such a case is that, although the title to the property is still held by the donor, the property ceases to belong to him, and all beneficial rights of property pass away from the donor as an individual to himself as trustee. I think that that can be regarded as a real passing of property and, therefore, the analysis which is valid in the ordinary case is still valid in this case. The statutory provision ties together gifts by way of transfer or delivery, and gifts by way of declaration of trust so closely that I would only accept the view that the basis of liability is quite different in the last case if that were really necessary, and I see no such necessity.

It remains to consider, in the light of the conclusions which I have already reached, what was the property taken in this case. Was it the £5,000 or was it the shares? One can figure a case where the donor hands over money with instructions to buy a particular investment with it and the taker is obliged to follow those instructions. In such a case it might be said that the real subject of the gift is that investment. But I see nothing of that kind in the present case. Under the deed of trust the trustees had full discretion as to the investment of the £5,000 and there is nothing to show that the decision to invest it in these particular shares was not their decision. I am, therefore, of opinion that the property taken was the sum of £5,000, that duty is payable on that sum, and, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM: My Lords, the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1), provides, inter alia, that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, and with certain other amendments made by the Finance Act, 1894. Among property to be so included in an account under the section as amended is “any property . . . taken under a disposition made by any person . . . purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased.”

By subsequent legislation, five years now falls to be substituted for twelve months.

In the circumstances of this case three related questions arise—What property was taken? Under what disposition? And in whose favour did the disposition purport to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos? The answers depend, in my opinion, on determining what was the disposition. I have reached the conclusion that the disposition here is the trust deed. I recognise that a disposition within the meaning of the statute need not involve a deed at all. It may be a simple act of delivery of a corporeal movable. A possible view could be that the disposition here was the cheque for £5,000 operating as an assignment of that amount to the trustees when presented to the drawer's bankers. For reasons that I shall state in a moment, I reject that view, and, indeed, the arguments addressed to this House by both sides in the case proceeded, I think, on the view that the disposition was the trust deed.

Looking for a moment at the trust deed, I find that it opens with a statement by the truster that, for certain reasons which I need not enumerate, he has resolved “to make a provision for” his daughter Elizabeth “in manner after-mentioned”. He, accordingly, creates a trust by appointing various persons as trustees “for the ends uses and purposes aftermentioned” and provides and declares “that the trust fund consists of the sum of £5,000 sterling which is vested in the trustees and which, or investments representing the same, shall be held and applied for the trust purposes afterwritten.”

The deed is dated Dec. 19, 1946. The sum of £5,000 was paid by the truster on Dec. 24 by cheque drawn in favour of the law agents to the trust who had already, on Dec. 21, applied for an allotment of five thousand new £1 ordinary shares of Creamola (England), Ltd., at par. The provision that was made through the medium of this trust for Elizabeth took the form of an alimentary liferent of the net income "of the trust fund" subject to a power in the trustees to withhold the full net income from time to time as they might consider advisable, and to form a reserve fund or to accumulate with capital any unexpended portion of income, all under certain declarations and conditions. The trustees were also given power to encroach on capital on her behalf to an extent not exceeding one fourth "of the trust fund". On her death "the trust fund" was to go to lawful issue surviving her. There are destinations over in the event of Elizabeth dying without leaving lawful issue surviving, in favour of her sister Jane or her issue, whom all failing in favour of the truster's heirs in mobilibus.

I find little difficulty in holding that by this provision for Elizabeth the truster made an immediate gift to her qualified by the powers vested in the trustees. I think he may also be said to have made an immediate gift in favour of other interests, although these were at the time unascertained or contingent. The gift would not fail because in the last resort the truster's heirs in mobilibus would take, and in the meantime the trustees would hold for the interests that would emerge. I see no difficulty in making an immediate gift for someone who is to be ascertained in a particular way at a future date so long as the donor parts with the subject of gift to a stakeholder or other person to hold for the prospective donee. The outlook of the statute, in my opinion, is merely to see whether someone has disposed of his property gratuitously during life. He could do so in two ways, by donatio mortis causa, which is revocable, or by an out and out gift, which is irrevocable. Here the truster made an irrevocable and gratuitous disposition of property during his life. If it was gratuitous, someone got a gift and, in my view, the donees here were the beneficiaries under the trust deed. They took, or the trustees took for them, but whoever took did so, in my opinion, under the trust deed. The mere passing of the cheque, as I see it, did not operate as a gift. If it did, the trustees could have put the proceeds in their pockets. The passing of the cheque was purely executorial, a piece of machinery to satisfy a trust which had already been declared.

I find confirmation for the view I have taken in the reference in s. 38 (2) (a) to disposition by way of declaration of trust. This would clearly apply to money or property belonging to a person which that person declared that he held in trust for someone whom he wished to benefit. There would be no transfer or delivery of property, but the donee would take under the declaration of trust which, as I read the statute, would be the disposition. In substance, I see no difference between such a case and a trust declared by a donor to exist over property conveyed by the donor to persons nominated by him as trustees. The machinery may be different, but in each case the donees take under a declaration of trust. I find further support for my view in the language of s. 39 of the Act of 1881. This section runs:

"Every person who as beneficiary, trustee, or otherwise, acquires possession, or assumes the management, of any personal or movable property of a description to be included in an account according to the preceding section shall upon retaining the same for his own use, or distributing or disposing thereof, and in any case within six calendar months after the death of the deceased deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a full and true account, verified by oath, of such property duly stamped as required by this Act. Any officer authorised by the commissioners for the purpose may administer the oath."

It is clear that a person "retaining the same for his own use" must be a donee under the disposition referred to in the preceding section. A person "distributing or disposing thereof" will include, but is not necessarily confined to, a trustee of property gifted under the preceding section. When a trustee distributes or disposes of property he distributes or disposes of it, in my opinion, under the deed or disposition by which the property was taken and in this case the trustees distribute or dispose of the property under the trust deed.

I reach the conclusion, accordingly, that the disposition here was the trust deed and that it operated as an immediate gift inter vivos to the beneficiaries. There remains the question—What property was taken under the disposition? In my opinion, it was the corpus of the trust estate whatever that might be from time to time. I can see no other answer to the question. The statute speaks of a disposition purporting to operate as an immediate gift. The gift operated by the trust deed is a lifereat and fee to certain ascertained or ultimately ascertainable persons. That cannot, as the Lord Justice Clerk said, be a gift of a talent to be buried. It is a gift that can only be made effective by investment and due administration of trust property. It is said that the subject of gift must be the same from the giver's end and from the taker's end. I agree. But I see the gift as the creation of a trust of property at the giver's end, and the receiving of the benefits of the trust at the taker's end. When I assign gratuitously a policy of life insurance payable at my death, I give the donee a right to claim from the insurance company the insurance moneys payable at my death. The value of the policy is not the same at the date of gift as it will be at the death, and it may include profits which have not been declared when the gift is made. When I create a trust, I create a right in the beneficiaries to claim against the trustees the payments or benefits due under the trust and to require of them due administration of the trust. The property taxed, of course, is the amount of the assurance moneys or the value of the trust property from which the beneficiaries' claims present or future fall to be satisfied, not the value of the beneficial interests. There are obvious differences between these two cases and I do not wish to press the analogy too far, but a disposition, whether assigning or creating a right of action against a third party is, I think, a disposition of property coming under s. 38 (2) (a) if operating as an immediate gift inter vivos.

A cogent consideration which seems to me to be almost conclusive is the language of s. 39 of the Act of 1881 to which I have already referred. The duty of delivering an account falls on every person mentioned under that section in respect of property covered by s. 38

“upon retaining the same for his own use, or distributing or disposing thereof, and in any case within six calendar months after the death of the deceased . . .”

Trustees do not retain anything for their own use, and I read these words as referring naturally to an individual donee, though the duty could hardly arise until the death of the deceased. But the words “distributing or disposing thereof” are very apt to cover a trustee distributing trust property among beneficiaries. In the present case, if Elizabeth had died without issue surviving, the trustees would have had to distribute the trust estate to her sister Jane, whom failing, Jane's issue, whom failing, the truster's heirs in mobilibus. This duty might have arisen before the truster's death, if Elizabeth had died then. And what the trustees would have distributed would have been the corpus of the trust as it then existed. I do not see how, in any true sense, that can be said to be distributing the £5,000 of which the trustees took the possession or management some years before, and what s. 39 is referring to is

“property of a description to be included in an account according to the preceding section.”

The language of the statute appears to me to be satisfied only by treating property put in trust, not according to its original character but according to the character it had assumed by the time it fell to be distributed, or at the truster's death, whichever is the earlier. This, I think, is the line of reasoning which appealed to CLAUSON, L.J., in Re Payne (4), although I do not follow him with regard to the effect of the word "taken". I regard "taken" as referring to taken by the beneficiaries, and my reliance on s. 39 has reference to the meaning to be attached to the word "property". I do not regard this point as an independent and separable ratio of decision, but rather as a consideration supporting the view I have already expressed as to the meaning of property in s. 38, when taken under a declaration of trust operating as an immediate gift inter vivos. Substantially I take the same view as that expressed by SIMONDS, J., and SCOTT, L.J., in Re Payne (4), and in the opinions of the majority of the judges in the Court of Session in the present case. In my view, s. 38 (2) (a) and s. 39, taken as a whole and fairly read, lead to the conclusion that property in the case of gift by an inter vivos trust means not the sum or property initially put into trust, but the corpus of the trust estate as it may exist at the death.

The principle underlying s. 38 (2) (a) is very clear. It is to prevent a person avoiding death duty on some part of his estate by giving it away within a stated period of his death. I agree with LORD SANDS in Lord Strathcona v. Inland Revenue (1), that we are to assume that the deceased has in fact retained the property given away until his death and have to value it as at that date. We must, I think, follow out the fortunes of the subject of gift so far as these are due to the nature of the subject. So, if a subject is capable of growth or improvement or decay or death in the natural course of things, we should allow for these in the period between the date of gift and the date of death. I say this having in mind the racehorse used as an illustration in the Strathcona case (1). If the racehorse died in the years after it was gifted and before the donor's death, I would, as at present advised, say that it would not fall to be valued at all at the donor's death, because, if he had kept it instead of giving it away, we must assume, I think, that it would still have died, in which case it could not appear in the estate passing at the donor's death. In the same way, if it had become better, or worse, because of the additional years it had attained since the date of gift, it should be valued as at the death accordingly. LORD SANDS' view is, in my view, more logical and more consistent with the object of the statute than the Lord President (LORD CLYDE'S) conception of assuming a horse in the state and condition and with the prospects that the actual horse had at the date of gift and valuing such a horse at the date of death. Difficult questions might arise where the horse had been realised for cash before the date of the donor's death. But it is unnecessary to follow these out here, or to consider whether they would be solved by the definition of property in the Finance Act, 1894, s. 22. I venture into this excursion, not because the Strathcona case (1) is in point here, but because the considerations to which I have adverted and the principle enunciated by LORD SANDS have, I think, a certain bearing on this case. Trust property has the potentiality of appreciating or depreciating with age and the state of investment and this applies whether the property with which the trust starts is cash or securities or any other kind of property. If this property with its potentialities and incidents be assumed to have been retained and administered in the hands of or for the truster, as it was in the hands of the trustees, it would have borne duty in the state in which it was at his death. It seems entirely consistent with the policy and conception of the statute to say that that is how property gifted under a trust, whether cash or other, should be treated and valued at the donor's death.

Various anomalies were referred to by counsel for the respondent as arising under the provisions of various of the Finance Acts if settled property were treated as something different from the cash with which such settled property may have originated. Such anomalies would give rise, he said, to what would seem to be double taxation of what is substantially the same property. That is, no doubt, an important consideration, but I have not found it necessary to consider whether these anomalies would arise or whether they could be resolved. The matter will have to await an actual case giving rise to such a question. Even if such anomalies will result, they will follow from the construction put on s. 38 (2) (a) by this House as applied to dispositions of property in trust. It is not, I think, permissible to control the construction of s. 38 (2) (a) of the Act of 1881 by conceptions as to settled property in later Finance Acts. The anomalies will result from different or conflicting conceptions in different statutory provisions. It may equally be pointed out that a construction that will treat the whole corpus of a trust fund as existing at the death as property taken under s. 38 (2) (a) will in general result in a more equitable result to the beneficiaries who will have to suffer the duty than the construction contended for by the appellants. In many cases, I imagine the trust assets of an inter vivos trust will show a serious depreciation in value as compared with the sum of money originally put in trust and it will come hard on the beneficiaries to have estate duty assessed on a sum substantially higher than the value of the assets out of which it is to be paid. The statute must, however, be construed independently of such considerations. But, for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I think the court below came to a sound decision. I would dismiss the appeal.

MEGHJI LAKHAMSHI & BROTHERS v. FURNITURE WORKSHOP.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Tucker, Lord Keith of Avonholm and Mr. L. M. de Silva), December 1, 2, 8, 9, 1953, January 13, 1954.]

Privy Council—Eastern Africa—Appeal to Privy Council—Appeal as of right where “matter in dispute amounts to or is of value of £500 or upwards”—Calculation of value—Eastern African (Appeal to Privy Council) Order in Council, 1951, art. 3 (a).

By art. 3 (a) of the Eastern African (Appeal to Privy Council) Order in Council, 1951, an appeal to the Privy Council lies as of right from any final judgment of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa “where the matter in dispute on the appeal amounts to or is of the value of £500 sterling or upwards, or where the appeal involves directly or indirectly some claim or question to or respecting property or some civil right amounting to or of the said value or upwards.”

On an appeal to the Privy Council by landlords against an order of the Court of Appeal of Eastern Africa dismissing their application for possession of a plot of land together with an adjoining building in Kenya, which had been let by them to the respondents, the premises being within the scope of the Kenya Rent Restrictions Ordinance No. 22 of 1949, leave to appeal had been granted by the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa on affidavits to the effect that the capital value of the plot in question exceeded £500. The respondents contended on a preliminary point that the true test was how much it was worth to the landlords to succeed in the appeal, and that this was to be measured by deducting from the value of the land with vacant possession its value to the landlords subject to the statutory tenancy, and that, as no evidence of this had been adduced, there was no jurisdiction to fix the conditions on compliance with which the final order giving leave to appeal would issue.

HELD: it was sufficient for an appellant to show that the case came within any one limb of art. 3 (a); the case fell within the latter part of the article, on the true construction of which it was the value of the property and not the value of the claim or question which was the determining factor; and, therefore, the preliminary objection failed.

APPEAL by landlords against a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Eastern Africa, dated Mar. 18, 1952, reversing a judgment of the Supreme Court of Kenya, dated July 25, 1951. On the appeal before the Privy Council the respondents took a preliminary objection that no appeal lay as of right to the Privy Council under the Eastern African (Appeal to Privy Council) Order in Council, 1951, art. 3 (a), and this report deals only with this point.

Khambatta, Q.C., Ramsay and Amerasinghe for the appellants.
M. J. Albery for the respondents.

Jan. 13. LORD TUCKER: On this appeal the respondents took a preliminary objection that no appeal lay as of right under art. 3 (a) of the Eastern African (Appeal to Privy Council) Order in Council, 1951. The appeal is by the landlords against an order dismissing their application for possession of a plot of land at Thika in Kenya which had been let by them to the respondents together with an adjoining building, which premises were within the scope of the Kenya Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, No. 22 of 1949. The article provides that an appeal shall lie as of right from any final judgment of the Court of Appeal.

"where the matter in dispute on the appeal amounts to or is of the value of £500 sterling or upwards, or where the appeal involves directly or indirectly some claim or question to or respecting property or some civil right amounting to or of the said value or upwards."

Leave was granted by the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa on affidavits to the effect that the capital value of the plot in question exceeded £500. The respondents contended that the true test is how much it is worth to the appellants to succeed in the appeal and that this is to be measured by deducting from the value of the land with vacant possession its value to the owners subject to the statutory tenancy, and that, as no evidence of this had been adduced, there was no jurisdiction to fix the conditions on compliance with which the final order giving leave to appeal would issue.

It is quite possible that a case may fall in whole or in part within more than one limb of art. 3 (a) and it will suffice for an appellant to show that it comes within any one. It was laid down by this Board in Macfarlane v. Leclaire (1) that "the value of the subject-matter in dispute", under corresponding legislation relating to Canadian appeals, must be determined by looking at the judgment as it affects the interests of the party who is prejudiced by it and who seeks to appeal. The same test was applied in Allan v. Pratt (2) to a case of an appeal from a judgment awarding damages for personal injuries, it being held that the value was the sum awarded and not the sum claimed. More recently, in Lipshitz v. Valero (3), it was held that, where a tenant appellant had been evicted from a plot of land valued at £50 on which he had constructed a building at a cost of £450, the true test was whether it was worth £500 to him that the Rent Restriction Ordinance should be held to give him protection against an order to vacate the land leaving on it a building which had cost him £450 to erect. The first two of these cases were dealing only with the value of "the subject-matter in dispute", and it would appear that in the last case also it was the first limb of the article that was, primarily at any rate, under consideration. Their Lordships have no doubt that under whichever limb of the article any case may fall the "value" must be looked at from the point of view of the appellant, with the result that an appeal may sometimes lie where the landlord is the appellant although there could be no appeal by the tenant, or vice versa.

Whatever the result might be in the present appeal if the words

"where the matter in dispute on the appeal amounts to or is of the value of £500 sterling or upwards" stood alone, their Lordships are of opinion that the case falls within the latter part of the article which deals with

"some claim or question to or respecting property . . . of the said value or upwards", and that, on the true construction, it is the value of the property, not the value of the claim or question, which is the determining factor. The presence of the word "indirectly" seems to require this construction. Looked at from the angle of the landlords the value of the property, vacant possession of which they were claiming, was correctly taken on a capital value basis. It by no means necessarily follows that the result would have been the same if the tenants had been appellants, and their Lordships do not intend to imply any doubt as to the correctness in this respect of the recent decisions of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa in the cases of Popatlal Padamshi v. Shah Meghji Hirji (4) and Chogley v. Bains (5). Their Lordships have read a transcript of the shorthand note of the proceedings before this Board on the occasion of the application for leave to appeal in the case of Africa Boot Co. v. Morley (6) (where, however, the respondent was not represented), from which it would appear that art. 3 (a) must have been construed in the sense indicated above.

A Their Lordships were, accordingly, of opinion that the preliminary objection failed and proceeded to hear the case on its merits.

Preliminary objection dismissed.

D W., the permitted assign of a lease dated Oct. 16, 1945, for a term of twenty-one years, deposited with T., the guarantor of W.'s bank account, the lease, the assignment and a document under hand whereby he undertook to execute in T.'s favour, when called on to do so, a legal charge or mortgage of the property, as security for all moneys paid by T. under his guarantee. W. became overdrawn and T., at the bank's request, paid the bank £300 on account. Subsequently, W. was adjudicated bankrupt and the landlord issued a writ against W. and his trustee in bankruptcy, claiming possession

E of the property on the grounds of breach of covenant and non-payment of rent. T. applied for relief against the forfeiture under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (4).

F HELD: although T. had no vested interest in the property, but only a right to call on W. to execute a legal charge or mortgage in his favour, he was, by virtue of W.'s undertaking, a person having an agreement for an under-lease within s. 146 (5) (d) of the Act of 1925; he became entitled to have an under-lease granted when he made the payment of £300 to the bank; and, therefore, he was in the position of an under-lessee within s. 146 (4), and as such entitled to apply for the relief sought.

G SUMMONS by an equitable mortgagee of property for relief against forfeiture under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146, in an action by a landlord for forfeiture of a lease dated Oct. 16, 1945.

H

HARMAN, J.: This is an application by summons in an action for possession by the landlord against one Wood (whom I call hereafter “the defendant”), who was the permitted assign of the lease created by the landlord and who had been adjudicated bankrupt. The defendant's trustee in bankruptcy was also joined in the action as the person in whom the term had become vested.

The lease, dated Oct. 16, 1945, which was granted by the landlord in favour of a limited company, created a term of twenty-one years, and provided for a rent, increasing year by year, to an ultimate sum of £550 per annum. A premium of £200 was also payable. The lease, which included the usual covenants, contained covenants not to assign or under-let without the leave of the landlord, such leave not to be unreasonably withheld, and not to carry on businesses other than those of a greengrocer or fruiterer.

On Apr. 19, 1950, the lessee, with the landlord's permission, assigned the term to the defendant. That assignment was in common form and calls for no comment. The defendant's bank account was guaranteed by the applicant in this summons, one Harold Trussell, and in consideration of that guarantee the defendant, on Apr. 19, 1950 (the day on which he took the assignment of the term), deposited the lease and the assignment with the applicant together with a document under hand whereby he undertook, in the event of being called on by the applicant to do so, to execute a proper legal charge or mortgage of the said property "to secure all moneys for the time being paid by you under the said guarantee."

The defendant fell into arrears with his rent, and on June 27, 1953, was adjudicated bankrupt. These proceedings were commenced by a specially indorsed writ dated Nov. 3, 1953, claiming possession, arrears of rent amounting to £266 19s., and mesne profits.

Meanwhile, the defendant had been granted an overdraft at Barclay's Bank, and, on June 15, 1953, the bank called on the applicant, as guarantor, to pay them a sum of money under his guarantee. He has paid them £300 on account and has, therefore, become entitled under the instrument of charge, if he calls on the defendant, to have a proper legal mortgage. The applicant now applies by summons in the landlord's action for relief against the forfeiture, and asks for an order vesting the leasehold premises in him for the residue of the term. For that purpose, he relies on the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (4), which repeated the Conveyancing Act, 1892, s. 4. The latter enactment gave under-lessees for the first time a right of relief in forfeiture actions. Section 146 (4) provides:

"Where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any covenant, proviso, or stipulation in a lease, or for non-payment of rent, the court may, on application by any person claiming as under-lessee any estate or interest in the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof, either in the lessor's action (if any) or in any action brought by such person for that purpose, make an order vesting for the whole term of the lease or any less term, the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof in any person entitled as under-lessee to any estate or interest in such property upon such conditions as to execution of any deed or other document . . .", as the court thinks fit. This action is brought to enforce a right of re-entry both for breach of a stipulation and for non-payment of rent. "Under-lease" is defined by s. 146 (5) (d) as including " . . . an agreement for an under-lease where the under-lessee has become entitled to have his under-lease granted."

It is comparatively familiar law that relief under that section or its predecessor, s. 4 of the Act of 1892, had been given to mortgagees by sub-demise. That is not surprising, because a mortgagee by sub-demise has a term of years. So far as I know, there is no authority—none has been called to my attention—for similar relief being given to a person not having a legal term or any term vested in him, and, therefore, having no estate in the property. In a sense, the applicant has an interest in the property, as having a right to a charge on it. The definition does, however, provide that "under-lease" includes "an agreement for an under-lease". That must mean that the legislature intended, not only a person having an under-lease, but also a person having an agreement for an under-lease to be included in the operation of s. 146 (4). The right of the applicant is a right to call on the defendant to execute a legal charge or mortgage. It is said that that right is to have a charge by way of legal mortgage such as is envisaged by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 87 (1), which, as is well-known, does not demise a term. The effect is, however, that

A . . . the mortgagee shall have the same protection, powers and remedies . . . as if . . . (b) where the mortgage is a mortgage of a term of years absolute, a sub-term less by one day than the term vested in the mortgagor had been thereby created in favour of the mortgagee."

B Therefore, as between him and his mortgagor, he is in the same position as if he had a mortgage by sub-demise. I think, on the whole, that the case of an equitable chargee, entitled, under the covenant, to have a charge by way of legal mortgage, would be no different were he entitled to have the mortgage direct by sub-demise. Apart from that, the words of this charge are "a proper legal charge or mortgage", and I think the mortgagee could choose which form his security should take and could ask for a mortgage by sub-demise of the term from the defendant or his trustee. He has not, however, made that demand, and it is argued that, that being so, he does not come within the definition because an under-lessee is defined as a person having an agreement for an under-lease where he has become entitled to have his under-lease granted. In my judgment, he became entitled to have his under-lease granted, in effect, directly he paid the money to the bank, and the fact that he did not make a formal demand cannot make any difference to his position. It appears to me, therefore, that the applicant is a person in a position to come as under-lessee within s. 146 (4) and ask for relief.

D That, however, is not the end of the matter, because under s. 146 (4) the granting of such relief is a discretionary matter. The applicant offers to pay all the arrears of rent and to enter into direct covenants with the landlord in terms which correspond, so far as the landlord requires it, with those of the lease itself. E It is true that there was in the lease a covenant by the lessee not to assign or under-let without permission, but there is no suggestion that the applicant is not a respectable and responsible person. If the landlord had wished to say that he was not bound to assign to him or to allow him to become an under-lessee because he was not a responsible party, it is for the landlord to take that point, but he has not done so. It appears to me that, if the applicant is able and willing to pay all the arrears of rent, and to execute a proper instrument entering into the covenants in the lease of Oct. 16, 1945, in so far as the landlord requires them, it would be right to give the applicant the relief that he seeks. F

Order accordingly.

THE ASSUNZIONE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.J.J.), December 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 1953.]

Conflict of Laws—Shipping—Law governing contract of affreightment—Intention of parties not expressed—Conflicting inferences—Matters to be taken into consideration.

A charterparty between French charterers and Italian shipowners was based on a uniform general charter and was in the English language. The general terms had been agreed in previous correspondence between the parties' brokers in France and Italy respectively, but the charterparty was made in Paris and was headed "Paris, Oct. 7, 1949". A supplement to it was in French and the bills of lading were in the French language, and in French form with a typical French clause binding the master, and they were issued in France. The cargo was to be carried from a French port to an Italian port, but in an Italian ship, owned by an Italian partnership, wearing the Italian flag and with an Italian master. Freight and demurrage were to be paid in Italian currency in Italy, eighty per cent. of the freight before the ship arrived at an Italian port and the balance at the port of discharge. The bills of lading were indorsed by the consignees before the arrival of the ship. The contract was entered into in pursuance of an exchange agreement between departments of the French and Italian governments, but this was not known to the Italian shipowners. In an action by the charterers arising out of the contract, in which they contended that French law, and the shipowners contended that Italian law, applied.

HELD: (i) in determining what law the parties must be deemed to have intended to apply to a contract of affreightment where conflicting inferences could be drawn from different facts, regard must be had, not solely to any presumption arising from any particular fact, such as the country in which the contract was made or the flag, but to the terms of the contract, the situation of the parties, and, generally, all the surrounding facts and circumstances, in order to ascertain on balance of all the considerations what just and reasonable persons ought to have intended, taking into account the convenience of the parties and the efficacy of the contract.

Dicta of LORD WRIGHT in Mount Albert Borough Council v. Australasian Temperance & General Mutual Life Assurance Society, Ltd. ([1937] 4 All E.R. 214), of LORD ATKIN in R. v. International Trustee for Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166), of LANGTON, J., in The Adriatic ([1931] P. 246) and of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in The Njegos ([1936] P. 106), applied.

Lloyd v. Guibert (1865) (L.R. 1 Q.B. 115), considered.

(ii) besides the country in which the contract was made and the flag, the place and form of payment were of great importance, and regard could be had to the facts that the bills of lading were likely to be indorsed before the ship arrived and to be presented by Italian holders, that any claims there were were likely to be made by such Italian holders against the Italian ship, and that, if it could not be arrested, the owners could be sued in Italy, such facts being within the contemplation of the parties, since in continental law the bills of lading constituted part of the contract. No regard could be had to the exchange agreement as involving government participation in the contract (though that would be only a factor and not conclusive as to the intention, per BIRKETT, L.J.), since one party was unaware of it.

(iii) on the facts, on balance, Italian law must be deemed to have been intended to apply to the contract.

APPEAL against an order of WILLMER, J., dated June 11, 1953, on a preliminary point in an action (i) for damages in respect of damage to and short delivery of a cargo of wheat being carried by the Assunzione from Dunkirk to Venice; and (ii) for the proportion of a salvage award which had had to be paid in respect of the cargo. WILLMER, J., held that Italian law, and not French law, applied to the contract of affreightment. The charterers appealed.

Sir Robert Aske, Q.C., and H. V. Brandon for the charterers.
Mocatta, Q.C., and Colinvaux for the shipowners.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal from an order of WILLMER, J., arises out of a claim made by the plaintiffs, the owners of cargo lately laden on board the vessel Assunzione, against the defendants, who are the owners of the ship. The plaintiffs were charterers of the Assunzione, and they claimed against the shipowners damages in respect of damage to, and short delivery of, a cargo of wheat which was being carried by the Assunzione from Dunkirk to Venice. There is also a claim to recover the proportion of a salvage award which had to be paid on behalf of the cargo. We are concerned only with a preliminary point, and that is: What is the law to be applied to the contract of affreightment which was made between the parties? Both parties were at one time prepared to put the case in the alternative, that either the law of France or the law of Italy should govern the contract, but it was ascertained that the law of Italy contained certain provisions which would react unfavourably on the charterers' claim, and they now contend that the law of France should be applied, while the shipowners say that the law of Italy should be applied.

There is an agreed statement of facts, which provides :

"1. The [charterers] are a French organization called Office National Interprofessionnel des Cereales. The [shipowners] are an Italian partnership comprising two brothers carrying on business in Genoa and Naples. The Assunzione at all material times was of Italian registry and flew the Italian flag. 2. On May 21, 1949, a written exchange agreement was made between the High Commissioner for Food of the Italian Republic acting through Federazione Italiana dei Consorzi Agrari (hereinafter called 'Federazione') of the one part and the High Commissioner for Food of the French Republic acting through the [charterers] of the other part whereby it was agreed inter alia as follows :—(a) That the High Commissioner for Food of the Italian Republic should put at the disposal of the High Commissioner for Food of the French Republic certain quantities of grain and flour to be delivered in France by July 15, 1949. (b) That the [charterers] should subsequently make restitution of such grain and flour by delivering like quantities to Italian ports by Jan. 1, 1950. (c) That the guiding principle of the agreement should be that it should bring no profit and cause no loss to the Italian government."

That agreement was drawn up in the two languages. In art. 2 (b) it is provided:

"The restitution will take place on dates to be determined by mutual agreement between the Federconsorzi and ONIC. It shall terminate, with the grain back in Italian ports, before Jan. 1, 1950. (c) The restitution ports are limited to those on the following list :—Genoa, Leghorn, Civitavecchia, Gulf of Naples, Messina, Catania, Palermo, Cagliari. (d) The tonnage to be shipped to each of the above-mentioned ports and the dates of shipment will be determined by mutual agreement between the Federconsorzi and ONIC. ONIC reserves the right of altering the tonnage indicated above according to the capacity of the steamers in accordance with a proportion that shall not exceed ten per cent. one way or the other."

By art. 3:

"The guiding principle of the exchange operations to which the present agreement relates is that the said operations will not bring any profit, or cause any loss to, the Italian government . . ."

It was in compliance with the clause as to restitution that grain was to be shipped, and was shipped, from France to Italy in October, 1949.

Paragraph 3 of the agreed statement of facts reads:

"On Oct. 7, 1949, in Paris the [charterers], in pursuance of their obligation to make restitution under the said exchange agreement, entered into a charterparty with the [shipowners] whereby they chartered the [ship-owners'] s.s. Assunzione to carry a cargo of wheat from Dunkirk to Italy. The said charterparty was negotiated through L'Azerad & Fils, brokers, in Paris, and Ballestrero Tuena & Canepa, brokers in Genoa, as appears from the cables and correspondence constituting appendix B hereto. The [charterers] were not at any material time aware of the terms of the said exchange agreement."

I draw attention to the fact that it was common ground that the shipowners were not aware of the terms of the exchange agreement between the departments of the Italian and French governments.

The statement continues:

"The said charterparty was drawn up in the English language using the printed form of uniform general charter of the Documentary Council of the Baltic and White Sea Conference. The said charterparty, to which the parties will refer for its full terms and effect, constitutes appendix C hereto. 4. On Oct. 21, 1949, at Dunkirk there were issued two bills of lading signed on behalf of the master of the Assunzione in respect of a quantity of wheat shipped on board the said vessel at that port by Société Generale de Surveillance S.A. (hereinafter called 'Surveillance') as agents for the [shipowners] who were the owners thereof. The said bills of lading were drawn up in the French language and provided inter alia for carriage to Venice and delivery to order on payment of freight in accordance with the said charterparty."

The bills of lading are attached.

" 5. At some time between Oct. 21, 1949, when the Assunzione sailed from Dunkirk and Dec. 10, 1949, when she arrived at Venice the bills of lading upon presentation of which the cargo was ultimately delivered were endorsed in blank by Surveillance and sent through the post to Sorveglianza S.I.P.A. in Italy (hereinafter called 'Sorveglianza'). Thereafter they were transmitted by Sorveglianza to Federazione and endorsed by the latter in Venice before presentation to the ship. 6. During the course of the voyage of the Assunzione from Dunkirk to Venice carrying the said wheat damage was sustained by and salvage services rendered to both ship and cargo. 7. On Dec. 12, 1949, in Venice a general average agreement relating to the Assunzione's said voyage was signed by Sorveglianza and the master of the said vessel. A true translation of the said agreement, to which the parties will refer for its full terms and effect, constitutes appendix E hereto. 8. On or about Dec. 24, 1949, the Assunzione completed discharge of her cargo."

The remaining paragraphs of the agreed statement of facts deal with what followed and the nature of the claims; the first claim appears to have been made by a letter dated Dec. 27, 1949. It is on that agreed statement of facts, and on the documents, that this preliminary point has to be determined.

The charterparty, to which importance is attached by counsel for the charterers is headed: "Paris, Oct. 7, 1949", and from that comes the first point made by learned counsel for the charterers. It is said that this charterparty was made in Paris between people who were in Paris, and that the fact that they put "Paris" at the head of the document shows that they attached importance to the fact that the place at which the contract was made was in France. But if one looks a little further into the matter, one finds that the signing of the charterparty followed on certain correspondence which had taken place, as shown by the documents. Ballestrero Tuena & Canepa, the Italian brokers, corresponded with L'Azerad, the French brokers, between Oct. 5 and Oct. 7, and in general the terms of the charterparty were agreed in that correspondence before the actual charterparty was signed. I wholly agree with the submission of counsel that the parties contemplated that there should be a charterparty and that the negotiations which they had were leading up to that end. But, none the less, it is not a case of two parties who are resident, or whose headquarters are, in Paris. One party has its headquarters in Paris, but the other has its headquarters in Italy. After this correspondence the brokers finally signed the charterparty in Paris on Oct. 7.

The charterparty provides that the vessel being so laden

"shall proceed to one good and safe port west coast Italy including Sicily or at charterers' option, one good and safe port Adriatic coast Italy, amongst Bari, Ancona or Venice as ordered on signing bills of lading or so near thereunto as she may safely get and lie always afloat and there deliver the cargo on being paid freight—on intaken quantity—as follows 1,980 Italian lire per metric ton if west coast Italy, 2,205 Italian lire per metric ton if Adriatic coast Italy."

The cargo which she was to take on board was

"7,000 metric tons five per cent. more or less, quantity at master's option, wheat in bulk, ten per cent. in bags."

The provision as to payment, which is to be made in Italian lire, was relied on by counsel for the shipowners in support of his submission.

In the original form of the charterparty the payment of freight was covered by cl. 4. That clause is struck out, and in place of it reference has to be made to cl. 16, above which is the heading:

"Supplementary clauses of the charterparty for s.s. Assunzione dated Paris Oct. 7, 1949—Dunkirk/Italy."

Clause 16 reads :

"The freight is to be paid in Italian currency to the credit of Fratelli Rizzuto, Naples. Eighty per cent. (80) of the freight, after deduction of advances made at loading port, if any, will be paid by charterers within eight days after reception by 'L'Azerad, Paris' of the master's telegram mentioning date of sailing, and amount of disbursements at loading-port if any. Balance of freight to be paid after discharge of the cargo, within eight days after reception by charterers of the freight account duly visé by their local representative at discharging port. In any case, freight payable discountless, considered earned on signing bills of lading and non-returnable, ship and/or cargo lost or not lost."

Counsel for the shipowners attaches importance to the fact that the freight was to be paid in Italian currency; that it had to be paid to the credit of Fratelli Rizzuto, Naples; that eighty per cent. of it was to be paid by the charterers eight days after reception by "L'Azerad, Paris" of the master's telegram mentioning date of sailing, and that the balance of the freight was to be paid at the discharging port. Those are all factors which he contends go towards supporting his case that the parties, if ever they thought about this matter, would have regarded Italian law as the law which they would apply.

Two other clauses of the charterparty are important :

"7. Demurrage. Demurrage at the rate of 180,000 Italian lire per day or pro rata for any part of a day, payable day by day, to be allowed merchants altogether at ports of loading and discharging over-time, if any, to be for charterers. 8. [Shipowners] shall have a lien on the cargo for freight, dead-freight, demurrage and damages for detention. Charterers shall remain responsible for dead-freight and demurrage (including damages for detention), incurred at port of loading. Charterers shall also remain responsible for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage (including damages for detention) incurred at port of discharge, but only to such extent as the [shipowners] have been unable to obtain payment thereof by exercising the lien on the cargo. 9. Bills of lading. The captain to sign bills of lading at such rate of freight as presented without prejudice to this charterparty, but should the freight by bills of lading amount to less than the total chartered freight the difference to be paid to the captain in cash on signing bills of lading."

The cargo was received, and bills of lading were issued on Oct. 21 at Dunkirk. The bills of lading are in the French language and in French form, but there is stamped on each a marginal note bringing in the provisions : "Both to blame collision clause" and the "General average and the new Jason clause." The bills of lading themselves show that a parcel of wheat was received on board and the destination was Venice, with delivery to order following the charterparty of Oct. 7 according to the York and Antwerp Rules, and it ends:

"... L'accomplissement de ce que dessus j'ai obligé et oblige ma personne, mes biens et mon dit bâtiment avec toutes ses dépendances..."

That, as counsel for the charterers pointed out, is a typical French clause by which the master binds his body, his goods and his ship in the fulfilment of his duty. I have already referred to the exchange agreement as far as is necessary.

WILLMER, J., came to the conclusion that the law of Italy should be applied to this contract. I should say that the charterers arrested the ship, and an action was brought in this court. The action was by writ issued on Oct. 27, 1950, and there have been various amendments of the pleadings.

Many authorities have been cited to us on the question of what law should be applied. The parties did not state their desire, or their intention, on the subject.

It has been said that when that happens one must endeavour to find what the intention of the parties was on the matter. That does not appear to be to me very helpful, for in most cases neither party has given it a thought, and neither has formed any intention on it. Still less can it be said that they have any common intention. Authorities cited to us go back to 1865. Counsel for the charterers relies on what he described as the general rule, i.e., that the law to be applied should be the law of the country in which the contract was made.

A Peninsular & Oriental Navigation Co. v. Shand (1) was an appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of Mauritius. The facts as stated in the headnote are (3 Moo. P.C.C.N.S. 272):

B “A passenger by an English vessel belonging to an English company from Southampton to Mauritius via Alexandria and Suez, took and signed a ticket, in the body of which the engagement of the company was stated to be subject to the conditions and regulations indorsed thereon; among which was this clause—‘the company do not hold themselves liable for damage to, or loss, or detention of passengers’ baggage.’ A package of baggage being lost during the voyage, the passenger sued the company in the Supreme Court at Mauritius for damages for the loss. That court held that the contract was governed by the French law in force in Mauritius, and held that the company were liable.”

C The Privy Council reversed that decision. I find it difficult to imagine how anyone travelling from this country to Mauritius on a ticket issued by the Peninsular and Oriental line could expect the law of France to be applied to that contract, which he, an English subject, made with an English company

D in this country for the carriage of himself and his personal baggage in a British ship. None the less, the court in Mauritius came to the conclusion that the law of France, which ran in Mauritius, ought to be applied. Giving the judgment of the Board, TURNER, L.J., said (ibid., 290):

E “The general rule is, that the law of the country where a contract is made governs as to the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of it. The parties to a contract are either the subjects of the power there ruling or as temporary residents owe it a temporary allegiance: in either case equally they must be understood to submit to the law there prevailing, and to agree to its actions upon their contract. It is, of course, immaterial that such agreement is not expressed in terms; it is equally an agreement in fact, presumed de jure, and a foreign court interpreting or enforcing it on any

F contrary rule defeats the intention of the parties, as well as neglects to observe the recognised comity of nations. Their Lordships are speaking of the general rule; there are, no doubt, exceptions and limitations on its applicability, but the present case is not affected by these, and seems perfectly clear as to the actual intention of the contracting parties. This is a contract made between British subjects in England, substantially for safe

G carriage from Southampton to Mauritius. The performance is to commence in an English vessel, in an English port; to be continued in vessels which for this purpose carry their country with them; to be fully completed in Mauritius; but liable to breach, partial or entire, in several other countries in which the vessels might be in the course of the voyage. Into this contract, which the appellants frame and issue, they have introduced for their own

H protection a stipulation, professing in its terms to limit the liability which, according to the English law, the contract would otherwise have cast upon them.”

On those facts it was held by the Privy Council that the law of England applied, and counsel for the charterers placed reliance on the words which I have read as to the general rule. There is no doubt of the strength of it in some cases. If two people resident in this country enter into a contract of carriage or of affreightment by which goods are to be carried to various quarters of the world in a ship belonging to one of the contracting parties, it might well be said that they both intended that the law of the country in which the contract was made should apply. In the case cited it was the law of the ship as well.

Another view was expressed in Lloyd v. Guibert (2). The headnote reads (L.R. 1 Q.B. 115):

"Where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, as between the parties to the contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the country to which the ship belongs must be taken to be the law to which they have submitted themselves. The plaintiff, a British subject, chartered a French ship belonging to French owners, at a Danish West India port, for a voyage from St. Marc in Hayti, to Havre, London, or Liverpool, at charterer's option. The charterparty was entered into by the master in pursuance of his general authority as master. The plaintiff shipped a cargo at St. Marc for Liverpool, with which the vessel sailed. On her voyage she sustained sea damage and put into Fayal, a Portuguese port, for repair. There the master properly borrowed money on bottomry of ship, freight and cargo, and repaired the ship, and she completed her voyage to Liverpool. The bondholder proceeded in the Court of Admiralty against the ship, freight and cargo. The ship and freight were insufficient to satisfy the bond; and the deficiency with costs fell on the plaintiff as owner of the cargo, for which he sought indemnity against the defendants, the French shipowners. The defendants gave up the ship and freight to the shipper, so as that, by the alleged law of France, the abandonment absolved them from all further liability on the contract of the master:—Held, that the parties must be taken to have submitted themselves, when making the charterparty, to the French law as the law of the ship, and therefore that, assuming the law of France to be as alleged, the plaintiff's claim was absolutely barred."

That was a decision on the facts of the case, but the headnote gives support to the submission of counsel for the shipowners that one must look, in the first instance, to the law of the country to which the ship belongs. I do not think it is any more accurate to say that than it is to say that the law of the country where the contract is made must govern. The report says later (ibid., 118):

"The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the defendants, on the ground that the power of the master to bind his owners personally is but a branch of the general law of agency, and that the flag of the ship was notice to the plaintiff, that the master's authority to bind his owners was subject to the limitation stated in the plea to be imposed by the law of France."

In the Exchequer Chamber the judgment of the court was given by WILLES, J., who said (ibid., 118) that "the plaintiff must have known that the ship was French." The arguments adduced on the two sides are set out (ibid., 119, 120):

"Upon these facts, it was insisted for the plaintiff that the decision ought to proceed upon either what was called the 'general maritime law', as regulating all maritime transactions between persons of different nationalities at sea; the Danish law, as that of the place where the contract was made ('lex loci contractus'); the Portuguese law, because the bottomry bond, which in one sense caused the question to arise, was given in a Portuguese port, and the rule that the place governs the act ('locus regit actum') was supposed, therefore, to furnish a solution: or the English law, as being that of the place of the final act of performance by the delivery of the cargo ('quasi lex loci solutionis'), in either of which alternatives the liability of the defendants was established. And it was argued, that, the charterparty having been entered into bona fide in the ordinary course of business by the master, within the scope of his ostensible authority to contract for the employment of the vessel, which the owner, by appointing a master and sending him abroad in command, allows him to assume, the right of the charterer could no more be narrowed by a provision of foreign law unknown to him than by secret instructions from the owners, which would clearly be inoperative—a proposition which needs no authority in our law, and for which French authorities will be found in Pailliet's edition of the 'Code de Commerce,' art. 216, in the note. For the defendants, it was answered, that by the French law they are absolved; and that that law, as being that of the ship, governs the case, either because the character of the transaction itself, showing that the plaintiff impliedly submitted his goods to the operation of the law of the ship, or because the master, who entered into the contract (although his doing so was within the scope of the authority which he was allowed by the owners to assume), was disabled by the French law from binding his owners, otherwise than with the exception expressed or implied of exemption from liability by abandonment, and that of such disability, or lack of authority, his flag was sufficient notice."

Thus, the argument for the defendants was "the flag", and on the other side there were several differing submissions. The court decided on the facts in favour of the flag. WILLES, J., said (ibid., 129):

"Exceptional cases, should they arise, must be dealt with upon their own merits. In laying down a rule of law, regard ought rather to be had to the majority of cases upon which doubt and litigation are more likely to arise; and the general rule, that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce."

It is in that case in the year 1865, the same year as the Peninsular & Oriental case (1), that the doctrine of convenience is first mentioned, so far as I have seen. In Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (3), the Court of Appeal had to consider this question on an appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division in favour of the plaintiffs. The headnote reads (10 Q.B.D. 521):

"The plaintiffs shipped goods on board the defendants' vessel, the Crown Prince, under a bill of lading, which contained exceptions of, amongst other things, 'collision', and 'accidents, loss, or damage, from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, or mariners, or other servants of the company, in navigating the ship.' In the course of the voyage the Crown Prince came into collision with another vessel of the defendants, the Atjeh. The plaintiffs' goods were in consequence lost. The collision was due to negligence, for which the Atjeh was mainly in fault; but the Crown Prince also was in some degree to blame:—Held, that the defendants had not committed a breach of the contract created by the bill of lading, and that no action could be maintained against them on the ground of a failure to perform the undertaking therein contained to carry the goods safely upon the voyage."

The important part of the report for the purpose of this case is in the judgment of LINDLEY and BAGGALLAY, L.JJ., delivered by LINDLEY, L.J., in which he said (ibid., 540):

"The decision of the court below as regards the law applicable to the case appears to me correct. The parties to the contract were English, although the master who signed the bill of lading was a Dutchman. The contract was in the English language, and was made at Singapore, which is an English port, and where English law prevails. The ship sailed under the Dutch flag, and was bound to a Dutch port, and was commanded by a Dutch captain. As regards the privileges of trade which the ship might enjoy as a Dutch ship in Dutch ports, the parties no doubt relied on the Dutch law, but as regards the construction and effect of the contract itself as between the plaintiffs and the defendants there can I think be no doubt that the parties were contracting with reference to English law, and not with reference to the law of the country under whose flag the ship sailed in order to obtain the privilege of trading with Java. This conclusion is not at all at variance with Lloyd v. Guibert (2), but rather in accordance with it. It is true that in that case the law of the flag prevailed; but the intention of the parties was admitted to be the crucial test; and the law of the ship's flag was considered as the law intended by the parties to govern their contract, as there really was no other law which they could reasonably be supposed to have contemplated."

I pause there to say that it was for that reason, because of the passage in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., that I read earlier the arguments as adduced and as stated by WILLES, J. (L.R. 1 Q.B. 119, 120), in Lloyd v. Guibert (2). LINDLEY, L.J., draws attention (10 Q.B.D. 540) to the fact that in Lloyd v. Guibert (2) there was really no other law which could be applied on the argument except the law of the flag.

The lord justice continued (ibid.):

"The plaintiff there was English, the defendant French; the lex loci contractus was Danish; the ship was French; her master was French and the contract was in the French language. The voyage was from Hayti to Liverpool. The facts here are entirely different and so is the inference to be deduced from them. The lex loci contractus was here English and ought to prevail unless there is some good ground to the contrary. So far from there being such ground the inference is very strong that the parties really intended to contract with reference to English law."

That judgment is claimed by counsel for the charterers as support for his general proposition, but equally it may be said that there is a strong presumption, or strong inference, that the parties intended the contract to be on the basis of English law.

In Re Missouri Steamship Co. (4) the headnote reads:

"When a contract is made in one country to be performed wholly or partially in another, prima facie the contract is to be construed and enforced according to the lex loci contractus; but the court will look at all the circumstances to ascertain by the law of which country the parties intended the contract to be governed, and will enforce the contract accordingly, unless it should contain stipulations contrary to morality or expressly forbidden by positive law. A contract was made in Massachusetts, U.S., between an American citizen and a British company of shipowners, by which the company undertook to carry certain cattle from Boston to England in a British ship. The contract contained a clause that the company should not be liable for the negligence of the master or crew of the ship. Such a clause is valid by English law, but void by the law of Massachusetts as being against public policy. The cattle were lost by the negligence of the master and crew, and the shipper claimed against the company for the loss. Held (affirming the decision of CHITTY, J.), that the contract itself showed that the parties intended it to be governed by English law, and that the stipulation exempting the company from liability through the negligence of their master and crew, not being immoral or forbidden by positive law but only void under the law of Massachusetts as being against public policy, would be enforced by an English court; and the claim was dismissed."

LORD HALSBURY, L.C., said (ibid., 336):

A “Now this is a contract for the conveyance of cattle from Boston to England by sea on board a British ship by a British company whose domicile is in England. Those circumstances, though very strong, would perhaps not be conclusive. But when I look at the contract itself and find that the ordinary exceptions to the bill of lading are the Queen’s enemies and so on, it is absolutely impossible to resist the conclusion that the parties did contemplate being governed by English law in their contracting relations. If I am to assume that the law of the United States is that this particular stipulation now in dispute is of no validity in the United States and cannot be enforced, when I find that both parties to the contract make this stipulation a part of the contract into which they enter which is of validity in England and can be enforced, and cannot be enforced in the United States, it seems to me to follow irresistibly that the contract relations into which the parties entered were such that they intended to be governed and regulated by English law; and if that is so the question is free from doubt.”

B FRY, L.J., said (ibid., 341):

C “Now, in the first place, the ship was an English ship; the owners were an English company; England was the place to which the goods were to be brought and the place at which the final completion of the contract was to take place; and, what is still more important, the forms of the contract and the bills of lading were English forms”,

D and the learned lord justice was satisfied that the parties must be taken to have intended that English law should be applied to the determination of any question which might arise under that contract.

In The Industrie (5), the Court of Appeal reversed a decision of GORELL BARNES, J., and said that the intention of the parties was to make an English contract. LORD ESHER, M.R., said ([1894] P. 71):

E “This case turns entirely on the one question whether the defendants are liable to pay certain freight. The charterparty, which is the contract of carriage, is in writing, and, therefore, it is for the court to construe it; and the court, under one set of circumstances, must construe it according to one set of canons of construction, and, in another set of circumstances, according to another set. If a foreign contract is brought before an English court, the court has to construe that foreign contract, which is in writing, just as it is the court which has to construe an English contract; but if it is a foreign contract which has to be construed, it must be construed according to the canons of construction used in the country to which the contract belongs, or, as we say, according to the place where it is made. Therefore, the first question is this: Is this contract, as a matter of construction, to be construed according to the canons of English construction, or according to the canons of German construction? It is a contract made for the carriage of goods on board a German ship. Is that conclusive to show that it is to be construed according to German canons of construction? It seems to me that that is not conclusive, and that you must look at a great many more circumstances to see what is the canon to be applied. The mere fact of its being written in English will not enable the court to say that it is not a German contract. It might be made with the master abroad for the use of his ship from one foreign country to another foreign country, so as to have nothing to do with England at all. If it were so, and the only fact to rely on was that the contract was written in the English language, I should think it would be construed according to the canons of the law of the country of the ship. It would be made under the flag, just as if it were made in the country to which the ship belongs. But where you find a great many other matters come in you have to consider them. This is, no doubt, a contract in regard to carriage on board a German ship, but it is made between a German owner and the proposing English shipper, and it is made by means of a charterparty in writing, the instrument being headed with the English words 'charter party'. It is made in London, the contract is negotiated between two English houses, the English brokers authorized by the German owner and the defendants, the shippers, who are English merchants. It is made on an ordinary English form of charterparty. Whether an ordinary German charterparty is at all in the form of an English charterparty I do not know. But this is on an ordinary form of English charterparty, and every stipulation in it is an ordinary stipulation in an English charterparty. The words or phrases used are peculiar to England. One has been particularly noticed—namely, 'the Act of God'. That is an English phrase, and has an English meaning. I care not whether there are words in a German charterparty agreeing with that; but it seems almost agreed that there are not. In the same way there are the words 'the Queen's enemies.' If this was a German charterparty, I do not doubt that 'the Queen' would mean 'the Emperor of Germany', in accordance with the decision in Russell v. Niemann (6). But it is a thing to be taken notice of when you are trying to determine whether the document is an English or a German document; and then, when you find the terms used are applicable to England and not applicable to Germany, it goes a great way to show that the document is to be construed as English. It is not, therefore, on any one of the facts I have stated that reliance is to be placed, but on all of them together. What is the true inference? In order to see that, you must make up your mind what must have been the intention of the parties. You cannot look into the minds of these people; but when you have two men of business dealing in that way, under such circumstances, with a contract made in London, between English brokers and an English firm, who are not supposed to know German law, but who are supposed to know English mercantile law; with a contract made upon an English form, and on a printed form in common use; with a contract made with nothing but English phrases in it, and with a contract made with phrases peculiar to English contracts, what inference can be drawn but that these two people must have meant that this contract was to be construed according to English law? All the circumstances together show that the intention was to make an English contract, and that is all we want."

Dealing with the question of freight, the Master of the Rolls said (ibid., 74):

"Counsel for the plaintiff wishes to read it thus: 'Payment to be made on right delivery of cargo, if discharged in the United Kingdom'; in other words, 'if discharged nowhere else'. I cannot read it so. I do not think that is the right construction. It is freight to be paid on right delivery of cargo, wherever the destination is. But as to the mode in which it is to be paid, if discharged in the United Kingdom it is to be paid in cash as customary, and if discharged elsewhere in cash at the exchange of the day. That is to say, the freight when due is to be paid in English money. If it is paid in England it is to be paid, of course, in cash, and if it is to be paid abroad the payment is to be equal to cash in England, by reason of its being at the exchange of the day. Therefore you have now, if that be the true construction, to construe according to the canons of English construction the phrase 'freight to be paid on right delivery of the cargo.'"

The lords justices concurred.

Those are all the older authorities to which I think it necessary to refer. In two more recent cases the principles are stated in a way which appears to me to make it unnecessary to refer to many of the earlier authorities. I have thought it right to deal with some of them partly out of respect for the argument addressed to the court, and partly because it does seem desirable to show, if it be the fact, that no one of the tests which have been mentioned can, taken by itself, provide a complete answer in all circumstances.

In Mount Albert Borough Council v. Australasian Temperance & General Mutual Life Assurance Society, Ltd. (7), in the Privy Council, LORD WRIGHT, in giving the judgment of the Board, said ([1937] 4 All E.R. 214):

A “The proper law of the contract means that law which the English or other court is to apply in determining the obligations under the contract. English law, in deciding these matters, has refused to treat as conclusive rigid or arbitrary criteria, such as lex loci contractus or lex loci solutionis, and has treated the matter as depending on the intention of the parties, to be ascertained in each case on a consideration of the terms of the contract, the situation of the parties, and generally on all the surrounding facts. It may B be that the parties have in terms in their agreement expressed what law they intend to govern, and in that case prima facie their intention will be effectuated by the court. But in most cases they do not do so. The parties may not have thought of the matter at all. Then the court has to impute an intention, or to determine for the parties what is the proper law which, as just and reasonable persons, they ought to or would have intended if they had
 C thought about the question when they made the contract. No doubt there are certain prima facie rules to which a court, in deciding on any particular contract, may turn for assistance, but they are not conclusive. In this branch of law, the particular rules can only be stated as prima facie presumptions. It is not necessary to cite authorities for these general principles.
 Sometimes their application involves difficulty; but not in this case. It has D been already pointed out that there are, in their Lordships’ opinion, such circumstances as lead to the inference that, in the present case, the proper law of the contract is the law of New Zealand, and, accordingly, that that law should prima facie govern the rights and obligations to be enforced under the contract by a court before which the matter comes, a fortiori a New Zealand court.”

E I take a few lines from the middle of that passage, and omit certain words (ibid.):

“Then the court has . . . to determine for the parties what is the proper law which, as just and reasonable persons, they ought to . . . have intended if they had thought about the question when they made the contract.”

F That, I believe, is the duty on us, and in seeking to determine the question we must have regard to the terms of the contract, the situation of the parties, and generally all the surrounding facts.

The other case is R. v. International Trustee for Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft (8), a case of a different nature, but one in which a like question arose. LORD ATKIN in the House of Lords, said ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166):

G “The legal principles which are to guide an English court on the question of the proper law of a contract are now well settled. It is the law which the parties intended to apply. Their intention will be ascertained by the intention expressed in the contract, if any, which will be conclusive. If no intention be expressed, the intention will be presumed by the court from the terms of the contract and the relevant surrounding circumstances. In H coming to its conclusion, the court will be guided by rules which indicate that particular facts or conditions lead to a prima facie inference, in some cases an almost conclusive inference, as to the intention of the parties to apply a particular law, e.g., the country where the contract is made, the country where the contract is to be performed, if the contract relates to immovables the country where they are situate, the country under whose flag the ship sails in which goods are contracted to be carried. But all these rules only serve to give prima facie indications of intention: they are all capable of being overcome by counter indications, however difficult it may be in some cases to find such."

I do not think that for this purpose any distinction is to be drawn between what LORD WRIGHT spoke of as a prima facie presumption and what LORD ATKIN described as a prima facie inference.

On the authorities counsel for the charterers submitted that it was not possible to spell out of the cases any rule other than that of the place where the contract was made. Counsel for the shipowners claimed that no stronger inference could be drawn from the place where the contract was made than from the flag of the country under which the ship sailed. Indeed, he submitted that one ought, in the circumstances of this case, to have regard first to the flag which the ship wore, and he relied on the decision in Lloyd v. Guibert (2). His main contention was that this was not a case of an inference to be drawn one way or the other, but one in which the facts should be weighed, and that, if they were weighed, those pointing towards the application of Italian law weighed down any pointing the other way.

Without doubt some features in this case point one way, and others in another direction. When a number of circumstances has to be considered in deciding which system of law applies, a presumption or inference arising from one alone becomes of less importance. In such a case an inference which might be properly drawn may cancel another inference which would be drawn if it stood by itself. When such a position arises, all the relevant circumstances must be borne in mind, and the tribunal must find, if it can, how a just and reasonable person would have regarded the problem. No good purpose is served by saying that the French charterers would never have agreed to the application of Italian law, or by saying that the Italian shipowners would never have agreed to the application of French law, for that would have meant that there would have been no contract, and there is a contract.

The charterers, who were also shippers under the bills of lading, were a French organisation; the contract was entered into by a charterparty which was made in France, after discussions to which I have referred, and the bills of lading were issued in France. The language of the charterparty is English, but no one contends that English law is to be applied. Some support is given to the argument of counsel for the charterers by the bills of lading which are in French, and which contain the particular terms which I have mentioned. Those matters support the contention of the charterers. Counsel for the charterers relies, too, on the exchange agreement, on the fact that, in making arrangements for the carriage of the wheat from Dunkirk to an Italian port, the charterers were acting in pursuance of what had been agreed between two government departments. I do not see, in the circumstances of this case, that great help is given by that fact, if it be a fact. WILLMER, J., said:

"It was contended in those circumstances that that assisted to raise the inference that French law was intended to be applied. With regard to that latter point, I am not at all satisfied as to what in fact the status of the actual charterers was; and if it was intended to rely on their being in effect the French government, it seems to me that that is a fact which ought, if not agreed, to have been proved before me. Nor do I think very much of this point when I bear in mind that, according to the agreed statement of facts, the whole of the background of circumstances, of which this contract of affreightment merely forms a small part, was quite unknown to the defendant shipowners. I refer to the fact that this was all part of an international transaction providing for a loan of grain between the French and Italian governments. But, as I say, that was entirely unknown to the defendant shipowners, and I do not see, if it be the fact that the charterers are in a sense some organ of the French government, how the shipowners were to be expected to know that; and if they did not know of it I do not see how that fact can have had any influence at any rate on their intentions."

With that I agree, and I do not think that any question of a sovereign State being a party to the contract comes into this case.

A The circumstances which support the shipowners' contention that Italian law should be applied include these. The ship was an Italian ship owned by two Italians in partnership, and a ship wearing the Italian flag. The master was an Italian. The contract was for carriage from a French port to an Italian port and the cargo was to be delivered at an Italian port. It is right to say that loading was at a French port and discharging at an Italian port, and one may appear to cancel the other, but there are further considerations. The charterparty provided that freight and demurrage should be paid in Italian currency. Eighty per cent. of the freight had to be paid in Italy before the ship arrived at an Italian port, and the balance had to be paid at the discharging port. Clause 7, as to demurrage payable in Italian lire, too, is of importance on this part of the case. The bills of lading were indorsed by Italian consignees before the arrival of the ship at Venice. The judge thought that that must have been in the contemplation of the parties, as the bills of lading were made out to order, by which it must be assumed that endorsement was contemplated.

B It is seldom, if ever, that one will have one of the elements or tests, and nothing else. It might be right to apply the test as to the place of the contract, if one was left with that alone, or that the flag would be the proper test if one had that alone. WILLMER, J., said:

D "I have given the best consideration I can to the various authorities to which I have been referred, and it seems to me that both parties in putting forward their respective contentions have stated their case too high. It is undoubtedly the fact that the place where a contract is made is a point of very great importance in considering any contract, whether it be a contract of affreightment or any other kind of contract. It is equally clear, I think, that the nationality of the ship concerned (and by that I mean the real nationality of the ship) is a matter which is obviously of considerable importance in dealing with the proper law governing a contract of affreightment. But it seems to me that it is putting it too high to say that the place where the contract is entered into is the fact which promotes the 'primary inference', which was the expression used by counsel for the charterers in his argument on behalf of the charterers. Equally, I doubt whether it is possible to say in these days that the flag of a ship, or, indeed, the nationality of the ship, raises anything in the nature of a presumption."

F It may be that in the words the learned judge used in the last line he overlooked the tests stated both by LORD WRIGHT ([1937] 4 All E.R. 214) and by LORD ATKIN ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166) in the passages that I have read, that you must come down on the side of the flag if there is nothing pointing in an opposite direction. It is a position which can seldom arise. In the case of a contract of affreightment made in one country for shipment of goods in a ship wearing the flag of another country, different considerations arise at once, the place where the contract was made and the flag of a different country. Those are matters for consideration, and so are the terms of the contract. Though I believe it to be impossible to state any rule of general application, I feel that matters of very considerable importance are the form of, and place of, payment. In this case payment had to be made in Italian lire, and in Italy. In the circumstances of this case I regard it as a very important feature, coupled as it is with the facts that the ship was an Italian ship and that the destination was an Italian port.

H We were referred to two other authorities of recent date, one a decision of LANGTON, J., The Adriatic (9), in which he put forward convenience as a test, and the other a decision of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in The Njegos (10), in which he placed emphasis on a decision according to business efficacy. It seems to me that both those decisions are completely in line with the general proposition which I have sought to state, and which is taken from the words of LORD ATKIN ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166) and of LORD WRIGHT ([1937] 4 All E.R. 214). One must look at all the circumstances, and one must seek to find what just and reasonable persons ought to have intended if they had thought about the matter at the time they made the contract. If they had thought that they were likely to have a dispute, I hope it may be said that just and reasonable persons would like the dispute determined in the most convenient way and in a way in accordance with business efficacy.

Applying the rule I have stated, and if I am right in my view, weighing all the facts to which attention was directed, I am satisfied that the scale comes down in favour of the application of Italian law, and that the decision of WILLMER, J., was right. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The issue in this appeal was: What was the law to be applied to this particular contract of affreightment?, the charterers contending that the law applicable should be French law and the shipowners that it should be Italian law. The principle on which that kind of question has to be determined has been laid down in a long line of cases. If the intention of the parties is not expressed in the contract itself, the court must ascertain as best it can what is the implied or the presumed intention to be gathered from the whole of the facts. The real controversy in this appeal has centred, not on the question of principle, but on the method to be employed in applying that principle to the facts of this case. It has been said that, in the course of time, and certainly from 1865, certain rules have been evolved by which this kind of question is to be determined, and we have been referred to those rules and to many cases on them—rules applying the law where the contract is made, the law of the flag, the law of immovables, the law of the place of performance, and so on. In this case it has really been a contest between two of those, the rule founded on the law of the place where the contract is made, and the rule founded on the law of the flag. From a consideration of all the cases, many of them cited by my Lord, it is clear that none of those rules is in any sense conclusive of itself. They may be displaced by a clear intention to be gathered from an examination of the facts and the circumstances of the particular case. And, if in such examination the test is how just and reasonable mean would be supposed to declare their intention, the facts assume the greatest possible importance.

Counsel for the charterers placed the greatest reliance on the first fact, that the charterparty bears on its face the words "Paris, Oct. 7, 1949". Among all the facts in the case, he said that the facts that the contract was made in France and that the charterparty bore the word "Paris" was of supreme importance and should be the chief, the dominant, and the primary consideration in the case. Counsel for the shipowners attacked that proposition with force. He said (and I was inclined to agree with him) that it could not be said in any true sense of the words that the contract was made in France. The fact that the charterparty bore on its face the word "Paris" was a long way from showing that the contract was made in France, and he referred to the correspondence which my Lord has dealt with, in which the French and Italian brokers were discussing the terms. It is significant that one of the terms inserted in the correspondence, when the parties were negotiating, was that the contract should be in the form of the uniform general charter approved by the Documentary Council of the Baltic and White Sea Conference, the "Gencon" as it is termed. And it is quite clear from the charterparty which bears the name of Azerad, that the Gencon form was a common form employed obviously in charterparties of this nature. But I think counsel for the shipowners was right in saying that it is too much to say that the contract was made in France, because the correspondence would seem to indicate that all the material matters—though not all the matters —were negotiated by letters and by telegrams passing between Genoa and Paris.

A The matters of controversy in this case could never have arisen had there not been the exchange agreement, which is headed "Rome-Paris", and which, according to my copy, is a translation from the Italian. That agreement refers to the governments, and art. 6 states how differences of opinion or conflict are to be dealt with. If they are of a technical and material order they are to be settled amicably between ONIC and Federazione, and, if an amicable agreement is not possible, the parties will accept arbitration, but any difference not foreseen is to be settled through diplomatic channels. The parties certainly had in mind the possibility that difficulties might arise, but they never gave attention to the question of the law applicable in the event of differences. The force of counsel's argument about "Paris" appearing on the charterparty is greatly weakened if the history leading up to it is looked at. I accept fully his submission that there is no complete and binding contract until one has the charterparty, but having regard to the correspondence which passed between Genoa and Paris, it is almost an accidental circumstance that the word "Paris" appears on the charterparty. I do not think that it plays the dominant part counsel claimed for it. This was his first point, that the law of the place of the contract, the lex loci contractus, governed the matter.

B Counsel for the charterers said further that, unless one found in one's examination of all the facts something to displace that primary presumption, the conclusion must be that the law of France should apply. As to those facts, he said that, while the charterparty was in English an important supplement was in French, and that the bills of lading were in French and the sentence which my Lord has emphasised was peculiarly French phraseology. He then raised a point which struck me as being of very great importance, that this was a contract made by a sovereign State, and it would be a strong thing to presume an intention that that sovereign State, when entering into a contract, would be content to be bound by a law other than its own, when it is clear that the charterers, as the agreed statement of facts says, on Oct. 7, 1949, in Paris agreed, in pursuance of their obligation, to make restitution under the exchange agreement. The people who were to make restitution were, of course, the French government. The Italians had sent over their wheat, and it was part of the bargain that the French government in their turn would make restitution without profit or without loss. But in the agreed statement of facts the words appear

E " . . . the [charterers], in pursuance of their obligation to make restitution under the said exchange agreement, entered into a charterparty ",

F and so on. Whatever the solution of that matter may be, certain words of LORD ATKIN in the International Trustee case seem to me to bear very strongly on this matter. After the passage which my Lord cited LORD ATKIN continued ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166):

G "The principle of law so stated applies equally to contracts to which a sovereign State is a party as to other contracts".

Then LORD ATKIN considered Smith v. Weguelin (11) and Goodwin v. Roberts (12), by which BRANSON, J., and the Court of Appeal had considered themselves bound on this very matter of the sovereign State and the law to be applied. I do not need to read it or to analyse it, but after discussing those cases at some H little length, LORD ATKIN continued (ibid., 167):

"It would appear, therefore, that these cases afford little authority for the proposition. In principle it must be ill-founded. It cannot be disputed that a government may expressly agree to be bound by a foreign law. It seems to me equally indisputable that, without any expressed intention, the inference that a government so intended may be necessarily inferred from the circumstances, as where a government enters into a contract in a foreign country for the purchase of land situate in that country in the terms appropriate only to the law of that country, or enters into a contract of affreightment with the owners of a foreign ship on the terms expressed in a foreign bill of lading, or employs in a foreign country foreign labour, in circumstances to which foreign labour laws would apply. It appears, therefore, that in every case, whether a government be a party or not, the general principle which determines the proper law of the contract is the same: it depends upon the intention of the parties either expressed in the contract or to be inferred from the terms of the contract and the surrounding circumstances, and, in the latter case, the inference may be drawn that the parties intended a foreign law to apply."

The circumstance that a government is a party is entitled to great weight in drawing the proper inference, but it is not conclusive, and it is only one factor in solving the problem. So, even if the charterers, whatever be the true answer, were agents acting for a sovereign State, I think the principle of law laid down by LORD ATKIN is applicable, and the fact that one of the parties is acting for a foreign State, though a factor of importance, is only a factor in considering the final decision to be made.

B

Counsel for the shipowners first attacked the weight of the facts set up by the charterers, and then he raised facts of his own, which, he said, pointed to Italian law as being presumed to be intended by the parties. He relied first on the fact that this ship, the Assunzione, was a bona fide Italian ship. It had an Italian master, and, although there was no real evidence about it, it was said presumably it had an Italian crew. He put that in the forefront of the facts to be considered. Then he said (I did not think this had the weight of some of the other considerations) the contract was to carry French goods from a French port to an Italian port, and to discharge the goods at the Italian port. The Italian ship carrying French goods under this contract of affreightment naturally loaded the goods in France, and naturally discharged them in Italy.

He then said (and I respectfully agree with my Lord that this is a factor of importance) that the charterparty provided that the freight and the demurrage charges (if any) should be paid in Italy at Naples, and my Lord read cl. 16 of the supplementary clauses of the charterparty. These clauses did not form part of the standard form Gencon. Moreover, the charterparty itself provided:

" . . . and there deliver the cargo on being paid freight—on intaken quantity—as follows: 1,980 Italian lire per metric ton if west coast Italy, 2,205 Italian lire per metric ton if Adriatic coast Italy."

The charterparty itself laid down Italian money as the means of paying for the freight, and my Lord has already referred to the fact that cls. 5, 6 and 7 of the charterparty have some bearing on that matter, cl. 5 dealing with the question of loading, cl. 6 with the discharge of the cargo and cl. 7 with demurrage, while cl. 8 was the lien clause.

F

Then counsel for the shipowners, in answer to the submission of counsel for the charterers based on the fact that the charterparty bore the words "Paris, Oct. 7, 1949"—and the supplementary clauses, being added to the charterparty for the s.s. Assunzione dated Paris, Oct. 7, 1949, must be read in the same way—points out that those words appear in such circumstances that the ordinary presumption, which might in proper circumstances arise really does not arise in the light of the history of the negotiations which led up to the signing of the charterparty. He said further that, though the bills of lading were indorsed by the Italian holders before being presented to the ship, that must reasonably have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the signing of the charterparty. That met with the severest condemnation by counsel for the charterers, who said it was quite inconceivable, in the circumstances, that any such thought would be in the minds of the people preparing this contract.

H

Perhaps I have said enough to show that there were many facts and surrounding circumstances, some pointing in one direction and some in the other. Counsel for the charterers said that the governing factor is always the lex loci contractus, shown in the words "Paris, Oct. 7, 1949", and there being nothing to disturb the primary inference, the answer ought to be that French law applies. Counsel for the shipowners said there is an Italian ship, with an Italian master, payment in Italian money, and the prospect of disputes arising being settled in Italy, or fought in Italy, and, therefore, the conclusion ought to be in favour of the law of the flag—Italian.

In this case of many facts, and conflicting inferences, the duty of the court is to examine all those facts and arrive at the presumed intention of the parties. It is said that if the facts are evenly balanced, so that those on one side really cancel out those on the other, the law of the flag should be applied, and counsel for the shipowners even said: "They are evenly poised". But counsel for the charterers persisted that one must start with the presumption of lex loci contractus and then do the balancing to see if that primary presumption is displaced. I think on balance that the indication is that Italian law must reasonably be supposed to have been in the minds of the parties if they had ever considered the matter.

I have been confronted from the very beginning of this case with a sense of unreality. If, as in this case (and as, I rather gather, in the majority of cases), no thought whatever has been given to the law by which the contract is to be governed—and certainly there is no indication here that the parties ever considered it; there is no clause in the charterparty dealing with it—a court requiring to determine what it would have been if it had been considered may be met with counsel for the charterers saying with great force: "I cannot conceive the charterers agreeing to Italian law in any circumstances", and counsel for the shipowners saying with equal force: "I cannot conceive the shipowners every accepting French law". In the face of that the court has to examine the facts, to consider what inference or presumption arises from those facts, and then, regarding the parties as just and reasonable people, to say what is the reasonable inference to be drawn and what was the probable intention of the parties. Although I differ in some small matters from the judgment of WILLMER, J., which are immaterial for this purpose, on the whole I think that that judgment ought to be affirmed.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree with the conclusion of the learned judge that the proper law of the contract to be applied in this case is Italian law, having regard to the terms of the contract and the relevant circumstances. The facts of the case are contained in an agreed statement of facts and in a number of documents attached to it, and the learned judge, having considered those facts, based himself on certain salient matters, putting in the forefront that the ship in question was a genuine Italian ship in the full sense of the word, that she was engaged in pursuance of a charterparty on a voyage to an Italian port, and that by the charterparty freight and demurrage, if any, had to be paid in Italy and in Italian lire; and he relied on the facts that, on the arrival of the ship at Venice, there was a likelihood that the bills of lading would be presented by Italian holders, which, indeed, was what happened; that any claims likely to arise would probably be claims by Italian holders of the bills of lading against the Italian ship, and that Italy was the place in which the owners could be found if the ship could not be arrested, so that Italy was the place where the owners could be sued.

The charterers have criticised the judgment, not only because the learned judge treated as negative such inference as ought to be drawn from the place where the contract was made, namely, France, but also because he left out of account the exchange agreement which had been entered into by a department of the French government and a department of the Italian government preceding the charterparty. I think the learned judge was right in excluding the exchange agreement from consideration in the construction of this contract on the ground which he stated, namely, that, in order to arrive at the mutual intention of the parties to a contract it was not legitimate to look at a matter which was outside the knowledge of both parties and only within the knowledge of one, it being common ground that the shipowners were unaware of the exchange agreement.

Counsel for the charters has complained that the learned judge wrongly took into account the rights of third parties, namely, the holders of the bills of lading. In my judgment, the learned judge was right on that for a reason which applies, perhaps, only to this particular case, namely, that it was contended by both parties that, according to continental law, either French or Italian, the contract in this case was not contained in the one document, namely, the charter-party, as it would be under English law, but was, for the purpose of either law, enshrined also in the bills of lading. That being the case, it is surely legitimate to look at what is likely to happen to the bills of lading as being in the contemplation of the parties, and putting out of mind the provisions of the exchange agreement (as I think one is bound to do) I take the view that it must have been contemplated that the bills of lading would be presented to the ship by some Italian organisation on her arrival in Italy. In my judgment, the learned judge did not leave out of account anything he ought to have taken into account, or take into account any matter which he should not have taken into account in arriving at his conclusion. A

Battle was joined here on a familiar academic field, one party contending for the lex loci contractus, namely, France, and the other party contending for the law of the flag, which was Italian. The learned judge felt himself able to come to his conclusion without reliance on any presumption raised by either side. On the one hand, he rejected the argument of the charterers that the place where the contract was entered into promotes a primary inference. On the other hand, as to the presumption said to be raised by the law of the flag, he said: B

“ . . . I doubt whether it is possible to say in these days that the flag of the ship, or indeed the nationality of the ship, raises anything in the nature of a presumption. The authorities in support of any such proposition are old, and, as I have said, they are mostly concerned with cases arising from acts of the ship's master in a port of distress.” E

As to the rival contentions jointly the learned judge said:

“ It seems to me, therefore, that the ship's flag or nationality, and the place where the contract is made, are no more than circumstances which the court must take into consideration, together with all the other circumstances of the case, in order to arrive at the right inference as to what intention ought to be imputed to the parties.” F

The question has been argued fully before us, and I have come to the conclusion, as the authorities stand, that it is not right to treat the law of the flag in connection with contracts of affreightment as if it were obsolete. In R. v. International Trustee for Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft (8) the legal principles which are to guide an English court on the question of the proper law of the contract are set out by LORD ATKIN as follows ([1937] 2 All E.R. 166): G

“ In coming to its conclusion the court will be guided by rules which indicate that particular facts or conditions lead to a prima facie inference, in some cases an almost conclusive inference, as to the intention of the parties to apply a particular law, e.g., the country where the contract is made, the country where the contract is to be performed, if the contract relates to immovables the country where they are situate, the country under whose flag the ship sails in which goods are contracted to be carried.” H

Since every contract must be made in a place, the references to the country where the contract is to be performed, if the contract relates to immovables to the country where they are situate, and to the country under whose flag the ship sails in which goods are contracted to be carried, would appear to me to indicate that, in the opinion of LORD ATKIN, these are exceptions to the general law of contract, that the lex loci contractus ought to prevail. In my judgment, this understanding of LORD ATKIN's speech is consistent with the authorities. In Lloyd v. Guibert (2) WILLES, J., laid down the rule as to the law of the flag in no uncertain terms. It is unnecessary for me to read again the well-known passage (L.R. 1 Q.B. 129), but WILLES, J., was purporting to lay down a rule, and he pointed out (ibid., 123) that the intention is to be inferred from the subject-matter and from the surrounding circumstances so far as they are relevant to construe and determine the character of the contract. He went on to say (ibid.):

A "The present question does not appear to have ever been decided in this country",

That question is the question now under consideration, and further (ibid., 128):

C "The cases which we have thus put are not extreme nor exceptional; on the contrary, they are such as would ordinarily give rise to the question, which law is to prevail? The inconvenience and even absurdities which would follow from adopting the law of the place of contract in preference to that of the vessel, are strong to prove that the latter ought to be resorted to."

A little further on WILLES, J., set out the rule which he sought to lay down in full. No qualification is made to the rule, which is said to be based on convenience, perhaps because on a round voyage, where cargo is being picked up at various ports and a contract may spring up at a number of places, the law of the flag which the ship wears is more obviously appropriate than any other. Counsel for the charterers sought to deal with the authority of Lloyd v. Guibert (2) in two ways. First, he said, it was one of those cases which arise out of the acts of the master when the ship is in distress, and the law of the flag admittedly applies where the master is authorised to deal with the cargo and ship in the interests of one or both, but in other cases the rule has no application. I do not think the consequences of the decision in Lloyd v. Guibert (2) can be avoided in that way. It is quite true as part of the history of the case that there was such an incident. The master had entered into a bottomry bond, but the actual decision in the case was given on a contract of affreightment and had nothing to do with the agency or necessity of the master, and I cannot take such a limited view of the decision in Lloyd v. Guibert (2), nor, indeed, do I think it has been so treated in later authorities.

F Secondly, counsel for the charterers, as part of his argument, relied on a dictum of LINDLEY, L.J., in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (3), which was read in full by my Lord (10 Q.B.D. 540):

G "The lex loci contractus was here English and ought to prevail unless there is some good ground to the contrary"

H That is strongly relied on, and, taken out of its context, does, at first sight, seem to be inconsistent with the rule laid down in Lloyd v. Guibert (2), but I do not think that that dictum ought to be treated as throwing any doubt on the validity of the rule. It is quite clear that LINDLEY, L.J., was not seeking to impugn the validity of the opinion expressed in Lloyd v. Guibert (2), a decision which was binding on the Court of Appeal then and is binding now. Moreover, as WILLMER, J., pointed out, in that case there was really not room for any other decision than that the ship in question, although wearing the Dutch flag, was in fact the property of an English company composed of English nationals, and there is nothing in the decision in that case which throws any doubt on the validity of the rule. It is only that dictum taken in isolation, especially by such a master of the law, that really lays any foundation for an attack on the rule. There was no reality about the Dutch nationality of the ship in that case, whereas in the case now under consideration the vessel was in all respects an Italian vessel and not merely a ship wearing the Italian flag. There is nothing, I think, in the judgments of the other members of the court, only one of whom, BRETT, L.J., delivered a separate judgment, which casts doubt on the existence of the rule.

Attention was drawn to Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Shand (1). I propose to say no more about it than this, that it was noted in Lloyd v. Guibert (2), and not regarded by WILLES, J., as an authority, or even a persuasive authority, which prevented him from laying down the rule which he did. Moreover, it was a case in which the law of the flag was applied as well as the law of the place of the contract, and, indeed, I confess it does seem to me as if it should be treated as if it did not deal with a contract of affreightment at all.

SCRUTTON, L.J., in his book on "CHARTERPARTIES" 15th ed., p. 1, defines a contract of affreightment as follows:

"When a shipowner, or person having for the time being as against the shipowner the right to make such an agreement, agrees to carry goods by water, or to furnish a ship for the purpose of so carrying goods, in return for a sum of money to be paid to him, such a contract is called a contract of affreightment and the sum to be paid is called freight."

It seems a little strange, in the light of this definition, to regard the contract which a passenger enters into with a company for the carriage of his luggage as a contract of affreightment. The same view of the matter seems to have been taken by PROFESSOR DICEY, who included in his CONFLICT OF LAWS a separate rule, which now appears as r. 148, dealing with a contract for the carriage of persons or goods from a place in one country to a place in another, which is presumably governed by the law of the place where it is made. That is how the rule stood originally, but the editors of the recent edition have added the words:

"but this does not apply to contracts of affreightment", drawing a distinction between such cases as the Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Shand (1) and ordinary contracts of affreightment.

Other decisions of the Court of Appeal, namely, Re Missouri S.S. Co. (4) and The Industrie (5), were relied on, but neither of those cases casts doubt on the existence of the rule in Lloyd v. Guibert (2) as such, and in the former case LORD HALSBURY, L.C., used language which tends to support it, and which, indeed, is relied on by the shipowners in this case. He said (42 Ch.D. 336):

"Now this is a contract for the conveyance of cattle from Boston to England by sea on board a British ship by a British company whose domicile is in England."

In that case at first instance CHITTY, J., based himself on the law of the flag, the contract having been made in Massachusetts and the ship being an English ship, and the Court of Appeal unanimously upheld his decision, although they did not in terms refer to the law of the flag. They said nothing to indicate that CHITTY, J., was wrong, and, as I have already remarked, the Lord Chancellor, who delivered the leading judgment, put in the forefront the passage which I have quoted. COTTON, L.J., ended his judgment by saying (ibid., 340):

"In my opinion the judgment of CHITTY, J., was right, and the appeal fails."

FRY, L.J., said (ibid., 341):

"Now, in the first place, the ship was an English ship"

No doubt there are dicta in this case which can be used by counsel for the charterers to support his contention that the law of the place, lex loci contractus, prevailed; but, as I have said, I see nothing in that case, as I read it, to weaken my belief that the rule which is under discussion still exists.

As far as The Industrie (5) is concerned, the same comment applies. LORD ESHER, M.R., after discussing the circumstances in which a foreign contract is brought before an English court, and the duty of the court in those circumstances, said with regard to the contract in that case ([1894] P. 72):

A “It is a contract made for the carriage of goods on board a German ship. Is that conclusive to show that it is to be construed according to German canons of construction? It seems to me that that is not conclusive, and that you must look at a great many more circumstances to see what is the canon to be applied.”

B That seems to me to be the result of all the authorities, and that paragraph certainly does nothing to destroy the view that the fact that the goods were to be carried on a German ship raised a presumption, not a conclusive presumption, but one which could be rebutted, and was, indeed, held to be rebutted in that case. At first instance GORELL BARNES, J., had applied the law of the flag, the ship being a German ship. He held that German law applied, but the Court of Appeal arrived at a different conclusion, having given great weight to a particular circumstance which differentiates The Industrie (5) from this case. In many respects The Industrie (5) was like this case, but it was unlike this case in one significant respect. The contract was not only made in London; it was also negotiated in London between the English brokers authorised by the German owners, and the defendants, the shippers, who were English merchants. The contrast with this case is that here, although the contract was made in France, it was negotiated at the one end in Italy, and at the other end in France. There seems, accordingly, to be a very marked distinction on the facts between the two cases.

D The next case, The Adriatic (9), a decision of LANGTON, J., is, I think, of considerable interest. LANGTON, J. ([1931] P. 246), cited from PROFESSOR DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 4th ed., p. 644, r. 166b:

E “Subject to the exception hereinafter mentioned, the effect and incidents of a contract of affreightment (i.e., a contract with a shipowner to hire his ship, or part of it, for the carriage of goods) are governed by the law of the flag. Provided that the contract will not be governed by the law of the flag if, from the terms or objects of the contract, or from the circumstances under which it was made, the inference can be drawn that the parties did not intend the law of the flag to apply.”

G “Now that is a statement as to a presumption that the law of the flag will apply unless the evidence shows that the parties intended something else . . . That, I think, states the presumption of law as accurately as it can be stated, and what I have to determine here is whether in all the circumstances (and I am entitled and indeed bound to look at all the surrounding circumstances) there is evidence to show that the intention of the parties was to displace that prima facie presumption.”

H Attention has been drawn to the rule as it now stands (it has been altered) in which the emphasis has been shifted, but which is to the same effect. That rule follows preceding rules dealing with other contracts of a special nature as exceptions to the general rule of contract, the general rule being that the law of the place where the contract is made prevails.

The other case, a modern case, to which reference has been made, was The Njegos (10), a decision of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in which he also clearly recognised the existence of that rule. After referring to The Industrie (5) he said ([1936] P. 106, 107):

“LORD ESHER's judgment in this last case seems to me to be particularly valuable as showing what are the real limits of the presumption in favour of the law of the flag in connection with a contract of affreightment. It seems quite plain that, in connection with such contracts as the master may be driven to make by necessity in the course of the voyage, the law of the flag should prevail, for it is that law which governs his relations with his owners; but that, as is pointed out by LORD ESHER, is by no means inconsistent with the proper law of the contract of affreightment being a different law. In my opinion all these cases show very clearly that, as regards the contract of affreightment as a whole, there is no necessary presumption that the law of the flag applies."

I emphasise the word "necessary", for in no way did the President deny the existence of the presumption. He noticed the necessity of applying the rule in cases where ships were in distress, and considered that there was a lesser weight to be attached to it in other cases.

With regard to The Adriatic (9) and The Njegos (10), I would add that both judges used expressions which have been commented on in this case. LANGTON, J., referred to convenience ([1931] P. 251, 253), and SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., to business efficacy ([1936] P. 107), which seems to me to amount to very much the same thing, and it was suggested that this was a new departure and something which could not be justified on the authorities. In my opinion, this is not so, and the doctrine of convenience as a guide and help in these matters traces back to Lloyd v. Guibert (2) itself (L.R. 1 Q.B. 129), which is the fount of so much discussion and learning on this subject.

In my judgment, the position is that the rule or presumption must, indeed, often be of little importance in the decision of cases, because the court addresses itself, and always must, to the presumed intention of the parties to the contract, and will act on the evidence before it and will naturally be loath to depend on presumptions which necessarily vary in weight, some being more easily overcome than others. This is not, however, to say that a particular rule or particular presumption has ceased to exist, and, in my opinion, the presumption contended for by the shipowners is available to them, if only as a last resort, when the evidence is so evenly balanced that the court cannot otherwise reach a fair and just conclusion. For these reasons, therefore, in addition to those given by the learned judge and my Lords, I think WILLMER, J.'s conclusion was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. WILSONS (DUNBLANE), LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon*, Lord Reid, Lord Normand, Lord MacDermott and Lord Keith of Avonholm), November 9, 10, 1953, January 25, 1954.]

A Income Tax—Wear and tear—Machinery and plant—Sale by person having control over buyer—Sale at open market price—Application of limit of re-charge—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 59 (2), s. 59 (3) (b).

For some thirty years prior to 1944 W. carried on a business of wool spinner as sole proprietor. On Nov. 16, 1944, he took his two sons into partnership, bringing into the partnership at the same time the whole

B assets of the business, including the machinery and plant. At Nov. 15, 1944, in the balance sheet of W.'s business, the machinery and plant appeared at a written-down figure of £8,000, and this formed a starting figure in the partnership's books for machinery and plant for the partnership year commencing Nov. 16, 1944. On Nov. 16, 1945, the respondent company took over the business of the partnership, the whole of the issued shares of the

C company being allotted to the former partners. The assets of the partnership were bought by the respondent company in accordance with an agreement of sale under which the price paid for machinery and plant was £17,554, which was the price the machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market on that date. On their assessments to income tax made on them under the Income Tax Act, 1918, Case I of sched. D, for the years

D 1946-47 to 1950-51 the respondent company claimed that the wear and tear allowances for the machinery and plant subsequent to Apr. 6, 1946 (the "appointed day" for the Income Tax Act, 1945), should be made on the cost to it of £17,554 paid for the machinery and plant. The Crown contended that these allowances should be made on the figure of £8,000, the cost to the partnership of the machinery and plant at the date of the sale, which became the "limit of re-charge" under s. 59 (3) (b) of the Act of 1945.

E HELD: section 59 (3) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, directed the substitution of the limit of re-charge for the open market price in the concluding and operative part of s. 59 (2) only; s. 59 (2) only applied if the condition "where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market" was satisfied,

F and s. 59 (3) (b) only applied if the condition "if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller" was satisfied; the proper application of s. 59 (3) (b) was limited to cases where both these conditions had been satisfied and here only the second condition was satisfied; and, therefore, s. 59 was inapplicable as the facts of the case took it outside the opening words of

G s. 59 (2) and the appeal must fail.

* VISCOUNT SIMON died on Jan. 11, 1954. LORD NORMAND delivered as his own the opinion which LORD SIMON had written in the present case: see p. 305 post.

APPEAL by the Crown from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session sitting as the Court of Exchequer, dated June 25, 1952, made on a Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners held that the Income Tax Act, 1945, s. 59 (3) (b), modified the provisions of s. 59 (2) so as to make it apply to the circumstances of the case and that the wear and tear allowances should be computed with reference to the sum of £8,000 which was the cost to the seller, i.e., the partnership, of the machinery and plant, and was defined as being the amount of the limit of re-charge. The First Division of the Court of Session held that s. 59 of the Act of 1945 did not apply to the case since the machinery and plant were not sold to the respondent company at a price "other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market", and that, consequently, the wear and tear allowances for the years in question should be calculated on the sum of £17,554, the price which the machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (W. R. Milligan, Q.C.), Sir Reginald Hills and W. R. Grieve (of the Scottish Bar) for the Crown.

R. P. Morison, Q.C., and D. J. Watson, Q.C. (both of the Scottish Bar), for the respondent company.

The House took time for consideration.

Jan. 25. The following opinions were read.

LORD REID: My Lords, during the hearing by the Appellate Committee of this case and Sneddon v. Lord Advocate (ante, p. 255) VISCOUNT SIMON took the chair. It would be presumption on my part to seek to add to the tributes so recently paid to him in this House, but I may, perhaps, be permitted to put on record our gratitude for his wise leadership in our discussions and our deep regret that he is not here to express the views which he had formed in each of these cases before his last illness. I desire further to express on behalf of all Scots lawyers our acknowledgement of the debt which Scots law owes to him for the many contributions which he has made in this House to the clarification and development of our law.

My Lords, after carrying on the business of wool spinning for many years, Mr. A. B. Wilson in 1944 took his two sons into partnership and brought into the partnership the whole assets of the business at the figures which then appeared in his accounts. The machinery and plant stood in his balance sheet at a written-down value of £8,000. On Nov. 16, 1945, the partners formed the respondent company to take over the business, all the shares being allotted to the partners. The company bought the machinery and plant for £17,554. It has been found by the Special Commissioners that this was the price which they would have fetched if sold in the open market at that date. The question in this case is whether allowances in respect of wear and tear of that machinery and plant from 1946 onwards should be calculated with reference to the sum of £8,000 or the sum of £17,554. It is admitted that before the Income Tax Act, 1945, came into operation the proper basis was the cost to the company, £17,554.

The Income Tax Act, 1945, contained a new and elaborate scheme for determining allowances: obviously this was designed at least in part to meet the situation at the end of the war when prices had risen steeply and new equipment was scarce. The Act covered other types of equipment besides machinery and plant, and various initial allowances, annual allowances, balancing allowances, and balancing charges were introduced: one difference between machinery and plant and other equipment is that allowances for other equipment are, in general, based on cost of construction, whereas allowances for machinery and plant are based on its cost to the trader seeking the allowances. In the case of a trader buying second-hand machinery or plant, the cost to him might far exceed the original cost of construction. In that case, he would get allowances much greater than those available to the trader who sold the plant or machinery to him. It was plain that this might possibly lead to arrangements between traders whereby machinery or plant changed hands in order to get increased allowances at the expense of the revenue, and s. 59 of the Act prevents this result in certain cases.

Section 59 (as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 58 (2)), so far as relevant to this case, is as follows:

- A " (1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in relation to sales of any property where either—(a) the buyer is a body of persons over whom the seller has control, or the seller is a body of persons over whom the buyer has control, or both the seller and the buyer are bodies of persons and some other person has control over both of them; or (b) it appears with B respect to the sale or with respect to transactions of which the sale is one, that the sole or main benefit which, apart from the provisions of this section, might have been expected to accrue to the parties or any of them was the obtaining of an allowance or deduction under any of the following enactments, that is to say, any of the provisions of this Act or of r. 6 or r. 7 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D or of s. 19 of the Finance C Act, 1941, or of Part IV of the Finance Act, 1944. References in this sub-section to a body of persons include references to a partnership.
(2) Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market, then, subject to the succeeding provisions of this section, the like consequences shall ensue for the purposes of the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section other than the said s. 19, D in their application to the income tax of all persons concerned, as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the price which it would have fetched if sold in the open market. (3) Where the sale is a sale of machinery or plant—(a) no initial allowance shall be made to the buyer; and (b) subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller, the last preceding sub-section shall have E effect as if for the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market there were substituted a reference to the said limit of re-charge: Provided that this sub-section shall not apply in relation to a sale of machinery or plant which has never been used if the business or part of the business of the seller was the manufacture or supply of machinery or plant of that class and the sale was effected in the ordinary F course of the seller's business; Provided also that where the sale is one to which para. (a) of sub-s. (1) of this section applies and took place before the appointed day, and the seller acquired the machinery or plant on or after Apr. 6, 1944, para. (a) of this sub-section shall not apply. In this sub-section the expression ' the limit of re-charge ' means, in relation to a person who G sells machinery or plant—(i) if he provided that machinery or plant for himself before the appointed day, the actual cost to him of the machinery or plant, including in that actual cost any expenditure in the nature of capital expenditure on machinery or plant by way of renewal, improvement or reinstatement; (ii) if he provided the machinery or plant for himself on or after the appointed day, the expenditure incurred by him on the provision thereof."

- H This section only applies where either there was an ulterior object behind the sale (sub-s. (1) (b)) or the buyer and seller were not independent (sub-s. (1) (a)).
There is no suggestion in this case of any ulterior object, but the fact that the partners controlled the respondent company which bought from them admittedly brings the case within sub-s. (1) (a) and so brings the rest of the section into operation. Sub-section (4) has no application to this case: the question at issue turns on the proper interpretation of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3).

Sub-section (2) applies to sales of all kinds of equipment dealt with in the Act, but sub-s. (3) only applies to sales of machinery or plant. The only part of sub-s. (3) which directly affects this case is sub-s. (3) (b), which provides that, if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market (in this case £17,554) is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller (in this case £8,000), sub-s. (2) is to have effect subject to a certain modification set out in the latter part of sub-s. (3) (b). In order to discover the meaning of this latter part of sub-s. (3) (b) it is necessary to examine closely both the terms of sub-s. (2) and the terms of sub-s. (3) (b). I think it helpful to begin by noting the structure of sub-s. (2). It begins by stating a condition which must be satisfied before the sub-section can have any operative effect—the property must have been sold at a price other than the market price. If that condition is satisfied “then subject to the succeeding provisions” of the section certain consequences are to ensue. That structure, in my view, indicates that the initial condition must first be satisfied in every case and that only then are the “succeeding provisions” to be looked at: if they do not apply, then the consequences set out in sub-s. (2) itself will follow, but if any of the succeeding provisions apply, then the consequences enacted by that provision will apply instead of the consequences enacted in sub-s. (2). The modification of sub-s. (2) which is directed by sub-s. (3) is that the former sub-section is to “ . . . have effect as if for the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market there were substituted a reference to the said limit of re-charge.”

I turn to look for the reference to that price in sub-s. (2) and I find at the end of sub-s. (2) a clear reference to that price, and at the beginning of sub-s. (2) words which might or might not be interpreted as a reference to that price. Neither the words at the beginning of sub-s. (2) nor the words at the end of it correspond exactly with the words in sub-s. (3). The words in sub-s. (3) (b) are “the price which the property would have fetched . . .”, those at the end of sub-s. (2) are “the price which it would have fetched . . .”, and the words at the beginning of sub-s. (2) are “that which it would have fetched . . .”. But the words “it” and “that” in these contexts plainly represent “the property” and “the price” respectively, and I cannot regard these changes as of any importance. The difficulty about the first reference in sub-s. (2) is of a different character. What is there being denoted is and it is, I think, a nice question whether a statement about a price other than X should be held to be a reference to X. The answer may depend on the context.

In sub-s. (3) (b) the words used are not “as if for any reference to the price”, or “as if for references to the price”, but are “as if for the reference to the price . . .” in the singular. When the draftsman of this section intended to refer to “references” in the plural he did so: at the end of sub-s. (1) I find

“references in this sub-section to a body of persons include references to a partnership.”

So the change from the plural in sub-s. (1) to the singular in sub-s. (3) (b) must be taken to have been deliberate and, therefore, significant.

It is plain and not disputed that sub-s. (3) (b) directs the substitution of the limit of re-charge in one place—in the latter part of sub-s. (2). The question in this case is whether it also directs that substitution in another place—in the initial condition of sub-s. (2). If it does, it is agreed that the application of sub-s. (2), so altered, reduces the sum on which the respondent company is entitled to allowances for wear and tear to £8,000 and the appeal succeeds. But if it does not, then, as the price paid by the company was the price which the machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market and not “a price other than " that price, the condition for the application of sub-s. (2) is not satisfied, the price paid by the company stands, and the appeal fails. If the opinions which I have already expressed are correct, there are two strong indications that sub-s. (3) (b) only directs the substitution of the limit of re-charge in one place—in the latter part of sub-s. (2). These are the use of the singular " the reference " in sub-s. (3) (b) and the structure of sub-s. (2). And there is no real difficulty in holding that the phrase

" a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market " is not a reference to

" the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market."

Therefore, simply taking the words which Parliament has used in s. 59, the appeal must fail.

But the appellants found on more general considerations to show that the respondents' interpretation leads to results which are quite unreasonable and contrary to the general policy of the Act. I doubt whether s. 59 is sufficiently ambiguous to make it right to take account of such matters, but I need not decide that because I cannot accept this argument on its merits. The argument in what seems to me its most attractive form is this. Sub-section (3) in its unaltered form directs that, if property is not sold at the market price, consequences shall ensue as if it had been sold at the market price. If the respondents are right, sub-s. (2) in its altered form will direct that, if property is not sold at the market price, consequences shall ensue as if it had been sold for the amount of the limit of re-charge. This is an unreasonable provision and the only reasonable provision would be that if property is not sold at the amount of the limit of re-charge then consequences shall ensue as if it had been sold at that amount. This is the appellant's interpretation: the words of the section make it possible to adopt it and it should be adopted. I reject the argument because the result of the respondents' interpretation does not seem to me to be absurd or wholly inexplicable. When buyer and seller are at arm's length, the purchase price which they agree to stands as the basis for allowances and that purchase price will normally be the market price. When buyer and seller are not at arm's length, the sale is suspect, and s. 59 rejects the agreed purchase price, perhaps because it is likely to be something different from the market price. If that is so, it would not be altogether unreasonable to say that, although the sale is of the suspect class, yet, if it is in fact made at the market price, it shall be treated as a genuine sale. I am far from saying that that was in fact the intention: we are not concerned with intention except in so far as it can be deduced from the words of the Act. The argument I am dealing with is that the altered form of sub-s. (2) as the respondents would have it is so unreasonable that any possible alternative should be preferred, and it is enough to meet that argument to show that it is not impossible to suppose that it could have been intended.

G

I, therefore, move that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, before LORD SIMON's lamented death I had intimated to him that I would concur with an opinion prepared and finally revised by him in this appeal. In these circumstances, I am to deliver his opinion as my own. I shall thus have the privilege of preserving his judgment on one of the last Scottish appeals heard by him. Before I read it, I may be allowed to associate myself with the words of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack about LORD SIMON. It is, indeed, true that Scottish lawyers share with their English brethren the grievous sense of loss that his death has brought to all of us. Here, then, is his opinion which I adopt as my own.

H

The Income Tax Act, 1945, provided for a series of "allowances" which could be claimed from the revenue authorities and enjoyed by taxpayers owning certain property (including machinery and plant) used in their business. These provisions were obviously intended to assist or give encouragement to trade after the war, and came into force on an "appointed day", which was Apr. 6, 1946. These allowances were not deductions to arrive at assessable income, such as could be subtracted from gross income, but were treated separately, and operated to reduce the taxpayer's liability to tax until the relief they gave from tax on the allowances was completely enjoyed. Thus, if assessable income in a given tax year was £5,000 and the allowances amounted to £2,000, income tax fell to be paid on £3,000. But if assessable income for the year was less than £2,000, while there would be no income tax to pay in that year, the balance of the allowance remained available to be used to reduce tax in a future year.

The statute provides for "initial allowances", "annual allowances", "balancing allowances", and "balancing charges", the last-named operating to increase the total tax due above the tax on assessable income. This might arise, for example, if the value of second-hand plant rose and it was sold at a figure above the price paid for it when it was new, or above the price to which it had been written down by wear and tear allowances made by the revenue authorities for the purposes of income tax. In such a case, the sum total of such allowances would manifestly be more than was justified. To take figures: if an item of plant cost £1,000 and sufficient annual allowances for depreciation had been given by the tax authorities to reduce the balance of cost to nil, and if the plant were then sold at a figure equal to, or in excess of, its original cost, the seller would have to bear a "balancing charge" which would result in his paying tax on the £1,000. If, however, the allowances had only amounted in all to £600, the balancing charge would be £600 and tax would be borne on this figure.

The question of law to be decided in the present appeal arises on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners sitting in Edinburgh. It is a question of construction of s. 59 (3) (b) of the Act—a question easy to state, but involving a close reading of the words to answer. The appeal is against the interlocutor of the Court of Session which reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners in favour of the Crown.

"(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in relation to sales of any property where either—(a) the buyer is a body of persons over whom the seller has control, or the seller is a body of persons over whom the buyer has control, or both the seller and the buyer are bodies of persons and some other person has control over both of them; or (b) it appears with respect to the sale or with respect to transactions of which the sale is one, that the sole or main benefit which, apart from the provisions of this section, might have been expected to accrue to the parties or any of them was the obtaining of an allowance or deduction under any of the following enactments, that is to say, any of the provisions of this Act or of r. 6 or r. 7 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D or of s. 19 of the Finance Act, 1941, or of Part IV of the Finance Act, 1944. References in this sub-section to a body of persons include references to a partnership. (2) Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market, then, subject to the succeeding provisions of this section, the like consequences shall ensue for the purposes of the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section other than the said s. 19, in their application to the income tax of all persons concerned, as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the price which it would have fetched if sold in the open market. (3) Where the sale is a sale of machinery or plant—(a) no initial allowance shall be made to the buyer; and (b) subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller, the last preceding sub-section shall have effect as if for the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market there were substituted a reference to the said limit of re-charge: Provided that this sub-section shall not apply in relation to a sale of machinery or plant which has never been used if the business or part of the business of the seller was the manufacture or supply of machinery or plant of that class and the sale was effected in the ordinary course of the seller's business; Provided also that where the sale is one to which para. (a) of sub-s. (1) of this section applies and took place before the appointed day, and the seller acquired the machinery or plant on or after Apr. 6, 1944, para. (a) of this sub-section shall not apply. In this sub-section the expression 'the limit of re-charge' means, in relation to a person who sells machinery or plant—(i) if he provided that machinery or plant for himself before the appointed day, the actual cost to him of the machinery or plant, including in that actual cost any expenditure in the nature of capital expenditure on machinery or plant by way of renewal, improvement or reinstatement; (ii) if he provided the machinery or plant for himself on or after the appointed day, the expenditure incurred by him on the provision thereof . . . (5) As respects r. 6 and r. 7 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, the provisions of this section shall have effect as respects tax for the year of assessment in which the appointed day falls and any subsequent year of assessment . . .”

The precise question is as to the proper interpretation and application of the words in sub-s. (3) (b).

The facts which give rise to this question are as follows. For some thirty years up to Nov. 15, 1944, the business now carried on by the respondent company had been conducted by Mr. Alexander B. Wilson as sole proprietor, trading as Alexander Wilson and Co. On Nov. 16, 1944, Mr. Alexander Wilson took his two sons into partnership, himself taking a one-half share and each son taking a one-quarter share in the profits. Mr. Alexander Wilson brought into the partnership firm on Nov. 16, 1944, the whole assets of the business, including the machinery and plant then belonging to him which had been acquired by him from time to time in the course of his business. These assets were taken into the accounts of the partnership firm at the figures at which they appeared in the accounts of Mr. Alexander Wilson immediately before the partnership firm acquired them. The aggregate figure for these assets was £28,764 15s. 8d. At Nov. 15, 1944, in the balance sheet of Mr. Alexander Wilson's business, the machinery and plant appeared at a written-down figure of £8,000, and this formed a starting figure in the firm's books for machinery and plant for the partnership year commencing on Nov. 16, 1944. Following the transfer of Mr. Alexander Wilson's business to the partnership, application was made under s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, requiring that the tax payable for all years of assessment should be computed as if the trade carried on by Mr. Alexander Wilson had been discontinued at Nov. 16, 1944, and a new trade had then been set up or commenced. The assessments on Mr. Alexander Wilson down to Nov. 15, 1944, and those on the partnership from Nov. 16, 1944, were respectively dealt with under the "cessation" and "new business" provisions of the Income Tax Acts. On Nov. 16, 1945, the business of the partnership was transferred to the respondent company, which had been incorporated for this purpose on Oct. 4, 1945, the whole of the issued shares of the company being allotted to the former partners in the proportion of fifty per cent. to Mr. Alexander Wilson and twenty-five per cent. to each of his sons. The assets of the partnership as at Nov. 16, 1945, were bought by the respondent company in accordance with an agreement of sale, under which the price paid for machinery and plant was £17,554. This was the price which the machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market on that date. The buyer, i.e., the respondent company, was a body of persons over whom the seller, i.e., the partnership, had control, and, therefore, s. 59 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, could apply in relation to the sale. The actual question, however, now to be decided between the parties is whether sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) of s. 59 can, on a sound construction, be held to apply to the circumstances of this case. The commissioners held that they could so apply. The Court of Session held that they could not. If the commissioners' view were right, the annual allowance would be calculated on a figure of £8,000: if the Court of Session is right, the calculation would be on a figure of £17,554.

It will be seen that the expression "the limit of re-charge" is defined as meaning, in relation to a person who sells machinery or plant, if he provided it for himself before the appointed day (which is this case), the actual cost to him of the machinery and plant, plus expenditure on it in the nature of capital expenditure. The revenue authorities contend that the limit of re-charge was £8,000, but, even so, the application of sub-s. (3) (b) to sub-s. (2) is a question of some nicety.

Sub-section (3) (b) directs us to look at sub-s. (2) to find in it

"the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market" and to substitute a reference to the limit of re-charge. Where, then, do we find, in sub-s. (2), a reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market? There is plainly a reference to this price in the concluding words of sub-s. (2), but counsel for the Crown contends that there is also a reference to this price in the opening words of sub-s. (2), and that the phrase in that sub-section, is such a reference. This amounts to saying that a reference to a figure which is greater or less than X is a reference to X. I do not think that this is so. Moreover, the direction in sub-s. (3) (b) is to search for "the reference" to the open market price which is to be found in the previous sub-section, and the inference from the language is that this is to be found in one place only in sub-s. (2) and not in two, for sub-s. (3) (b) speaks of "the reference", not of "any reference" or of "references". At the end of sub-s. (1) there is a contrasting phrase,

"Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market"

"References in this sub-section to a body of persons include references to a partnership", and in sub-s. (1) (a) there are no less than three references to "a body of persons".

There is a further consideration. When the structure of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) is considered, it is to be observed that sub-s. (2) lays down the condition that it applies

"where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market", and it is only if this condition, which I will call condition A, is satisfied that sub-s. (2) has any application at all. "Property" is not limited to plant and machinery, but would include buildings. Sub-section (3), on the other hand, is limited to the case where the sale is a sale of one kind of property, viz., "machinery or plant", and sub-s. (3) (b) can only have an application in this case. Moreover, sub-s. (3) (b) only applies if the price which the machinery or plant would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller. This I call condition B. It seems to me that the proper application of sub-s. (3) (b) is, therefore, limited to the case where both condition A and condition B are satisfied, and sub-s. (2) cannot have effect unless this is so. In the present case, condition B is satisfied, but condition A is not.

For the above reasons, I have come to the conclusion that the contention of the Crown fails and that the view taken by the Court of Session is right.

The statutory provisions under consideration, including the awkward and obscure modification of what is in sub-s. (2) by what is in sub-s. (3) (b) are copied into the consolidating Income Tax Act, 1952, without alteration (s. 327 and sched. IV). And so the problem of interpretation remains. But your Lordships are not engaged in framing income tax proposals. That is the task of the legislature. We, as a judicial tribunal, are concerned only with the proper interpretation and application of the language which Parliament has employed. If the result is unsatisfactory, it is for the legislature to correct it.

At that point the opinion prepared by LORD SIMON ends. I add only that I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of the other learned and noble Lords who took part in the hearing of the appeal, and that I agree with their reasoning as well as with their conclusion that the appeal fails.

LORD MACDERMOTT (read by LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM): My Lords, the question for determination is whether s. 59 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, applies to the computation of the wear and tear allowances of the respondent company in respect of certain plant and machinery for the fiscal years 1946-47 to 1950-51. This turns entirely on the true construction of sub-s. (2) (as amended) and sub-s. (3) of that section which, omitting what is not material, read thus:

"(2) Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market, then, subject to the succeeding provisions of this section, the like consequences shall ensue for the purposes of the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section other than the said s. 19, in their application to the income tax of all persons concerned, as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the price which it would have fetched if sold in the open market. (3) Where the sale is a sale of machinery or plant— . . . (b) . . . if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller, the last preceding sub-section shall have effect as if for the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market there were substituted a reference to the said limit of re-charge."

On the facts as found, the sale relevant to this appeal was the sale to the respondent company of machinery and plant, the price paid therefor was £17,554, and this was the price which the said machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market. The "limit of re-charge" mentioned in sub-s. (3) was, in the circumstances and according to the statutory definition of the term, the sum of £8,000, that being the actual cost to the sellers of the machinery and plant sold.

In the course of the debate three different ways of reading sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) of s. 59 were canvassed before your Lordships in relation to a sale of machinery and plant in which (as in this case) the open market price exceeds the limit of re-charge and the condition of para. (b) of sub-s. (3) is, therefore, satisfied. For brevity, I shall refer hereafter to these facts—that is to say, the fact that what was sold was machinery and plant and the fact that the open market price was more than the limit of re-charge—as "the relevant facts."

The substance and effect of these three constructions may be stated as follows:—Construction I. On the relevant facts, para. (b) of sub-s. (3) directs the application of sub-s. (2) after modification at two points, so that (i) its opening and conditional words are changed from

"Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched in the open market "

to

"Where the property is sold at a price other than the limit of re-charge ", and (ii) its concluding and operative words are changed from

"the like consequences shall ensue . . . as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the price which it would have fetched if sold in the open market ”

to

“ the like consequences shall ensue . . . as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the limit of re-charge ”.

This construction was placed by the appellants in the forefront of their case. If it is sound, the appeal succeeds, as s. 59 then applies to the annual wear and tear allowance of the respondent company, with £8,000, the limit of re-charge, and not £17,554, the sale price, as the amount by reference to which such allowance should be calculated.

Construction II. On the relevant facts, para. (b) of sub-s. (3) directs the application of sub-s. (2) after modification at one point only, namely, by substituting a reference to the limit of re-charge for the reference to the open market price in the concluding and operative part of that sub-section. This is the same as the second of the modifications required by construction I, the difference between these two constructions being that in construction II the opening and conditional words of sub-s. (2) remain unaltered. This construction was submitted on behalf of the respondent company and was upheld by the First Division. If it is sound, the appeal fails and s. 59 is inapplicable, as the facts then take the case outside the opening words of sub-s. (2).

Construction III. This construction was advanced by the appellants as an alternative to construction I. It accepted the view that the only modification worked by sub-s. (3) (b) in the text of sub-s. (2) was that of construction II, namely, the substitution of the limit of re-charge for the open market price in the operative and concluding part of sub-s. (2); but it added that, on the relevant facts, the words “ the last preceding sub-section shall have effect ”, in sub-s. (3) (b), were mandatory and amounted to a direction that sub-s. (2), as so modified, was to become operative regardless of the terms of its condition. On this interpretation the whole emphasis is placed on the expression “ shall have effect ”. The relevant facts having occurred, the operative part of sub-s. (2) is to come into force with a reference to the limit of re-charge inserted in lieu of the reference to the open market price. If this construction is sound, the appeal succeeds and £8,000 becomes the material “ starting ” figure instead of £17,554.

My Lords, these three constructions appear to cover the possibilities of the situation and it is now necessary to choose between them. I must confess that in this task I find no guidance in the general policy or intentment of the Income Tax Acts or in the scheme of the Act of 1945. This is not to say that guidance of this kind is never available in this particular legislative field. For example, if, of two possible constructions, one would impose a tax on income and the other a tax on capital, the golden rule that income tax is a tax on income and not on capital would supply a solution. But the complicated subject of allowances for wear and tear does not seem to present any certain aid of this nature, at all events as respects the present question. Here I find no current of legislative purpose capable of carrying the issue one way or the other. Nor is any one of the possible interpretations to be preferred on the ground that it, unlike the others, avoids some manifest absurdity, some palpable injustice, or some gross anomaly. Speculation is possible, but it leads nowhere. At the end of the day there remains, so far as I can discern, no good reason for asserting that any of the constructions enumerated would conflict with the general scheme and purpose of the legislation. In these circumstances, all one can do is to take the statute and see what it says according to the ordinary and everyday meaning of the language used.

Proceeding thus, my choice falls at once on construction II. More than the others it seems to me to reflect the natural meaning of sub-s. (3) (b). Given the relevant facts, what that paragraph says is that sub-s. (2) shall have effect as if for “ the reference ” to the open market price there were substituted “ a reference to the said limit of re-charge". Now that, with its use of "the reference" in the singular, appears to me to be an apt way of altering the concluding and operative part of sub-s. (2), but not of altering both that part and the opening and conditional part as well. And that aptness is, I think, emphasised by the way in which sub-s. (2) is drafted, for the expression "subject to the succeeding provisions of this section" which occurs therein qualifies only the concluding and operative part, and suggests that it, rather than the opening part, may be subject to later modification. Construction I, on the other hand, involves applying "the reference" to the open market price to both parts of sub-s. (2) and reading the words in the opening part of that sub-section as including a reference to the open market price. "Reference" is a comprehensive expression, and modifying enactments which operate, not by substituting one set of words for another set of words, but by substituting a reference to one subject-matter for a reference to another subject-matter, will not necessarily be ineffectual merely because of some descriptive variation, as a pronoun for a noun, the plural for the singular, or such as may be entailed by the use of shortened forms. I do not, therefore, say that construction I is bound to fail because the word "reference" is used in the singular in sub-s. (3) (b), or because the subject-matter of "open market price" cannot be spelt out of the wording of the opening part of sub-s. (2); what I hold is that, when every aspect is considered, this construction is markedly less apt and rests less easily on the language of the statute than construction II. Moreover, the position of the words "subject to the succeeding provisions of this section" in sub-s. (2) points as much against construction I as it points in favour of construction II. If construction I had been the intention of the legislature, I cannot but think that these words would have been found at the very beginning of that sub-section. Construction III must, in my opinion, also be rejected, though on somewhat different grounds. The words "shall have effect" do not appear to have a constant meaning when used in relation to statutory provisions. They may signify that the provision to which they relate is to apply and become operative, or they may be used to signify that, if and when it becomes applicable, it is to operate in a particular way. When used, as they are in sub-s. (3) (b), with respect to a conditional enactment, the latter seems to be the appropriate meaning. To read these words in that sub-section according to construction III would be to ignore the condition in sub-s. (2) altogether. I cannot believe that such a drastic treatment of the text was ever intended. To hold that it was would be to disregard completely a condition depending on the facts of the actual sale and to substitute a condition which related only to open market value and the limit of re-charge and had nothing to say to the price obtained on the sale with which s. 59 is primarily concerned.

"at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market"

For these reasons I am of opinion that the First Division was right and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM: My Lords, the respondents are entitled to allowances in respect of machinery and plant used by them in their business of wool spinners, under r. 6, as amended by subsequent legislation, of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The question raised in this appeal by the revenue is what is the figure on which these allowances are to be calculated. This depends on whether or not s. 59 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, in some of its provisions, applies to the circumstances in which the machinery and plant were acquired by the respondents. Section 59 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, is a section hedged round by conditions and qualifications. To bring the section into operation at all it is necessary that either sub-s. (1) (a) or sub-s. (1) (b) shall apply to the transaction in question here. It is common ground that sub-s. (1) (a) does apply. We are entitled thus to look at sub-ss. (2) and (3) of the section and see whether these sub-sections are applicable in the circumstances of the present case.

The material facts are that on Nov. 16, 1945, the respondents in the present appeal (whom I shall call "the company") took over from a partnership the business of wool spinners carried on by the partnership and the whole assets of the business. The assets included machinery and plant for which the price of £17,554 was paid, and this price, it is found, was the price which the machinery and plant would have fetched if sold in the open market on Nov. 16, 1945. The Income Tax Act, 1945, did not come into operation until the appointed day, which was later fixed as Apr. 6, 1946, and the present case is concerned with what are the proper allowances to be made to the company in respect of wear and tear of machinery and plant subsequent to the Act of 1945 coming into operation. The company says that the wear and tear allowances should be made on a cost to it of £17,554, paid for the machinery and plant. The revenue say that these allowances should be made on a figure of £8,000 which they say was the cost to the seller (the partnership) of the machinery and plant at the date of the sale and which, according to them, becomes "the limit of re-charge" as that phrase is defined in s. 59 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. The exact significance of this phrase will become clearer when I come to refer more particularly to the language of sub-s. (3).

To succeed in their appeal the revenue must show that s. 59 (3) can in some way be invoked as applicable to the circumstances of this case. It is conceded that sub-s. (2), taken by itself, cannot assist them. To make the position clear I quote sub-s. (2):

"Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market, then, subject to the succeeding provisions of this section, the like consequences shall ensue for the purposes of the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section . . . in their application to the income tax of all persons concerned, as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the price which it would have fetched if sold in the open market."

My Lords, I said at the outset that the provisions of s. 59 were hedged round with conditions. The condition in sub-s. (2) is that the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market. That is not this case, for it is agreed that the machinery and plant were sold at the open market price. Accordingly, it is recognised that sub-s. (2), by itself, does not help the revenue's case. But it is said the sub-section is substantially modified, and, as so modified, fits the present case by invocation of the language of sub-s. (3) (b). I quote sub-s. (3) (b) so far as relevant:

"Where the sale is a sale of machinery or plant— . . . (b) subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller, the last preceding sub-section shall have effect as if for the reference to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market there were substituted a reference to the said limit of re-charge: . . . In this sub-section the expression 'the limit of re-charge' means, in relation to a person who sells machinery or plant— (i) if he provided that machinery or plant for himself before the appointed day, the actual cost to him of the machinery or plant, including in that actual cost any expenditure in the nature of capital expenditure on machinery or plant by way of renewal, improvement or reinstatement . . ."

Counsel for the appellants submitted two separate and, I think, mutually exclusive arguments as to the effect of this provision. First, by a process of substitution of words from sub-s. (3) (b) he sought to read sub-s. (2) as if it commenced: "Where the property is sold at a price other than the limit of re-charge, etc.” Starting thus, he would be well on the road to invoking sub-s. (2) in his favour, because, if £8,000 is the limit of re-charge, there is no doubt that the machinery and plant were sold to the company at a price greater than the limit of re-charge. But I have come to reject this contention because, in my opinion, the opening words of sub-s. (2) are not a reference to

but the very opposite, a reference to a price which the property would not have fetched in the open market. There is a reference in the concluding words of sub-s. (2) to the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market, but if “limit of re-charge ” is substituted here, it does not aid the revenue, for the whole sub-section is still qualified by the opening words of the sub-section.

B The second contention for the revenue is more subtle and, I think, more difficult. Their first contention involved taking sub-s. (2) and modifying it by the substitution of words taken from sub-s. (3) (b). Their second contention proceeds rather on taking sub-s. (3) (b) and reading into it words taken from sub-s. (2). It is to be noticed that sub-s. (3) (b) is again dependent on a condition, namely,

“if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller.”

D This, the revenue say, is the case here. The sum of £17,554, the open market price, is greater than the sum of £8,000, the limit of re-charge. They then say this is a new and independent condition which takes the place of the condition precedent with which sub-s. (2) opens. They, accordingly, ignore this condition in sub-s. (2), and on a combined reading of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) (b) read the statutory provision as if it ran as follows :—

E “(3) Where the sale is a sale of machinery or plant— . . . (b) subject to the provisions of the next succeeding sub-section, if the price which the property would have fetched if sold in the open market is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller the like consequences shall ensue for the purposes of the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section in their application to the income tax of all persons concerned, as would have ensued if the property had been sold for the limit of re-charge.”

F My Lords, this reading is attractive, but it takes certain liberties in the matter of re-writing the terms of the statutory provisions. It assumes, for instance, that the opening condition of sub-s. (2) falls to be deleted, or at least ignored. But that is not to give sub-s. (2) effect with the substitution merely of limit of re-charge for open market price. It may be that the legislature intended both the opening condition of sub-s. (2) and the condition precedent of sub-s. (3) (b) to operate. To illustrate. It might be that machinery or plant was sold at a price greater or less than the open market price. This would satisfy the condition in sub-s. (2). The open market price then becomes the datum line for the purposes of sub-s. (2). But assume that the open market price is greater than the limit of re-charge on the seller. Under sub-s. (3) (b) this introduces a new datum line, viz., the limit of re-charge. To say, however, that, if the machinery or plant is, in fact, sold at the open market price and this is greater than the limit of re-charge, the limit of re-charge is to be substituted for the open market price seems to me to be pure speculation as to the intention of the legislature. The statute nowhere says so. The words in sub-s. (3) (b) are, I think, important. They seem to be a reference back to the concluding words of sub-s. (2) and these in turn are dependent on the opening words of the sub-section :

“ Where the property is sold at a price other than that which it would have fetched if sold in the open market.”

My Lords, I think I have said enough to show that, in any event, the meaning of this statutory provision is surrounded with much doubt and confusion. It is impossible, in my opinion, to say that there is any of the relevant and material provisions of s. 59 which clearly and unambiguously operates to deprive the taxpayer, in the circumstances of this case, of the right to have his wear and tear allowances based, as would normally be done, on the cost to him of his machinery and plant. That is in this case on the sum of £17,554. I draw no distinction between a statutory provision invoked as a taxing provision and a statutory provision said to deprive, or restrict, the taxpayer in the matter of some established taxation allowance or relief. In each case, the impact of the statute on the taxpayer must be clear on a fair reading of the statute. The language of ROWLATT, J., in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) ([1921] 1 K.B. 71), as approved by my late noble and learned friend, VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Canadian Eagle Oil Co., Ltd. v. Regem (2) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 507) is, in my opinion, here very apt. I would only say that when ROWLATT, J., says, “ There is no room for any intendment ” I think he means there is no room for any presumption of intention, and I would go no further than this. It may often be the case that, from a reading of the language of a statute, or a particular provision of a statute, it is not difficult to extract the policy or intention of the legislature. But that is not so in this case. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Public Health—Rag collection—Delivery of “article” to person under age of fourteen years—Goldfish—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 154 (1).

By the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 154 (1): “No person who collects . . . rags . . . shall . . . (b) while engaged in collecting . . . sell or deliver, whether gratuitously or not . . . any article whatsoever to a person under the age of fourteen years,” the penalty, by sub-s. CASE STATED by Essex justices.

On July 29, 1953, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Stratford, the appellant, Sidney Richard Daly, the chief sanitary inspector for Ilford Corporation, preferred an information against the respondent, William James Cannon, charging that he, on Apr. 29, 1953, being a person who collected rags and was then engaged in collecting such articles in Uphall Road, in the borough of Ilford, did deliver a certain article, namely, a goldfish, to Lesley Cullen, being a person under the age of fourteen years, contrary to s. 154 of the Public Health Act, 1936. It was proved or admitted that on the date specified the respondent was a person who collected rags; that on the date and at the place specified he was engaged in collecting rags and delivered to Lesley Cullen a live goldfish; and that Lesley Cullen was then a person under the age of fourteen years.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that a live goldfish was an “article” within the meaning of s. 154 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936. The respondent did not attend before the justices. He sent them a letter in which he stated that he wished to plead Guilty, but he had been unaware that it was an offence to give away a goldfish. The justices were referred to Llandaff & Canton District Market Co. v. Lyndon (1) and West Ham Corpn. v. Markham (2).

G

The justices were of the opinion that a live goldfish was not an article within the meaning of s. 154 (1) of the Act of 1936, and they dismissed the information.

A. E. Holdsworth for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

H

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Section 154 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, under which the respondent was summoned is in these terms:

“No person who collects or deals in rags, old clothes or similar articles, and no person assisting, or acting on behalf of, any such person as aforesaid, shall—(a) in or from any shop or premises used for, or in connection with, the business of a dealer in any such articles as aforesaid; or (b) while engaged in collecting any such articles as aforesaid, sell or deliver, whether gratuitously or not, any article of food or drink to any person, or any article whatsoever to a person under the age of fourteen years.”

That sub-section replaced s. 73 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1925, which made it an offence to give to a person “ in connection with the business of a rag and bone merchant any article of food or any balloon or other toy ”.

Section 154 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, appears in Part V of the Act, which is headed “ Prevention, notification and treatment of disease ”. No doubt, the object of the legislature was to prevent as far as possible infected articles being passed from hand to hand so that disease might be spread. It is not what I may call a police section, like a section introduced for the purpose of preventing the receiving of stolen goods or matters of that sort. It concerns simply the prevention or spread of disease.

It seems that in this case a boy under the age of fourteen years took some rags to the respondent and received in return a live goldfish. We are told, and I daresay it is the fact, that goldfish are found to be an inducement to boys to bring rags, and if the rag and bone man gave a boy a goldfish in a bowl, the bowl would, no doubt, be an article. In the present case the boy brought a bowl for the goldfish to be put in. The question is: Is a goldfish an article? The respondent wrote a letter to the court and said that he was very sorry if he had done anything wrong, but that he understood that a magistrate had held that it was not wrong as a goldfish was not an article. On Dec. 11, 1953, the stipendiary magistrate at West Ham gave a considered, and, in our opinion, extremely sensible, judgment in West Ham Corpn. v. Markham (2) when he said that he saw no reason why the word “ article ” should not be construed in its popular sense and that no ordinary person would call a goldfish an article.

Section 154 (2) provides a penalty of £5 for breach of the section. It is a well-known canon of construction that if you have an ambiguity or something which is capable of two constructions, you always apply the construction which is most favourable to an accused person and will not involve the imposition of a penalty. Would anybody in ordinary common parlance talk about a goldfish as an “ article ”? I do not think he would. If the statute had said “ article or thing ”, as some statutes have provided, there could be no doubt, I think, that a goldfish would be a “ thing ”. That point came before the High Court of Northern Ireland in R. (U.D.C. of Portadown) v. Armagh Chairman & Justices (3) where MOORE, C.J., having to construe a section which dealt with “ article ” and “ thing ”, said ([1931] N.I. 212) he thought “ ‘ article ’ is appropriate to inanimate chattels; ‘ things ’ both to animate and inanimate.”

I think it is a difficult point in some respects, and, if it is thought that goldfish spread disease—I do not know whether or not they do so—it would be easy for Parliament to alter the law. But, bearing in mind that, if there is a doubt as to the construction, we ought to prefer the construction which is against the imposition of a penalty, I think it is a straining of language to say that a goldfish is an article. Accordingly, I think the judgment, to which I have referred, of the West Ham magistrate was right and I should be prepared to adopt it as my own. In these circumstances, I think the justices came to a right decision in point of law that a goldfish is not an article, and, accordingly, this appeal should be dismissed.

Master and Servant—Wages—Regulation—Catering worker—Minimum remuneration—“Benefits or advantages . . . in connection with any employment”—Payment by worker deemed deduction from remuneration—Manager of licensed premises—Right to carry on catering business—Payment to employer in consideration of grant of right—Catering Wages Act, 1943 (c. 24), s. 10 (3).

By an agreement in writing the appellants, owners of licensed non-residential establishments, employed a manager at one of their establishments at a salary to be paid in accordance with the scale laid down by the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and any order made thereunder. By a separate agreement in writing made on the same day the appellants allowed the manager during the term of his service agreement to carry on a catering business at the said establishment and retain for himself the profit arising therefrom in consideration of paying a weekly sum of £3 (in practice paid at the rate of £13 per month) to the appellants out of the profits of such catering business. It was expressly provided that both agreements should be read together. On an information preferred by the respondent against the appellants for their failure to pay the manager the applicable statutory minimum remuneration, it was contended for the respondent that the payment of £13 by the manager in respect of an advantage or benefit in connection with his employment which, by s. 10 (3) of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, was to be “deemed . . . to have been deducted by the employer from his remuneration,” that after deduction of the £13 the manager had received less than the statutory minimum wage, and that, therefore, the appellants had committed an offence under s. 9 (2) of the Act.

HELD: the test whether a payment by a worker to an employer should be treated as a deduction under s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1943 was whether it was provided in connection with the employment or formed an entirely separate and independent transaction; that was a question of fact; in the present case it was provided that both agreements should be read together; and, therefore, the benefit under the catering agreement was conferred in connection with the employment as manager, and the appellants had committed an offence under the Act.

CASE STATED by Southampton justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Romsey on June 26, 1953, the respondent, Freda Ella Jones, on behalf of the Minister of Labour and National Service, preferred an information against the appellants, People's Refreshment House Association, Ltd., that they on or about Dec. 1, 1952, being employers of workers to whom the Wages Regulation (Licensed Non-Residential Establishment) (Managers and Club Stewards) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 205), applied, at the Horns Inn, Nursling, unlawfully failed to pay to Leonard Thomas Anderson, one of the said workers, remuneration not less than the statutory minimum remuneration, clear of all deductions, contrary to s. 9 (2) of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and the said order.

It was proved or admitted that: (i) Anderson was at all material times employed by the appellants as manager (category A) at the Horns Inn, Nursling, Southampton, which was a licensed non-residential establishment within the meaning of the order. Anderson's wife was required by the appellants to assist in the work of the establishment, and both persons were provided by the appellants with accommodation as defined in para. 26 of the order, but not with full board. In respect of their said employments, Anderson and his wife were workers to whom the schedule to the order applied. (ii) Anderson had been employed by the appellants at the Horns Inn as manager since April, 1946. On Apr. 17, 1952, two agreements in writing were entered into, and these agreements were in operation in November, 1952. The first, referred to as the "Agreement for service" was between the appellants and Anderson and his wife, and the second, referred to as the "Catering agreement" was between the appellants and Anderson. Clauses 5 and 7 of the second agreement provided that it was to be read with the first agreement and should terminate with it. (iii) By cl. 20 of the "Agreement for service" the appellants could terminate it by one month's notice, and pursuant to that clause the appellants did terminate the agreement by giving one month's notice to Anderson in the early part of November, 1952, and, accordingly, both the "Agreement for service" and the "Catering agreement" were due to terminate in the early part of December, 1952. (iv) By cl. 14 of the "Agreement for service" the appellants settled with Anderson monthly in arrear, crediting him with his salary and other moneys due to him, the sum so credited in respect of his salary being in accordance with the scales laid down by the Act of 1943 and the order of 1952. Anderson was also entitled to one-half of the rent received from lodgers and 3d. per dozen on aerated waters sold, plus £1 15s. a week towards help. By cl. 23 provision was made for Mrs. Anderson's wages in accordance with the Act and the order, and, if no part of the Act or order provided for her wages, they were to be 30s. per week, payable to her by Anderson on behalf of the appellants. (v) By cl. 4 of the "Catering agreement", in consideration of the appellants allowing Anderson to carry on a catering business at the Horns Inn and receive and retain for himself the profits arising from such business (but not profits arising from the sale of mineral waters or packed goods) and in consideration of the appellants paying for the lighting and heating, and providing the utensils and use of the dining rooms, Anderson agreed to pay to the appellants the sum of £3 a week out of his profits from the said catering business. (vi) According to the usual course of business between the parties, Anderson performed his obligation to pay the sum of £3 a week by paying to the appellants a sum of £13 in respect of each month. He paid this sum to the appellants at the same time as he paid to them the takings for the first week of the next following month. (vii) For the month of November, 1952, Anderson furnished the appellants an expenses sheet on their printed form, and credited them with £13 under the heading of "rent". On receipt of this document the appellants wrote a letter to him on Nov. 21, 1952. Anderson then paid the appellants the sum of £13 in a cheque for a larger amount. (viii) Anderson was paid by the appellants the sum of £46 0s. 8d. shown in the amended expenses sheet. Of that sum, £8 11s. 3d. was for repayment of his expenses as shown, £29 13s. 6d. represented the wages of himself and his wife (after deducting £1 4s. in respect of their share of the sums to be paid in respect of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, and subject to a further deduction of 5s. in respect of income tax), £7 11s. 8d. represented the monthly total of the weekly sum of £1 15s. referred to in cl. 14 of the "Agreement for service", which sum was retained by the said Anderson and was remuneration received by him as were the sums of 6s. in respect of his share of the rent received from lodgers and 3s. 3d. in respect of aerated waters sold, which sums were also paid in respect of the matters set out in the said para. 14. Before deductions in respect of national insurance and income tax were made, the minimum sum payable to him under the Act and order was £24 7s. 6d. and the minimum sum payable to his wife under the Act and order was £6 10s. (ix) Under the "Catering agreement" he had to pay out of the profits of the catering business the sum of £3 per week or £13 for the month of November. He and his wife gave evidence that, in their opinion, the profits from that business for that month were very small and probably not more than £1 13s., but they kept no books and were unable to give the figures of their receipts or takings. (x) Anderson paid to the appellants in accordance with the "Catering agreement" the sum of £13 for the month of November in respect of the catering business, and, if this sum could properly be set off against his remuneration, his remuneration would be reduced to £21 1s. 5d., thus being below the statutory minimum. Neither when making this payment nor at any other time did Anderson inform the appellants that it was not paid out of the profits of the catering business, nor did he inform them what were the profits of the catering business. (xi) On May 24, 1953, the respondent sent to the appellants a letter attaching a statement setting out what she alleged were the details of the remuneration of Anderson in the month of November, 1952. This statement also showed that, if the said sum of £13 had to be debited to Anderson to arrive at his wages for the purposes of the said Act and order, there was a deficiency of £3 6s. 1d., save as to any deductions properly to be made in respect of national insurance and income tax.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended: (a) that the respondent's statement referred to in para. (xi) was incorrect in that the charge of £13 made under the "Catering agreement" was incorrectly included in the calculation of "remuneration" because it was, not a deduction from remuneration, but a separate payment to be made out of the profits of the catering business and was in fact paid separately and on a different date from the said remuneration; (b) that the two agreements should not be read together, but were separate agreements; (c) that the appellants had the right to assume that the profits of the catering business amounted to at least £13; (d) that, if the profits of the catering business should be included in the calculation of remuneration, the appellants could not be convicted of an underpayment under the Act and order on a mere estimate confined to the opinion of Anderson and his wife that they made very small profits in the month of November, 1952, but had no books and did not know what their expenditure or their takings were in that month, particularly as Anderson had paid the £13 to the appellants and had never mentioned this alleged deficiency of profits until the hearing before the justices; (e) that Anderson had received the remuneration due to him under the said Act and order in respect of the month of November, 1952.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended: (a) that the object of the Act was to ensure that the net remuneration received by a worker from his employer was not less than the statutory minimum remuneration; (b) that, in determining the remuneration paid to a worker, one must have regard to the arrangement between the employer and the worker as a whole and see what the final effect of it was; (c) that any system of payment which finally resulted in a worker receiving as wages a net sum less than that fixed by the appropriate wages regulation order was a contravention of the Act; (d) that the arrangement between the employer and the worker in this case, though dual in form, was single in substance; (e) that the sum of £13 a month which was paid by Anderson and accepted by the appellants in respect of the "Catering agreement" was, in the circumstances of the case, a sum which should be deducted in arriving at the net remuneration paid by the appellants to Anderson in respect of his employment at the Horns Inn; (f) that in the circumstances the appellants were under a duty to ascertain the amount of profits resulting from the catering business in order to ensure that Anderson received at least the statutory minimum remuneration.

The justices were referred to Williams v. Smith (1) and Long Eaton Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Smith (2) and were of the opinion that: (i) the two agreements should be read together; (ii) the sum of £13 paid for the month of November, 1952, to Anderson in respect of the catering business should be deducted in arriving at the remuneration received by him from the appellants; and (iii) in the premises Anderson had not received the remuneration due to him under the Act and order in respect of the month of November, 1952. They, accordingly, convicted the appellants of the offence charged, and ordered them to pay a fine of £10 and ten guineas costs.

The appellants appealed. In the Divisional Court the respondent relied on s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1943 and contended that the payment of the £3 under the catering agreement was to be deemed to be a deduction from the wages.

Beney, Q.C., and C. J. A. Doughty for the appellants.
S. B. R. Cooke for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: On Apr. 17, 1952, one Anderson was employed under an agreement in writing to serve as the manager of the licensed premises known as the Horns Inn, Nursling, Southampton. The agreement—and no one suggests that it is otherwise than a bona fide agreement—provided in cl. 14:

“ . . . the manager's salary under this agreement shall be payable monthly and in accordance with the scales laid down by the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and/or any order made thereunder. The manager shall be entitled to and shall be credited with one half the rent received from lodgers and with 3d. a dozen on aerated waters sold. £1 15s. per week allowed towards help.”

The appellants are one of the associations conducted to encourage the sale of aerated waters rather than alcoholic liquors, and, therefore, the manager is given an inducement to sell non-alcoholic beverages. Provided he is lucky enough to get lodgers from time to time and to sell some aerated waters, he is going to get more than the minimum wage. Some managers of those houses like to do the catering themselves and others prefer that they should simply act as managers and not have a direct interest in the catering, and so a second agreement was made on the same day and recited:

“ Whereas the [appellants] are the proprietors of the property goodwill and utensils of a catering business carried on or to be carried on in the licensed premises known as the Horns Inn situate at Nursling in the county of Hampshire. And whereas the caterer has been appointed manager of the same premises under an agreement which is called ‘the principal agreement’ and is anxious and willing to carry on a catering business at the said premises and the association are willing for him so to do.”

Then it provides:

“(1) The caterer shall have the sole and exclusive right at all times during the continuance of this agreement to supply to customers good and well prepared food either hot or cold according to demand and also tea coffee cocoa and all other articles of food that are usually supplied in a well-ordered eating-house or coffee tavern. (2) The [appellants] will provide all trade utensils furniture crockery and glass for the purpose of carrying on the said business and the caterer will at his own expense replace or repair all such articles as are damaged or destroyed (damage to articles of crockery or glass broken or worn out by fair wear and tear excepted). The caterer shall also be entitled to have the use without any charge thereof of the dining room or rooms in the said licensed premises for the purpose of carrying on the said catering business. The [appellants] will also provide without expense to the caterer the heating and lighting of the said dining room or rooms and the heating necessary for cooking the food for the said business."

By cl. 3 it is provided that the caterer should purchase on his own account the provisions, except those excluded. Then comes cl. 4 which is said to amount to a breach of the Catering Wages Act, 1943:

"In consideration of the [appellants] allowing the caterer to carry on the said catering business and receive and retain for himself the profits arising from such business (but not profits arising from the sale of mineral waters or packed goods) and in consideration of the [appellants] paying for the lighting and heating, providing the utensils and the use of the room or rooms specified in cl. 2 hereof the caterer agrees to pay the [appellants] the weekly sum of £3 for the said catering business out of his profits therefrom."

Clause 5 reads as follows:

"This agreement shall be read with the principal agreement but is subsidiary thereto and nothing in this agreement shall qualify or prejudice the provisions of cl. 11 of the principal agreement."

Clause 11 of the principal agreement is the one under which the manager is obliged to keep proper books and accounts, and so forth. Then it is also provided by cl. 7:

"If for any reason the principal agreement becomes determined this agreement shall immediately become and be determined save only for the validity of acts done and obligations acquired during its currency."

I do not think I need go into the various facts relating to the accounts which were drawn up at the end of the employment, but the fact remains that the manager did pay to the appellants £3 a week, and at the close of his employment he sent them a cheque for that amount, although he said that he had not made £3 a week.

He was only bound to pay £3 a week under the agreement if he made a profit. If he chose to pay them that sum, though he had not made any profit, it would be difficult to see, if it were otherwise permitted by the Act, that the appellants would commit an offence because he paid a sum which amounted to £3 a week, but that is not the point we have to decide.

The point arises under the Catering Wages Act, 1943, s. 10 (3), which provides:

"Where any benefits or advantages are provided, in connection with any employment, by the employer or by some other person under arrangements with the employer, then, whether or not the benefits or advantages are authorised to be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash, any sum paid by the worker in respect of those benefits or advantages shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have been deducted by the employer from his remuneration."

One of the objects of the Act is to provide that the payments shall be in cash, and the sub-section is similar to the provisions of the Truck Acts, 1831 to 1940, namely, deductions are not allowed to be made from a worker's remuneration except in so far as the wages regulation order may provide that certain sums shall be deducted. Our attention has been called to the Wages Regulation (Licensed Non-Residential Establishment) (Managers and Club Stewards) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 205), schedule, Part I, para. 7, which provides that, if board is provided, a certain sum may be deducted in respect of that board. I have no doubt that s. 10 (3) was put in by Parliament to prevent evasion. In the present case I do not think there has been any attempt to evade the Act. It was provided that the manager should be, and he was, paid a minimum wage. So far as I can see, he was generally paid rather more than the minimum wage, but it is said that what has happened here is caught by the words of s. 10 (3) and, if so, we are bound to give effect to it.

In my judgment, it is impossible to say that this catering agreement did not confer on the manager a benefit or advantage. It gave him the benefit of carrying on a catering business, keeping for himself the profits less £3. I cannot see that that benefit or advantage was not provided in connection with the employment. It clearly was. The agreement under which he was appointed catering manager was not only made on the same day as the principal agreement which appointed him manager, but the principal agreement is referred to in the catering agreement, cl. 5 of which provides that the catering agreement is to be read with the principal agreement, though it is said to be subsidiary thereto. Under the catering agreement he is to pay £3 a week to his employers, not in any circumstances but provided he makes profits, and he did pay £3 a week. But the Act of 1943 provides in s. 10 (3):

“ . . . any sum paid by the worker in respect of those benefits or advantages [the £3] shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have been deducted by the employer from his remuneration.”

In the present case I think it works a hardship on the appellants, although there has been no evasion of the Act. Indeed, we were told by counsel who appears for the Ministry of Labour and National Service in these cases, and it is conceded, so far as I can see, rightly (though I am not deciding this point because the Minister might take some different view and might consider it hereafter), that, if this agreement were worded that the manager was to pay over all the profits of the catering business to the appellants who were then to return the profits to him less £3, that would not be caught by the Act. If that is so, it seems an unfortunate situation, which, possibly, the Minister might think fit to remedy by altering the wages schedule. We are not criticising the action taken by the respondent because it is the duty of the Ministry to see that this Act is obeyed, or the provisions of s. 10 (3) because we can see that it is often necessary to have such a provision to prevent evasion. I am only pointing out that in this particular case it seems that the manager was getting not only his minimum wage in cash, but more than his minimum wage. But, on account of the way this sub-section is worded, the transaction is caught by the concluding words.

The test in the present case must be whether or not the catering agreement was a separate and independent agreement—whether or not the two documents could be looked at as entirely separate contracts. That was the view of the Court of Appeal in Long Eaton Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Smith (2). That case dealt with agricultural wages, and in the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, s. 7, there were not such strong words as there are in the Catering Wages Act, 1943. In that case an agricultural worker was engaged at a minimum wage and was paid the right wage, but he also asked to be accepted by his employers as the tenant of a cottage. It was not a cottage in the ordinary sense of a tied farm cottage, but was a cottage independent of the farm which he asked to be allowed to take, and for it he agreed to make a weekly payment. The Court of Appeal held that that payment could not be looked on as a deduction from his wages because they regarded the contract of tenancy of the cottage as entirely separate from the contract of employment. I feel that I cannot take that view of the two agreements in the present case. I think they are really one and the same agreement although they are contained in two different documents. Those documents must be read together. Although, I daresay, it is possible to have an independent caterer in a refreshment house of this sort carrying on an independent business, in the present case I am clearly of opinion that the manager was carrying on this business qua manager. He was the manager, and, as manager, given the benefit of providing the food and taking the profits less £3. But, by reason of the words of sub-s. (3), the fact that he pays the £3 must, I think, be treated as a deduction from his minimum wage, although, as I say, it seems to be conceded that the same transaction could well be carried out in another way. In these circumstances, I think the justices came to a right decision, and this appeal fails.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

A PARKER, J.: I agree. The short point is whether the undoubted benefit with which the manager was provided by the appellants was in connection with his employment. It seems to me that whether or not in any particular case a benefit is provided in connection with the employment or forms part of an entirely separate bargain must be a question of fact. One of the contentions raised before the justices by the respondent was that, in determining the remuneration paid to a worker, one must have regard to the arrangement between the B employer and the worker as a whole and see what is the final effect of it. It seems to me perfectly clear from the findings of the justices that they came to the conclusion that these two agreements were not separate bargains, but were part and parcel of one single transaction. Accordingly, that being a finding on a question of fact, it cannot be challenged unless it is shown that they have
C misdirected themselves in law or there was no evidence on which they could so find. So far from that being the case, it seems to me when one looks at these agreements and sees that the second, catering, agreement was made subsidiary to the principal agreement, when one sees that the appellants were not content for this man to remain as caterer once he ceased to be manager, and when one appreciates that the offer of becoming caterer was really an inducement to D become manager, it seems to me impossible to say that the benefit provided was not in connection with his employment.

Appeal dismissed.

NORRIS v. WILLIAM MOSS & SONS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Birkett, L.J.J., and Vaisey, J.), January 12, 13, 25, 1954.]

Building—Building regulations—Scaffolding—Standard out of vertical—Negligence of workman in correcting fault—Cause of accident—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 10 (1) (a).

The plaintiff was employed as a scaffold erector by the defendants who were engaged in building a brick ventilating shaft. The defendants' foreman noticed that one of the standards of the scaffolding erected on the building was out of the vertical and leaning slightly away from the wall of the shaft, but he failed to remedy the fault or inform the plaintiff of its existence. On Aug. 15, 1950, the foreman instructed the plaintiff to erect an additional platform on the scaffolding, and the plaintiff, having reached the existing platform, noticed the fault in the standard and attempted to correct it by unfastening the couplings on the platform and proceeding to try to place the standard back into the vertical without having unfastened the couplings at the base and in the centre. As the plaintiff pulled a bend was created in the standard, and when he released the pressure on it, it sprang back into position dragging the "putlogs" which secured the scaffolding to the wall, out of the wall. The platform on which the plaintiff was standing collapsed and he fell and suffered injuries. In a claim for damages for personal injuries, based on negligence at common law and breach of reg. 10 (1) (a) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, the court found that the plaintiff's method in trying to correct the fault was "fantastically wrong".

HELD : although at the time of the accident there was a breach by the defendants of reg. 10 (1) (a) in that the standard was out of the vertical, the real cause of the accident was the plaintiff's negligence in employing an unsuitable method of trying to correct the fault ; neither the breach of statutory duty nor the failure of the foreman to warn the plaintiff of the fault contributed to the accident ; and, therefore, the defendants were not liable.

Case referred to :

(1) Sexton v. Scaffolding (Great Britain), Ltd., [1952] 2 All E.R. 1085 ; [1953] 1 Q.B. 153.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of STABLE, J., at Manchester Winter Assizes, dated Mar. 25, 1953.

The plaintiff was employed as a scaffold erector by the defendants, William Moss & Sons, Ltd., who were a firm of builders and contractors, engaged in building a brick ventilating shaft. Scaffolding had been erected to provide working platforms for the bricklayers, and on Aug. 15, 1950, the work on the shaft had reached such a stage that it became necessary to add another platform at a higher level. At that time one of the tubular standards was out of the vertical and leaning slightly away from the wall of the shaft, a fact which had been noticed by the defendants' foreman during his inspection, but which he failed to remedy or communicate to the plaintiff. The foreman instructed the plaintiff to add the platform at the higher level, and when the plaintiff reached the existing platform he saw that the standard was out of the vertical. He, therefore, decided to correct the fault himself, and before he had inserted a safety strut into the wall, he unfastened the couplings of the platform on which he was standing and proceeded to try to place the standard back into the vertical without unfastening the couplings at the base and in the centre. A bend was created in the standard as he pulled and when he released the pressure, the standard sprang back and dragged out of the wall the "putlogs" which secured the scaffolding to the wall. The platform collapsed, and the plaintiff fell to the ground, thereby suffering injuries. In a claim for damages for personal injuries the plaintiff alleged negligence at common law and breach of reg. 10 (1) (a) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare), Regulations, 1948, on the part of the defendants. Regulation 10 (1) provides:

"Standards or uprights of scaffolds shall be—(a) where practicable vertical or slightly inclined towards the building."

On the issue of negligence, STABLE, J., found that the failure of the foreman to communicate the existence of the fault to the plaintiff had not, in the circumstances, contributed to the accident, and held that the defendants were not in breach of their common law duty. He held, further, that reg. 10 (1) (a) of the Building Regulations was inapplicable, and, that, therefore, the defendants were not in breach of their statutory duty.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 25. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of STABLE, J., in an action in which the plaintiff claimed damages against his employers for personal injuries. He alleged a breach of the defendants' duty at common law, and also a breach under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. The case concerns scaffolding. The defendants were erecting a new building and put up their own scaffolding, and this was the type which had to be rigidly connected with the building. There were vertical and cross pieces and the pieces affixed to the building were known as "putlogs". The regulation mainly relied on is reg. 10 (1) (a) which provides that the standards or uprights of scaffolds shall, where practicable, be vertical or slightly inclined towards the building.

A few days before the accident the defendants' foreman, in the course of his duty, noticed that one of the uprights was out of the vertical leaning, not towards the building, but away from it. He took no action, believing that from a safety point of view it did not matter. On the day of the accident the plaintiff and two men were ordered to put on another lift or storey to the scaffolding. When the plaintiff went to the place where this work was to be done he noticed, as the foreman had, that this upright was out of the vertical and leaning away from the building. He decided to put it right himself and the learned judge has found that this was a proper decision for him to take. He was an experienced man, competent in the work. There was, on the learned judge's finding, no difficulty about it and if the correct procedure had been followed there would have been no danger to anyone concerned. The learned judge set out the proper procedure and proceeded as follows:

"Instead of that, before this safety strut was inserted, for some inexplicable reason he [the plaintiff] unfastened the couplings of the first platform, on which he was standing, and proceeded to try to place this standard back into the vertical without having unfastened the couplings at the base and middle. The result was as he pulled it towards him that inevitably there was created a sort of bend in this standard and when the pull was released it shot back dragging the putlogs out of the support of the brick wall and thus causing the platform to collapse and the plaintiff to fall."

The learned judge describes this method as "fantastically wrong". When he was dealing with the issue at common law he referred to the fact that the foreman had noticed this upright and done nothing about it. He held that the foreman should have had the standard attended to before sending people up to raise the lift. He added:

"But this omission on the part of the foreman had nothing to do with this accident but it so happened that the plaintiff observed the position of the standard and was proceeding to do that very thing though in the wrong way which he would have been doing had the foreman done his duty and directed him to do it."

The judge was finding, and I agree, that the cause of the accident was the method by which the plaintiff set about this work and not the failure of the foreman to take steps.

As I have said, the claim was based on an alleged breach of the regulations and I have recited the most important. The defendants' primary defence, we are told, was based on causation. It was submitted that the departure of the standard from the vertical was not the cause of the accident for the purpose of liability: it was merely the occasion of the work which the plaintiff took upon himself to do. During the course of the hearing below reference was made to the decision of this court in Sexton v. Scaffolding (Great Britain), Ltd. (1). In that case an accident had happened while some scaffolding was being dismantled and this court held that the regulation relied on did not apply to the work of dismantling as at the time when the accident occurred. The principle is easily illustrated. Regulation 9 provides that all scaffolds shall be kept secure or placed in position so as to prevent, so far as is practicable, accidental displacement. An occupier clearly could not be convicted of a criminal offence on the ground that the scaffold or part of a scaffold had not been so secured if he was in process of erecting it and in doing, at the proper time, that which the regulation says is to be done. As HOBSON, L.J., put it ([1952] 2 All E.R. 1092), certain of the regulations are only applicable to a scaffold in use and cannot be applied to the process of erection so as to comply with the regulations, or to dismantling. The learned judge thought that that case covered the present circumstances.

I have come to the conclusion that the claim fails on the point of causation. On the learned judge's findings of fact it seems to me plain that the sole cause of the accident was the method which the plaintiff unfortunately adopted in carrying out the work. With regard to the principle of Sexton's case (1), it seems to be clear that it could and would apply in some cases to the process of keeping the scaffolding in accordance with the regulations in between erection and dismantling. I will assume, and this may be the case here, that scaffolding properly erected, as a result of the weather or inevitable wear and tear, requires attention in order to bring it back into a state in which it accords with the regulations. As soon as the defect appears men are no longer allowed to use it as a scaffold and a proper repairing squad is sent up to deal with it. I cannot think it could be said that a criminal offence had been committed.

I feel, however, some difficulty about the present case, and I would, therefore, wish to make no concluded observations on the application of the principle in Sexton's case (1) to the circumstances here. If that had been the only point I think the fact that the foreman had noticed the defect and done nothing, and knowing of the defect had sent the plaintiff up on a job on which he would have had to use this piece of scaffold as a scaffold, might have been relied on as I may put it in this way, as ousting the application of the principle in Sexton's case (1). It was suggested that one sentence of the learned judge's judgment indicated that, apart from his application of Sexton's case (1), he would have held the defendants liable to some extent with a substantial contribution from the plaintiff due to his negligence. There is a sentence that supports that suggestion. On the other hand, having regard to what the learned judge said about the common law liability, I think he would probably have come to the same conclusion as I have on the question of causation if he had felt it necessary to decide the point with reference to the alleged breach of regulations. I, therefore, would dismiss the appeal.

A BIRKETT, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The learned judge had to decide whether the defendants were liable to the plaintiff either at common law or because of some breach of their statutory duty. He decided there was no liability at common law because the foreman's omission to tell the plaintiff of what he had discovered a few days before Aug. 15 had no bearing on the accident, and the plaintiff had discovered the same thing for himself. If the plaintiff had not discovered it and had gone on to erect the higher platform and an accident had occurred because of the leaning standard, then it would appear that the learned judge would have found the defendants to blame both at common law and for breach of statutory duty. But the plaintiff, having discovered the fault for himself, was in fact engaged in repairing it, although in an improper way, when the accident occurred; and the silence of the foreman had nothing to do with the accident at all.

B With regard to the alleged breach of statutory duty, the learned judge on the authority of Sexton v. Scaffolding (Great Britain), Ltd. (1), decided that reg. 10, which was relied on by the plaintiff, did not apply, and he, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff's claim. The learned judge added:

C "I think in any event there was substantial negligence on the part of the plaintiff in the way he set about this particular job."

D It seems to me that this appeal can be decided if a clear answer can be given to the question: What was the cause of this accident? The evidence points unmistakably to the cause of the accident being the improper manner in which the plaintiff endeavoured to straighten the leaning standard. Had he performed that work in the natural and proper manner, there would have been no accident at all. If that is right, can it be said that the leaning standard, which constituted a breach of statutory duty, contributed in any way to the plaintiff's injury and damage? It is obvious, of course, that, if the standard had not been out of place, the plaintiff would never have attempted to set it right, and in that sense the leaning standard was concerned with the accident. But I cannot think that the leaning standard was in any sense or in any degree the cause of the accident; it was the act of the plaintiff, and that alone, which brought about the unfortunate injury. If it is to be said that there was here a breach of statutory duty (as there was) and because of its existence it must be regarded as a contributory cause, in the sense that without it the plaintiff would never have attempted to put it right and would never have been injured, although, had he acted prudently and properly, there would have been no accident at all, then the liability of the defendants would be purely nominal, in my opinion, but, in my view, the sole cause of this accident was the negligence of the plaintiff and the breach of statutory duty made no contribution.

E F G In these circumstances it is not necessary to discuss the question whether reg. 10 (1) (a) of the Building Regulations applies, although on the reasoning which governed Sexton's case (1), I should incline to say it did not.

H VAISEY, J.: I am of the same opinion. It is sometimes difficult to decide whether an antecedent act or event is the cause, or one of the causes, of a subsequent event, or whether, on the other hand, it is merely one of the surrounding circumstances in which, or part of the background in front of which, the subsequent event has taken place. Here it seems to me that the accident to the plaintiff was due entirely to his own negligence in doing a piece of work, well within his competence, in a manner which the learned judge described as "fantastically wrong". True it is that it was on the leaning standard that the work in question had to be carried out, but the fact that the standard was in that condition cannot, in my judgment, be treated as being in any reasonable sense a cause of the accident. It is not, I think, admissible to construct chains of causation in a case such as this where a single cause—simple, obvious and amply sufficient to account for what happened—is to be found in the inexcusably careless behaviour of the workman himself. The argument in the old fable in which the loss of a kingdom is traced back to an originating and ultimate cause in the loss of a single nail from a horse's shoe does not commend itself to me as adaptable to this case. I concur in the reasoning of my Lords following that of STABLE, J., and I agree that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOLAN v. C. & C. MARSHALL, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Birkett, L.JJ., and Upjohn, J.), January 19, 1954.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Payment into court—Recovery by legally assisted person of amount less than that paid in—Liability for defendants' costs after date of payment into court—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 2 (2) (e).

In an action against his employers for negligence and breach of statutory duty by a plaintiff who was an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the defendants paid into court £763. On trial of the action the judge awarded the plaintiff £500 general damages. In the civil aid certificate the plaintiff's disposable capital and his contribution towards the costs were assessed at nil. On the question of costs the judge made an order that the plaintiff should recover his costs up to the date of the payment into court and the defendants their costs after that date, and the defendants were authorised to deduct from the amount of damages awarded to the plaintiff the excess, if any, of their costs since the date of the payment in over the amount of the plaintiff's costs up to that date.

HELD: in considering the question of costs against an assisted person under s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949, the court should have regard to the amount of damages awarded to that person as one of the circumstances of the case, and, therefore, on the basis that the plaintiff had been awarded an amount less than that which had been paid into court, the judge's order was correct. On the facts of the case, however, the general damages awarded to the plaintiff should be increased from £500 to £1,200.

Decision of McNAIR, J. ([1953] 2 All E.R. 389), affirmed.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 2 (2) (e), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 535.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of McNAIR, J., dated June 10, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 389.

On June 8, 1953, McNAIR, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, whose disposable capital and contribution towards costs were nil, for £500 general damages against the defendants in an action for negligence and breach of statutory duty. His Lordship was then informed that in May, 1952, the defendants had paid £763 into court. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that by virtue of s. 2 (2) (e) of the Act of 1949 the ordinary rule in such a case, under which the defendants would set off their costs after payment in against those of the plaintiff up to the date of payment in and deduct any excess in their favour against the amount of the damages awarded to the plaintiff, should not apply. McNAIR, J., held that in all the circumstances of the case, including the means of the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute, following the ordinary rule it would be ordered that the plaintiff should recover his costs up to the date of payment into court and the defendants their costs since that date, and the defendants would be authorised to deduct from the amount of damages awarded to the plaintiff the excess, if any, of their costs since the date of payment in over the amount of the plaintiff's costs up to that date.

Beney, Q.C., and M. Waters for the plaintiff.

A John Thompson for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the plaintiff took four points in this court. His first point concerned the quantum of damage. He said that £500 was a sum so disproportionate to the evidence and facts as found that this court should interfere. I have said before that I think there may be only one task more difficult than that of the judge of first instance in assessing damages and that is the decision of this court as to when it should interfere with the award. With respect to this matter, I have come to the conclusion that this is a case in which we should interfere. [His LORDSHIP then considered the medical evidence, the extent of the injury suffered by the plaintiff and the resulting disability, and said:] Taking those factors into account and allowing a reasonable amount for the other minor heads of pain, suffering and disfigurement, I think the plaintiff should be awarded £1,200.

The other points taken by counsel arose on the question of costs. They arose on the basis that there had been paid into court a sum larger than that which had been awarded. They do not now arise, of course, on the view we take with regard to the quantum of damages, but, as we have come to a clear conclusion, it is right that we should state it. It was first argued that the notice of payment in was bad in that it did not allocate or specify a sum in respect of the claim under the Factories Act, 1937, and a sum in respect of the claim at common law. R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 1 (2), says:

E "Where the money is paid into court in satisfaction of one or more of several causes of action the notice shall specify the cause or causes of action in respect of which payment is made and the sum paid in respect of each such cause of action unless the court or a judge otherwise order."

That point was not taken below and I think it is better that we should not deal with it. It can be dealt with in a case where it arises.

F The second point made on the question of costs by counsel for the plaintiff was that the rule applied by the judge and described by him as the normal rule was not in fact the normal rule. Counsel drew our attention to a summary of recorded cases in the ANNUAL PRACTICE to which the judge's attention was not drawn. Nothing I say is to be regarded as throwing any light on my view of that submission, which must be left to be dealt with in a case where it becomes necessary to decide it.

G The last point was that, the learned judge having decided that there were costs which the plaintiff who was an assisted person should pay, in considering what sum it was reasonable for him to pay under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 17 (1) (b), took into account the fact that he was awarding him £500 in respect of his claim. We were referred to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 4 (3), which deals with the extent of an assisted person's contribution, which is based on an assessment of his disposable capital and income. That subsection expressly provides that "The regulations shall include provision for securing that the resources of a person seeking or receiving legal aid shall be treated as not including the subject-matter of the dispute".

Of course, when the learned judge expressed his view on the matter, it had passed that stage; the dispute had been decided and he had awarded £500. I can find nothing either in the Act or in the regulations which would go to show that the learned judge was wrong in taking that fact into account in the way in which he did. Indeed, counsel for the plaintiff was inclined to admit that it was hard to argue against it. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be allowed in the sense which I have indicated.

BIRKETT, L.J., expressed his agreement, gave his reasons for increasing the quantum of damages awarded, and continued: The only other point on which I desire to say a word is that which arises under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 2 (2) (e). Under that provision it is clear that the court has to consider the circumstances at the moment when damages are being assessed, whereas in s. 4 (3) the relevant moment is the time of the assessment of the person's means, and any prospective gain from any claim which he may have is to be excluded from the assessment. When the court is dealing with costs under s. 2 (2) (e), where the words are

"shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of all the parties . . .",

I think that the fact that the assisted person has recovered some amount is one of the circumstances of the case. It is certainly a matter which the Act enjoins one to take into consideration, and I think it should be brought into account.

I would allow the appeal and alter the amount of damages from £500 to £1,200.

UPJOHN, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed: judgment for the plaintiff for £1,200.

HOPE v. BROWN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 21, 1954.]

Criminal Law—Attempt—Attempt to sell meat above maximum price—False price tickets kept separately from meat.

Price Control—Attempt to sell at excessive price—Meat parcels prepared with correct price tickets—False price tickets, to be affixed later, kept separately—Meat (Prices) (Great Britain) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 1122), art. 3.

Enforcement officers of the Ministry of Food found in a refrigerator in a butcher's shop, of which the respondent was manager, packages of meat bearing tickets correctly specifying the contents and price. In a drawer, however, there was another set of tickets marked with higher prices which were above the maxima chargeable. The respondent admitted that he had instructed an employee to change the tickets before the delivery of the meat. The respondent was charged with attempting to sell meat at a price exceeding the maximum.

Held: until the false tickets were affixed to the meat there was merely an intention and preparation to commit the offence of selling at a price above the maximum and not an attempt; the acts of the respondent were not sufficiently connected with the offence to constitute an attempt to commit it; and, therefore, he was not guilty of the offence charged against him.

CASE STATED by Lancashire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Wigan on Aug. 21, 1953, the appellant, Fred Hope, an enforcement inspector of the Ministry of Food, preferred twenty-one informations against the respondent, Thomas Brown, each alleging that on or about June 19, 1953, he attempted to sell meat at a price exceeding the maximum applicable in accordance with the Meat (Prices) (Great Britain) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 1122), art. 3, contrary to the said order and to the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 55AB, and reg. 90 (1).

It was proved or admitted that the respondent was employed as manager at a butcher's shop; that on June 19, 1953, two enforcement inspectors of the Ministry of Food visited and inspected the shop and interviewed the respondent; that in a refrigerator in the shop there were twenty-two packages containing meat and on twenty-one of them there was a ticket correctly specifying the contents of the package and a price which was in accordance with the order of 1952, each of which packages had been prepared by the respondent; that in a drawer in the shop there was another set of tickets each of which related to one of the packages and on each of these tickets a total price was marked, but no price per pound, and the total price in each case was in excess of that which could lawfully have been charged; and that, after being cautioned by one of the inspectors, the respondent made and signed a statement as follows:

"All this waste and excessive fat had to be trimmed and I try to oblige the customers, that's all. The extra price on the second ticket is to cover up the trimmings. I do this entirely on my own initiative to try to make the turnover and Mr. M. [the respondent's employer] does not know a thing about it. When the orders go out on the Saturday the girl is instructed to change the tickets over, and when she comes back she brings the genuine ticket back so I can sort the book out."

At the close of the appellant's case it was submitted for the respondent that there was no case to answer. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that on the facts proved and in the absence of any other evidence the respondent ought to be convicted. The justices accepted the submission of the respondent, and dismissed all the informations.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellant.

J. H. R. Newey for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The only question is whether or not the respondent can be convicted of an attempt to sell meat in respect of each of these twenty-one customers to whom he intended that the meat should be delivered on the next day. Does what he has done amount to an attempt? In my opinion, it does not. The mere intention to commit an offence means that an act has been done preparatory to the commission of the offence. The locus classicus on what amounts to an attempt is R. v. Eagleton (1) in which PARKE, B., said (24 L.J.M.C. 166):

"Some act is required, and we do not think all acts towards committing a misdemeanour indictable. Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are . . . ”

In the present case, what remained to be done before there could be an attempt was the affixing to the meat of the false tickets. Until that was done, in my opinion, the matter remained simply what I may call in embryo and in intention. The girl, no doubt, and not the respondent himself, would have affixed the tickets, but that was because she was instructed to do so. Her act would have been the act of the respondent, but until she had affixed the tickets, it seems to me that one cannot say that an offence was committed. The preparation of the false tickets and putting them in the drawer is too remote from the actual transaction which would be necessary to constitute the attempt. It is obvious that there might be a sudden change of heart, or an intervention by the master, or something of that sort, which would have prevented any attempt being made to sell this meat to the customers. The court has always said, in cases where it has been found that there has been an attempt, that the crime would have been committed but for the intervention of someone, but no crime would have been committed in the present case until the meat had been sold to the customer with the false ticket.

Therefore, I think the mere fact that the respondent prepared a false ticket is not enough. No doubt, this charge was preferred because of the decision in Gardner v. Akeroyd (2), but that case turned on whether the proprietor of a butcher's business could be made vicariously liable for the act of an assistant in the shop which was preparatory to an illegal sale, but did not amount to an attempt, and we held that the doctrine of vicarious liability could not be so extended. Giving judgment in that case, I said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 311):

“ Now, applying the doctrine laid down in R. v. Eagleton (1), I should have no hesitation in holding that the servant in this case was guilty of, and could properly have been charged with, an attempt as the facts proved were clearly immediately connected with what would have been a substantive offence had not the enforcement officer intervened before the goods had been actually sold.”

But there the false tickets had already been affixed to the meat, while in the present case they had not. For these reasons I think the enforcement officers struck too soon. In my opinion, the justices came to a right decision in point of law and this appeal fails.

BYRNE, J.: Counsel for the appellant has drawn our attention to the definition in STEPHEN'S DIGEST OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, 9th ed., p. 24, art. 29, of an attempt:

“ An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a series of acts, which would constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted.”

When one examines the facts in the present case, it appears to me that the respondent's acts were not interrupted because the time had not arrived for their completion. His acts, in my opinion, were for that reason too remote. They certainly indicated an attempt, but were not sufficiently connected with the offence with attempting to commit which he was charged to constitute an attempt. I am of opinion that the justices were right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

GRAINGER v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.),
January 22, 1954.]

Local Government—Expenditure—Employment of valuer by rating authority—Payment out of general rate fund—Local Government Act, 1933 (c. 51), s. 187 (2).

In 1952 the respondents, as rating authority, engaged D. to review the valuations of certain properties in their area, that they might make proposals for the re-valuation of those properties. Payments were made by the respondents to D. in accordance with the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 187 (2). The appellant appealed, as a person aggrieved, under s. 187 (3) of the Act of 1933 against the orders authorising those payments on the ground that the respondents had no power or authority to make them and so they were illegal and ultra vires.

HELD: under s. 33 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1948, the respondents, as rating authority, had a duty, and under s. 40 (1) (b), as persons aggrieved (being ratepayers in respect of property owned by them), had a right, to make a proposal for the alteration of the valuation list; the obtaining of advice in such a highly technical matter was merely incidental to the performance of the duty and the exercise of the right; and, therefore, the payments made by the respondents were intra vires and legal.

During 1949 the respondents, the corporation of the city of Liverpool, who were the local authority for general statutory purposes and the rating authority for the city of Liverpool pursuant to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, began a re-valuation of office property in the central area of the city. This work was carried out by, or under the supervision of, Mr. Isaac Dixon, the rating valuer to the local assessment committee and the Liverpool rating committee, and by Feb. 1, 1950, approximately one quarter of the premises concerned had been dealt with. On Feb. 1, 1950, the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1948, whereby certain functions relating to valuation were to be transferred to the Inland Revenue, came into force, and the re-valuation of the remaining office properties in the central area was left in abeyance. In 1951 and 1952 the Inland Revenue was urged by the respondents to complete the re-valuation, but without success. In the meantime there was some dissatisfaction among the re-assessed occupiers and also the respondents were losing substantial revenue by reason of the failure to re-assess the remaining office properties in the central area, and in August, 1952, the respondents decided to engage outside professional assistance to review the valuations of these properties. Mr. Dixon was engaged for this work, he by that time being in private practice. From January, 1953, onwards, the respondents, on Mr. Dixon's advice, from time to time served on the valuation officer proposals to alter the valuation list in respect of the said office properties. These proposals were made in the respondents' name, and, where objections were made, the notices of appeal were served in the respondents' name and in the manner prescribed by statute. On Apr. 28, 1953, the appellant, Richard Ernest Grainger, received a letter from Mr. Dixon stating that he had been instructed by the respondents to review the assessments of office property in the city and to advise them what changes, if any, should be made therein, and requesting certain information as to the lease under which the appellant held his office at 8, Victoria Street, Liverpool. On Apr. 29, 1953, the appellant replied, giving the information requested. On July 8, 1953, he received from the valuation officer of the Liverpool valuation area a notice of proposal, together with a copy of a form of proposal signed by the town clerk, for the alteration of the valuation list. The appellant, through his solicitors, then wrote various letters to the town clerk about the payment of fees to Mr. Dixon by the respondents, and on Sept. 3, 1953, the town clerk wrote to the appellant's solicitors stating that payments had been made to Mr. Dixon in accordance with the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 187 (2), in pursuance of a resolution of the Rating (Special) Committee dated Aug. 18, 1952, the powers and duties of the respondents, as rating authority, having been delegated to that committee.

The appellant appealed, under s. 187 (3) of the Act of 1933, as a person aggrieved by the orders made by the respondents for the payment of fees to Mr. Dixon, and asked for those orders to be quashed on the ground that the respondents had no power or authority to order or to pay the fees and that any or all such payments were illegal and ultra vires.

Harold Brown for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This matter which, on being opened, looked very formidable and one which involved the consideration of a large number of statutes and questions of law, seems to me to boil down to a comparatively simple point.

Under the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 187, which deals with orders for payments out of moneys from the general rate funds of boroughs, it is provided by sub-s. (3):

"Any person aggrieved by an order of the council made under this section may appeal to the High Court, and on any such appeal the High Court may give such directions in the matter as they think proper, and the order of the High Court shall be final."

The orders which are appealed against here are orders made by members of the Liverpool corporation, the appropriate persons, directing that sums of money should be paid to a Mr. Dixon for his services to the corporation in and about the valuation of certain properties within the city for the purpose of enabling the corporation to make proposals for the re-valuation of those properties in the valuation list. It is said that a revolution in rating procedure took place by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1948, and, to a certain extent, that is true. There had been an earlier revolution in 1925, by virtue of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, when the duties of overseers and so forth in relation to rates were abolished and rating authorities were set up. In 1948 the duties of rating authorities, so far as the valuation of properties was concerned for the purpose of preparing valuation lists, were done away with, and valuation was put into the hands of the local valuation officer, an official of the Inland Revenue.

When the matter was governed by the Act of 1925, the appropriate section which dealt with the employment of valuers was s. 38. That gave power to rating authorities and other persons, namely, assessment committees or county valuation committees, to employ a competent person to give advice or assistance in connection with the valuation of any hereditaments in the area. Then it went on to give that person certain powers. That section was repealed when the Act of 1948 came into force—naturally enough, because it gave the assessment committee and the county valuation committee, both of which have now disappeared, power to employ a valuer and gave to the rating authority power to employ a valuer to carry out a duty which is no longer placed on the rating authority. But, in the Local Government Act, 1948, s. 33 (2), Parliament has preserved the right of the rating authority to make proposals for the alteration of the valuation list, the difference being that those proposals have now to be made to the local valuation officer instead of to the assessment committee.

A More than that, rating authorities which, in this case, are the corporation of Liverpool, are themselves ratepayers, and they can be persons aggrieved because they may be able to say that their property, such as the town hall, is rated too high or that other properties in the area of rating are rated too low. Therefore, it seems to me, that the corporation can make a proposal to the local valuation officer either as the rating authority or as ratepayers, and it matters not whether they describe themselves as one or the other. I do not think it is even faintly
B suggested that they have not a locus standi to be heard to object.

What is suggested is that they have not the power to employ and pay a valuer. They, as a corporation, can act only through their officers, members, and so forth, and if a corporation have power to make this proposal, which they certainly have, either in their capacity as ratepayers or in their capacity as rating authority, it seems to me that to employ professional assistance must be
C incidental to the power which they have. It may be that in some places you might have on the appropriate committee of the corporation one or two members familiar with rating and it might not be found necessary to employ a rating surveyor, but it is quite clear here that the corporation of Liverpool as a matter of policy have decided that there are many office premises in Liverpool the valuation of which ought to be altered. Therefore, they have decided to make proposals,
D and to enable them to do this they have appointed somebody to assist them to prepare and advise them in making these proposals. It seems to me that that comes very well within the words, dealing with the powers of the corporation, which have been referred to more than once in the course of the hearing and are conveniently stated by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in A.-G. v. Smethwick Corpn. (1) where he refers to the well-known judgment of JAMES, L.J., in A.-G. v. Great Eastern Ry. Co. (2), and says ([1932] 1 Ch. 576):

"He deals with the question of a railway company going outside its statutory powers and, perhaps for its own purposes, taking part in the business of a colliery in order to secure commodities required for the purposes of its line. He says (11 Ch.D. 484): 'So far as the first has compulsory powers it must not abuse them; so far as it has statutory duties it cannot delegate them; so far as it is under any statutory prohibition or direction it must not violate the one or neglect the other'. . . . When that case went to the House of Lords, LORD SELBORNE said (5 App. Cas. 478) ' . . . But I agree with JAMES, L.J., that this doctrine ought to be reasonable, and not unreasonably, understood and applied, and that whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorised, ought not (unless expressly prohibited) to be held, by judicial construction, to be ultra vires'. LORD BLACKBURN also says (ibid., 481): 'I quite agree with what JAMES, L.J., has said on this first point as to prohibition, that those things which are incident to, and may reasonably and properly be done under the main purpose, though they may not be literally within it, would not be prohibited'. . . ."

It seems to me that the case for the corporation can be put as high as this. The corporation are under a duty—I do not say a positive duty but under a duty—as the corporation interested in the fair and proper rating of the city of Liverpool. They are under a duty as ratepayers and under a duty as the rating authority in Liverpool. If they think that an alteration is required, they are under a duty to see that a proposal for the alteration is made. It is not for them to make the alteration because that is left now to the valuation officer. I think they are under a duty, if they know there are inequalities, or under-rating, or whatever it may be, to make proposals to have that corrected. If they are either under a duty or if it is a proper exercise of their powers to do it, and they are at liberty to do it, it seems to me that they must be at liberty to employ in such a highly technical matter as this technical advice because that is a mere incident in the performance of their various duties. For these reasons, I think this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

SHAXTED v. WARD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 25, 1954.]

Education—School attendance—Duty of parent to secure regular attendance of pupil—"Available route"—Road unsafe for unescorted children—Dangerous crossing—Education Act, 1944 (c. 31), s. 39 (5).

By the Education Act, 1944, s. 39 (2) (c), a child shall not be deemed to have failed to attend regularly at school if the school at which the child is a registered pupil is not within "walking distance" of the child's home. By s. 39 (5) walking distance means, according to the age of the child, two or three miles measured by "the nearest available route."

The appellant, the father of a child, aged six years, who had failed to attend school regularly, being charged with an offence under s. 39 (1) of the Act (which provides that, if a child of compulsory school age fails regularly to attend school, the parent of the child shall be guilty of an offence), contended that, although the direct route from the child's home to the school was within the distance laid down in s. 39 (5), part of the road was unsafe for unescorted children as it included a dangerous crossing, and, therefore, was not an "available route"; that the nearest available safe route was more than the distance laid down in s. 39 (5); and, therefore, there was a reasonable excuse for non-attendance.

HELD: distance, not safety, was the test for determining "the nearest available route", and, therefore, the school was within walking distance of the child's home, and the appellant was guilty of an offence.

FOR THE EDUCATION ACT, 1944, s. 39, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 8, p. 183.

Case referred to:

- (1) Hares v. Curtin, [1913] 2 K.B. 328; 82 L.J.K.B. 707; 108 L.T. 974; 76 J.P. 313; 19 Digest 568, 89.

CASE STATED by Kent justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Canterbury on Aug. 13, 1953, the respondent, Francis George Ward, an education welfare officer, preferred informations against each of the appellants, Bertie Herbert Harold Shaxted and Albert George Farrier, charging that each, being the parent of a child of compulsory school age, was guilty of an offence against s. 39 (1) of the Education Act, 1944, in that the child, who was a registered pupil at Preston County Primary School, failed to attend regularly thereat between Apr. 21 and June 26, 1953.

A It was proved or admitted that each of the appellants was the parent of a child of compulsory school age who was a registered pupil at the said school and failed to attend that school during the period mentioned in the information ; that each child lived in the hamlet of West Stourmouth and within the distance from the school laid down in s. 39 (5) of the Act as "walking distance" in relation to each such child respectively by the direct route; that this route was safe for the children to use if escorted, the bit of road near the school where, owing to the presence of a dangerous crossing, an escort would be desirable for small children being common to both the children in question ; that it was usual, and the duty of parents, to provide escort for their children to and from school, when necessary; that the education authority, nevertheless, arranged for an omnibus taking the children from Stourmouth to and from a secondary school at Sandwich to take the children of the appellants to and from school during B the period in question; that on the return journey the omnibus reached the school at 4.45 p.m. to pick up these children there, they having finished their lessons at 3.45 p.m.; that the appellants wanted a special omnibus from the school and would not provide an escort for their children; that another Stourmouth resident, a Mr. S., who was a co-defendant with the appellants and gave evidence, admitted that his son could have attended the school regularly, but C he had "had to stand by the other parents."

On behalf of the appellants it was contended: (i) that the direct routes were not safe for their children to use when returning from school in a party; (ii) that the afternoon bus from school was not suitable transport for the return journey; and, (iii) that, therefore, they were prevented by unavoidable cause within the meaning of s. 39 (2) (a) of the Education Act, 1944, from sending their children D to school; (iv) that the words "in relation to a child" of the ages specified in s. 39 (5) referred not merely to the words "walking distance", but that those words also governed the later words "nearest available route", limiting those words to such routes only as were safe for a child to use, that the direct routes were not safe for the children and the nearest available safe route was more than the distances specified in the section, and so the children were entitled to transport, but no suitable arrangements had been made for their transport from school. E On behalf of the respondent it was contended that "available route" meant a route which could be followed without committing trespass.

The justices were of opinion that no defence had been made out because (i) the direct routes were safe for children when escorted; (ii) there was no unavoidable cause, because the direct routes were safe if the parents had escorted their children or arranged for their escort, and also the omnibus provided was suitable in the circumstances; (iii) the suggested interpretation of the words "available route" was irrelevant because the justices held (a) that the direct routes were, in fact, safe for the children in question, and (b) that the omnibus provided from school was a "suitable arrangement" for the transport of the said children; (iv) and, further, the suggested interpretation of the words "available route" F was strained and unnatural. The justices held that the school was within walking distance of the home of each appellant so that the appellants were not entitled to transport for their children, and they convicted the appellants. The second G appellant withdrew his appeal.

Van Oss for the appellant, Shaxted.

Thesiger, Q.C., and Jupp for the respondent.

H LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The question is whether or not the school is within walking distance of the child's home. By the Education Act, 1944, s. 39 (1), a parent is guilty of an offence if his child fails to attend regularly at the school where he is a registered pupil, but by s. 39 (2):

"... the child shall not be deemed to have failed to attend regularly at the school . . . (c) if the parent proves that the school at which the child is a registered pupil is not within walking distance of the child's home, and that no suitable arrangements have been made by the local education authority either for his transport to and from the school or for boarding accommodation . . . ”

We need not deal with suitable accommodation if the school is within walking distance, which by s. 39 (5)

“ . . . means in relation to a child who has not attained the age of eight years two miles, and in the case of any other child three miles, measured by the nearest available route.”

What the justices had to decide was whether or not the school was within walking distance, and it is said that the route which the child took, and which is under two miles, is not the nearest available route because part of it is said to be dangerous for children to walk along unescorted. I cannot read the word “available” as meaning necessarily safe, because we can see how that word got into the Act. By the Elementary Education Act, 1870, s. 74 (3), it was a reasonable excuse:

“That there is no public elementary school open which the child can attend within such distance, not exceeding three miles, measured according to the nearest road from the residence of such child, as the bye-laws may prescribe.”

The Education Act, 1921, s. 49 (b) provided an identical “reasonable excuse”. Before the Act of 1921, in Hares v. Curtin (1), in which it was suggested that a cart track could not be a road and that the walking distance had not been measured according to, “the nearest road”, LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., giving judgment, said ([1913] 2 K.B. 331):

“It does not mean a road of any particular class, but simply a route from the residence of a child to the nearest school.”

In the Act of 1944 the words used in s. 39 (5) are “two miles . . . measured by the nearest available route”. I do not think they were meant to make any change in the law, except that a number of somewhat unnecessary words were cut out and there was substituted the expression which had been used in this court in Hares v. Curtin (1).

To some extent I sympathise with the views of the appellant in the present case. It may be that parents would like to bring pressure on the Kent County Council to have someone to see that this “bit of road”, as the justices call it, is safe for the children to cross—someone, for example, as is seen in London, wearing a white smock and holding a board with the words “Children Crossing, Stop”. That, however, is a matter for the education authority to consider and put into operation if it thinks fit. I can only say, speaking for myself, that a route along which a child can walk and which measures not more than two miles is “the nearest available route”. It may sometimes be unsafe. Sometimes the route might be flooded, and, if so, and the child could not walk along it, that might be a reasonable excuse for not using it on that particular day. We are not dealing with that sort of question. We are dealing with the question where the parents think it is not safe. Parliament has not substituted safety for distance as the test. Any question with regard to safety must, and, I have no doubt, will, be taken into consideration by the education authority. I think in this case the justices came to a right decision and the appeal fails.

BYRNE, J.: I agree. Counsel for the appellant contended that the meaning of the word “available” in the Education Act, 1944, s. 39 (5), is that there is no sound reason why that route should not be used by children. I am bound to say that I cannot read that meaning into that word. The “nearest available route” means the method by which the two miles are to be measured from the child’s house to the school in order to ascertain whether or not it is a walking distance.

B [PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), December 7, 8, 1953, January 19, 1954.]

Privy Council—Australia—Estate duty—“Estate of a deceased person”—Partnership—Options of surviving partners to purchase deceased’s interest—Price to be ascertained excluding goodwill—Australian Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42, s. 8 (3) (b), s. 8 (4) (e).

Estate Duty—Passing—Partnership—Options of surviving partners to purchase deceased’s interest—Price to be ascertained excluding goodwill—Whether deceased’s interest in goodwill passes or is deemed to pass—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (b).

The Australian Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42, s. 8, provides: “(1) Subject to this Act, estate duty shall be levied and paid upon the value, as assessed under this Act, of the estates of persons dying after the commencement of this Act . . . (3) For the purposes of this Act the estate of a deceased person comprises . . . (b) His personal property, wherever situate (including personal property over which he had a general power of appointment, exercised by his will), if the deceased was, at the time of his death, domiciled in Australia; . . . (4) Property . . . (e) being a beneficial interest in property which the deceased person had at the time of his decease, which beneficial interest, by virtue of a settlement or agreement made by him, passed or accrued on or after his decease to, or devolved on or after his decease upon, any other person . . . shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be part of the estate of the person so deceased”.

The deceased was a partner in a firm constituted by a deed of partnership dated Dec. 22, 1939, of which cl. 9 provided that the partnership should not be dissolved by the death or retirement of any of the partners and conferred on all save one of the surviving or continuing partners on the death or retirement of the deceased options to purchase the deceased’s share in the capital of the partnership in specified proportions. Clause 12 of the deed provided: “Upon the exercise of the respective options hereinbefore contained the purchase price payable on the exercise of such option shall be the total of the following amounts (namely):—(a) The proportionate part of the balance of assets over liabilities as disclosed in the balance sheet of the partnership in respect of the accounting year of the partnership prior to the date on which such option shall first be exercisable corresponding to the part of the interest in the partnership being purchased . . . (b) The like proportion of any real estate which shall have been acquired by the partnership between the end of the said period and the date on which the relevant option shall have been first exercisable . . . at the price at which the same shall have been acquired . . . (c) The like proportion of the profits of the partnership for the current year . . . Without affecting the generality of the foregoing provisions it is specifically agreed and declared that in computing the amount of purchase money payable on the exercise of any option no sum shall be added or taken into account for goodwill." On Jan. 28, 1944, the deceased died, and the surviving partners exercised the options conferred on them. The purchase price, ascertained in accordance with cl. 12, was fixed at £156,217 11s. 3d. No sum was taken into account for goodwill. The deceased's executor, for the purposes of the assessment of estate duty, accounted for £156,217 11s. 3d. as the value of the deceased's interest in the partnership. The Commissioner of Taxes claimed duty also on the deceased's share of goodwill under s. 8 (4) (e), for which purpose the share was agreed to be of the value of £20,000. A

HELD: the whole of the deceased's interest in the partnership assets including goodwill was assessable to duty under s. 8 (3) (b), and it followed that it could not be assessable under s. 8 (4) which dealt only with property not assessable as part of the estate falling within s. 8 (3). B

APPEAL by an executor of a will against a judgment of the Full Court of the High Court of Australia, dated May 16, 1949, affirming a judgment of WILLIAMS, J., in the High Court of Australia, dated Mar. 8, 1949. The facts appear in the judgment. F

Cross, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the appellant.

S. Pascoe Hayward, Q.C., and V. M. C. Pennington for the respondent.

Jan. 19. LORD COHEN: This appeal relates to an assessment made by the respondent under the Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42, in respect of the estate of the late Frederick Charles Henry Thomas (hereinafter called Mr. Thomas) who died on Jan. 28, 1944. The appellant is the executor of his will. The principal asset of the testator was his interest in a firm carrying on business as furniture warehouseman under the name and style of "Maples" pursuant to a deed of partnership made Dec. 22, 1939, as modified by a supplementary agreement dated Dec. 4, 1940, the other partners being Robert Nathan, Mrs. Louisa Jones, Mrs. Lorna Hannon, Lionel Newton, Lauri Joseph Newton and Donald Lamond. G

Clause 5 of the deed provided that the capital of the partnership (thereinafter called the capital) should consist of the then existing assets of the partnership. Their Lordships pause here to observe that the parties agreed that, despite this definition, the expression "the capital", so far as the question now at issue is concerned, meant the capital as at the date of the death of Mr. Thomas. Clause 6 H defined the interests of each partner in the capital and allotted to Mr. Thomas 19½ per cent. thereof. Clause 8 provided that the net profits of the business should be divided between the partners in proportion to their respective shares from time to time in the capital. Clause 9 provided that the partnership should not be dissolved by the death or retirement of any of the partners and contained provisions defining as regards each partner what was to happen in the event of his or her death or retirement. So far as Mr. Thomas was concerned the clause conferred options on the surviving or continuing partners, other than Donald Lamond, to purchase Mr. Thomas' share in the capital in specified proportions, the details of which are not material to the issues their Lordships have to decide. Clause 12 defines how the purchase price is to be ascertained in the event of any of the options being exercised, and is in the following terms:

- A “Upon the exercise of the respective options hereinbefore contained the purchase price payable on the exercise of such option shall be the total of the following amounts (namely):—(a) The proportionate part of the balance of assets over liabilities as disclosed in the balance sheet of the partnership in respect of the accounting year of the partnership prior to the date on which such option shall first be exercisable corresponding to the part of the interest in the partnership being purchased Provided always that if in compiling the relevant balance sheet the value of the book debts shall not have been treated as 15s. for each pound of the actual debts owing at the end of the period in respect of which such balance sheet shall have been compiled the said balance of assets over liabilities shown by the relevant balance sheet shall be adjusted by taking the said book debts into the said balance sheet at a value of 15s. for each pound; and (b) The like proportion of any real estate which shall have been acquired by the partnership between the end of the said period and the date on which the relevant option shall have been first exercisable (hereinafter called the current year) at the price at which the same shall have been acquired plus any amounts expended thereon by the partnership during the current year less any liability existing on such real estate to the vendor thereof or under any mortgage thereover. (c) The like proportion of the profits of the partnership for the current year ascertained in the manner provided in cl. 13 hereof. Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that the balance sheet signed by the parties hereto at the time of the execution of these presents shall be deemed to be the balance sheet of the partnership for the accounting year of the partnership ended on Feb. 28, 1939. Without affecting the generality of the foregoing provisions it is specifically agreed and declared that in computing the amount of purchase money payable on the exercise of any option no sum shall be added or taken into account for goodwill.”

- Clause 14 gave a person exercising an option the right to pay the purchase money by instalments, and provided for interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on any balance for the time being unpaid. It also provided that, on the exercise of any option, the purchaser should be deemed to have acquired the interest in respect of which the option had been exercised as from the date that such option shall have been given or deemed to have been given—in the present case, in the events which happened as from the date of the death of Mr. Thomas. Clause 19 fixed the end of each accounting year of the partnership as Feb. 28.
- H The terms of the supplementary agreement are not material to any issue their Lordships have to decide.

Mr. Thomas having died on Jan. 28, 1944, the partners who survived him duly exercised the options conferred on them. The purchase price was ascertained in accordance with the provisions of cl. 12 of the partnership deed and was fixed at £156,217 11s. 3d. In accordance with the last sentence of that clause no sum was added or taken into account for goodwill. The purchase price was duly paid.

It will be convenient at this stage to refer to the relevant provisions of the Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42. Section 8 so far as is material is in the following terms :

" (1) Subject to this Act, estate duty shall be levied and paid upon the value, as assessed under this Act, of the estates of persons dying after the commencement of this Act . . . (3) For the purposes of this Act the estate of a deceased person comprises . . . (b) His personal property, wherever situate (including personal property over which he had a general power of appointment, exercised by his will), if the deceased was, at the time of his death, domiciled in Australia; . . . (4) Property . . . (e) being a beneficial interest in property which the deceased person had at the time of his decease, which beneficial interest, by virtue of a settlement or agreement made by him, passed or accrued on or after his decease to, or devolved on or after his decease upon, any other person . . . shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be part of the estate of the person so deceased."

Settlement is defined by s. 3 as follows :

" 'Settlement' means a conveyance, transfer, appointment under power, declaration of trust, or other non-testamentary disposition of property made by any person either before or after the commencement of this Act containing trusts or dispositions to take effect after the death of the settlor or any other person dying after the commencement of this Act."

Section 10 imposes on the administrator of a deceased person the duty of preparing and furnishing in the prescribed form a statement setting forth a full and complete return of all the estate in Australia of the deceased person. Section 15 imposes on the respondent the duty of making an assessment for the purpose of ascertaining the duty payable. Section 24 entitles an administrator who is dissatisfied with an assessment so made to lodge with the respondent notice of objection within thirty days after service of the notice of assessment. If the administrator is dissatisfied with the decision of the respondent on his objection, he has alternative remedies, the remedy relevant to the present case being a right to request the respondent to treat his objection as an appeal and to forward it to the High Court. Section 27 (1) provides that the appeal shall be heard by a single justice. By s. 27 (3) it is provided that the objector shall be limited, on the hearing of an appeal, to the grounds stated in his objection.

The appellant duly made a return pursuant to s. 10 on June 20, 1944. In the statement of assets annexed thereto there appears the following entry:

"Interest in a partnership, as per balance sheet and valuations, as per schedule No. 9 £156,217 11s. 3d."

Schedule No. 9 is in the following terms:

"Interest in a partnership

Value of deceased's $19\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest in the partnership known as Maples

£156,217 11s. 3d.

(The amount set out is the amount at which the executor of the deceased is obliged to sell the deceased's interest in the said partnership pursuant to partnership deed dated Dec. 22, 1939, under which all but one of the surviving partners have the option of purchasing the interest of the deceased.)"

On Feb. 14, 1947, the respondent served notice of assessment on the appellant together with a federal estate duty alteration sheet which showed the alterations made in the assessable value shown in the return lodged. These included the following additions:

"Interest in partnership of Maples undervalued

The last addition was, their Lordships think, made in this form as the result of the decision of the Full Court of the High Court in Trustees Executors & Agency Co., Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1). The judgment in that case was given on Aug. 1, 1944, in a matter relating to the estate of James Brown Milne, deceased, and their Lordships will refer to the case hereafter as "Milne's case". Milne was a partner in the firm of John Sanderson & Co. and the partnership deed was similar in every material respect to the partnership deed in the present case. On Milne's death his partners exercised their option to take over his share in the partnership capital at a price ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the deed, which included a provision that, on the death, retirement or expulsion of a partner, no allowance should be made to him or his representatives in respect of the value of the goodwill of the business. The court by a majority (RICH, STARKE and WILLIAMS, J.J.), LATHAM, C.J., and McTIERNAN, J., dissenting, held that, within the meaning of s. 8 (4) (e) of the Act, the deceased partner at the time of his death had a beneficial interest in the goodwill which, on or after his death, by virtue of the partnership agreement passed, or accrued to, or devolved on, the surviving partners. Their Lordships will have to return later to Milne's case (1), but they pause here to observe that it was not argued in that case that Milne's interest in the goodwill fell to be assessed under s. 8 (3). It seems to have been common ground between the parties, and to have been accepted by both majority and minority of the court, that, while Milne's interest in the other assets of the partnership was assessable under s. 8 (3) (b), his interest in goodwill was assessable, if at all, only under s. 8 (4) (e). The majority held that it was so assessable, but the minority were of opinion that, having regard to the terms of the partnership deed, it ceased on the death of a partner and, therefore, could not fall within s. 8 (4) (e).

On Mar. 14, 1947, the appellant lodged notice of objection pursuant to s. 24 of the Act. It is clear from the terms of that notice that it was primarily directed to supporting the view of the minority in Milne's case (1), but, having in mind a submission that was made by counsel for the respondent, their Lordships would call attention to para. 23, para. 24 and para. 25 of the notice of objection which were in the following terms:

"23.—That as at the date of his death the interest of the deceased was a right to receive the purchase price payable upon the exercise of the options contained in the articles of partnership in respect of the said firm, dated Dec. 22, 1939, as amended by indenture dated Dec. 4, 1940, made between the partners of the said firm, and on the exercise of the said options no amount was payable in respect of goodwill. 24.—That the interest of the deceased in the assets of the partnership ceased at the date of death of deceased conditionally upon the exercise of the said options and payment of the purchase price which options have been exercised and which purchase money has been paid. 25.—That the estate of deceased is not dutiable in respect of any proportion of goodwill of the said firm of Maples pursuant to s. 8 (4) (e), or any other provision, of the Estate Duty Assessment Act."

On Jan. 29, 1948, the respondent disallowed the objection. On Mar. 4, 1948, the appellant required the respondent to treat the objection as an appeal and to forward it to the High Court.

The appeal came before WILLIAMS, J., on Mar. 8, 1949, Mr. J. B. Tait, K.C., appearing for the appellant and Mr. T. W. Smith, K.C., appearing for the respondent. In the transcript of the proceedings there appears the following passage from Mr. Tait's opening speech:

"That being cleared up, it left one matter in dispute between the parties, the matter now before the court. That is the question of goodwill, namely, that, in valuing that asset of the deceased which consisted of his interest in the partnership, account should be taken of the value of the goodwill. The parties have gone further. They have agreed upon what that value would be if it should be included, and the figure is £20,000. This matter was the subject of a decision in this court in Milne's case (1) comparatively recently."

Mr. Smith for the respondent said that the respondent would not be relying on any other provisions of the Act apart from s. 8 (4), though he might wish at some later stage to rely on grounds not precisely in accordance with the views of the majority in Milne's case (1). At the conclusion of the argument the transcript records the following observations:

"Mr. Tait: I mentioned, I think, the parties had agreed, if the value of this goodwill was to be included, the figures should be £20,000. Perhaps that could be taken as a mutual admission.

"Mr. Smith: That has been agreed to, £20,000 as the value of the share of the goodwill if it be taxable.

"His Honour: Very well."

On the same day WILLIAMS, J., delivered judgment dismissing the appeal. The material portion of his judgment was in the following terms:

"The respondent, without giving up any other contentions open to him upon the true construction of the Act, contends that it forms part of his [the testator's] notional estate within the meaning of s. 8 (4) (e) of the Act. It seems to me necessarily to follow from Milne's case (1) that this contention must succeed. I must therefore order that the appeal be dismissed with costs."

The appellant appealed to the Full Court, who dismissed the appeal saying:

"It is conceded that this appeal must fail unless the court is prepared to reconsider and to overrule the decision in Trustees Executors & Agency Co., Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1). The decisions of a superior court have a double aspect. They determine the controversy between the parties, and in deciding the case they may include a statement of principle which it is the duty of that court and of all subordinate courts to apply in cases to which that principle is relevant. Continuity and coherence in the law demand that, particularly in this court, which is the highest court of appeal in Australia, the principle of stare decisis should be applied, save in very exceptional cases. The court is not bound by its previous decisions so as absolutely to preclude re-consideration of a principle approved and applied in a prior case but, as was stated in Cain v. Malone (2), the exceptions to the rule are exceptions which should be allowed only with great caution and in clear cases. BARTON, J., in the Tramways case (3) which has been referred to by Mr. Tait, said (18 C.L.R. 69): 'I have never thought that it was not open to this court to review its previous decisions upon good cause. The question is not whether the court can do so, but whether it will, having due regard to the need for continuity and consistency in judicial decision.' His Honour proceeded to say: 'Changes in the number of appointed justices'—(and I would add, changes in the personnel of the Bench which happens to deal with the first case or a second case)—'can, I take it, never of themselves furnish a reason for review.' His Honour continued: 'But the court can always listen to argument as to whether it ought to review a particular decision, and the strongest reason for an overruling is that a decision is manifestly wrong, and its maintenance is injurious to the public interest.' In the present case, there are no circumstances which would justify, in accordance with those principles, an overruling of the decision in the Trustees Executors case (1). The only circumstance which is really relied upon for the purpose of persuading the court to reconsider the decision is that it was a majority decision. This is plainly an insufficient ground for asking the court to overrule a previous considered decision of five justices. It may be that considerations are present in constitutional cases, where Parliament is not in a position to change the law, which do not arise in other cases. In what I have said I make no reference to constitutional cases. The consequence is that, if the court adheres, as it should, to the decision in the Trustees Executors case (1) the appeal must fail."

Their Lordships have thought it desirable to set out in full the judgment of the Full Court in order to make it clear that neither in Milne's case (1), nor in the present case, was any argument addressed to the High Court in support of the proposition advanced before their Lordships that the deceased's interest in goodwill was part of his estate as being personal property within s. 8 (3) (b) and could not, therefore, be property not actually forming part of the estate but only deemed to be part of the estate under s. 8 (4).

From this decision the appellant appeals to this Board pursuant to special leave granted by His late Majesty on May 24, 1950. The reasons given by the appellant in this case for inviting your Lordships to reverse the decision of the High Court were directed, in the main, to supporting the views of the minority in Milne's case (1), but reason 3 was in the following terms:

"Because under the partnership agreement in the events which happened the deceased had no interest in the specific assets of the partnership after his death but only the right to receive the purchase price payable by the survivors."

The reasons advanced by the respondent in support of the judgment in the court below were intended primarily to support the judgment of the majority in Milne's case (1), but in para. 25 of his Case the respondent intimated his intention of advancing in the alternative the following contention:

"(i) That the deceased had at his death an undivided share in all the assets of the partnership. (ii) That the concluding words of the proviso to cl. 12 of the partnership deed did not have the effect of divesting the deceased on his death of his share in the goodwill as one of those partnership assets. (iii) That, consequently, the deceased's said undivided share of the goodwill was as much part of his personal property within the meaning of s. 8 (3) (b) of the Act as was his undivided share in any other asset of the partnership, and, on the subsequent purchase of his share in the partnership, his undivided share in the goodwill passed to the purchasers in the same way as did his undivided share in all the other assets of the partnership. (iv) That in assessing, pursuant to s. 8 (1) of the Act, the value of such part of the estate of the deceased as consisted of the deceased's share in the partnership, the respondent was not bound to accept as such value the price paid by the other partners when they subsequently purchased that share. (v) That such purchase was in effect, and to the extent of £20,000, made at an undervalue, such £20,000 being the agreed value of the deceased's share in the goodwill. (vi) That, in consequence, the assessment is right."

When the case came before their Lordships, counsel for the appellant attacked the reasoning of the majority in Milne's case (1) but he did not seek to defend the reasoning of the minority. He argued that Mr. Thomas's interest in the goodwill was only part of his interest in the partnership assets and that the whole of such interest was part of the personal property forming part of Mr. Thomas's estate and fell within s. 8 (3) (b). Counsel for the respondent did not seek to support that part of the judgments of the majority in Milne's case (1) which was based on a severance between the deceased's interest in goodwill and his interest in the other partnership assets: see, e.g., where STARKE, J., said (69 C.L.R. 286):

"The question whether the commissioner was right in so including the value of the goodwill in his assessment depends upon several provisions of the Estate Duty Assessment Act. By s. 8 (3) (b) the estate of a deceased person comprises, inter alia, his personal property if the deceased was at the time of his death domiciled in Australia. No doubt the partnership interest of the deceased was part of his estate, yet that interest did not include goodwill, for the partnership deed itself expressly provided that no allowance should be made to the deceased or his representatives in respect of the value of the goodwill of the business."

Counsel for the respondent argued that the whole of the deceased's interest in the partnership assets, including goodwill, fell to be assessed under s. 8 (4) (e). Their Lordships' reasons for rejecting this argument will appear sufficiently from the reasons which their Lordships will now proceed to give for thinking that Milne's case (1) was wrongly decided.

In Milne's case (1) three questions were submitted for the opinion of the Full Court, the first and third of which were as follows (ibid., 276):

"(1) Whether the dutiable estate of the testator included any and if any what interest in the goodwill of the said partnership. (3) Whether the testator had at the time of his death any beneficial interest in the said goodwill which by virtue of the said indenture of partnership passed or accrued on or after his death or devolved on or after his death on any of the said surviving partners of the said firm of Sanderson & Co."

It is clear from the judgments that the Full Court treated the first question as asking whether the interest of the deceased in goodwill was dutiable under s. 8 (3). All the judges answered question (1) in the negative except RICH, J., who found it unnecessary to answer the question. The majority answered question (3) in the affirmative. It is clear from their judgments that all the judges, with the possible exception of RICH, J., proceeded on the basis that the deceased's estate never became entitled to a share in the value of the goodwill, and that the majority regarded the deceased's share in goodwill as something severable from his interest in the other assets of the partnership and passing or accruing to another person under s. 8 (4) (e). Their Lordships are unable to accept either of these propositions. In their Lordships' opinion the interest of Milne in all the partnership assets including goodwill vested in his administrator on his death although his executors would be bound, if the option were exercised, to transfer that interest to the purchaser at the price fixed in accordance with the partnership deed. For this reason, their Lordships accept the alternative proposition advanced by counsel for the respondent, with which counsel for the appellant did not quarrel, that the whole of the deceased's interest in the partnership property, including goodwill, was assessable to duty under s. 8 (3) (b). Being so assessable, it necessarily follows that that interest cannot be assessable under s. 8 (4), which deals only with property not actually assessable as part of the estate falling within s. 8 (3), but which is to be deemed to form a part of the estate.

This conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the matter so far as the respondent's case rests on s. 8 (4) (e), but their Lordships feel bound to add that they feel grave doubt whether, considering only the language of s. 8 (4) (e), the respondent can bring the facts of this case within it. To do so he must rely on the exercise of the option, for it is plain that, if it is not exercised, s. 8 (4) (e) will have no application. That option under cl. 9 of the partnership deed is to be deemed to have been given by the legal personal representatives of Mr. Thomas, and, on its being exercised, there comes into being a contract of sale between them and the option holders. Such a transaction seems to their Lordships somewhat remote from a transaction of the kind which the language of s. 8 (4) (e) appears to contemplate.

In Milne's case (1) LATHAM, C.J. (69 C.L.R. 282), one of the minority, relied on the decision of HAMILTON, J., in A.-G. v. Boden (4), for the proposition that where a partnership deed provides that no allowance for goodwill should be made to a partner or his estate on his death his interest in the goodwill did not pass on his death. In A.-G. v. Boden (4) the deceased had carried on business in partnership with his sons under a deed which contained a provision that on his death his share was to accrue to his sons in equal shares subject only to their paying out to his representatives the value of his share as at the date of his death ascertained by proper valuation without any valuation of, or allowance for, goodwill. The Crown claimed duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (b), on the footing that the deceased's interest in goodwill was property in which the deceased had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased. The defendant claimed that the share in goodwill passed on the death of the deceased under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, and, therefore, could not fall within the ambit of s. 2, in view of the decision of the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5). They submitted, however, that it was really unnecessary to decide this point since the transaction between the father and his sons fell within the ambit of s. 3 (1) of the Act which exempts from duty property passing on the death of a deceased by reason only of a bona fide purchase from the person under whose disposition the property passes, where such purchase was made for full consideration in money or money's worth paid to the vendor for his own use and benefit. HAMILTON, J., upheld this submission. His decision on this point would have been sufficient to dispose of the case, but he also dealt with the other point which he described ([1912] 1 K.B. 555) as a minor point. On this, he came to the conclusion (ibid., 556) that the case fell within s. 2 (1) (b) and not within s. 1. Their Lordships are unable to agree with this view. In their opinion, the deceased partner's interest in goodwill in such a case must pass with his interest in the other assets to his legal personal representative and the fact that its value is not to be taken into account in calculating the price receivable by the estate for his interest in the partnership is irrelevant.

Counsel for the respondent, however, submitted that, even if their Lordships came to the conclusion they have indicated, their Lordships ought to dismiss the appeal either (a) on the ground that the record of the hearing before WILLIAMS, J., indicated an agreement that, if the share in goodwill formed part of the assessable estate (and their Lordships have indicated that it is assessable property under s. 8 (3)), its value was agreed at £20,000; and (b) on the ground that the contention advanced by counsel for the appellant which their Lordships consider well founded, viz.: that the share in goodwill was assessable only under s. 8 (3), was not open to the appellant as it was not to be found either in the reasons in their case or in their notice of objection.

So far as the first of these points is concerned, counsel for the respondent himself said that there are three possible views as to the ambit of the agreement: (i) that the parties were envisaging that Mr. Thomas's share in the goodwill was assessable under s. 8 (4), but his interest in the other assets was assessable under s. 8 (3), in which event the agreed value would not apply if his share in all the assets were assessable under s. 8 (3). (ii) that the agreed value was to apply if the deceased's share in all the assets, including goodwill, fell within s. 8 (4) (e). (iii) that the agreed value was binding no matter under which sub-section the deceased's share in the assets fell to be assessed. Seeing that the parties were obviously dealing with the matter on the footing that the issue would depend on whether the majority or the minority view in Milne's case (1) was to prevail, the first of these alternatives seems the most probable, but their Lordships were informed that there was some correspondence relating to the agreement which was not available to their Lordships. In these circumstances, their Lordships are not prepared to say more than that it would obviously be improper for them to hold that the appellant is precluded by the agreement from succeeding on this appeal.

On the second point, their Lordships need not spend any time in examining the appellant's case, for their Lordships are satisfied that, if the contention advanced by counsel for the appellant was within the ambit of the notice of objection, it is sufficiently covered by his third reason to which their Lordships have already referred. If, however, it was not within this notice of objection a question of jurisdiction would arise, since s. 27 (3) of the Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42, limits the objector to grounds stated in his objection. Had the appellant confined his notice of objection to stating as his ground that (see para. 25 of the notice of objection),

“ the estate of deceased is not dutiable in respect of any proportion of goodwill of the said firm of Maples pursuant to s. 8 (4) (e) ” A

there could have been no doubt but that the appellant was entitled to argue that it could not be deemed to be part of the estate under s. 8 (4) (e), because it was actually part of the estate under s. 8 (3). Counsel for the respondent submits that the appellant is deprived of his right to present this argument because, as he says, the preceding paragraphs show that para. 25 was not directed to this point. Their Lordships, however, think that the necessary foundation for the argument is to be found in para. 23, para. 24 and para. 25 when read together, and must, therefore, refuse to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the argument falls outside the grounds stated in the objection. B

Counsel for the appellant invited their Lordships, if they reached this conclusion, to allow the appeal and amend the assessment by striking out the £20,000 added under s. 8 (4) (e) in respect of the deceased's proportion of the goodwill of Maples. Their Lordships are not prepared to adopt this course, which would mean that the respondent could only claim duty in respect of this item under s. 8 (3) if he could make a new assessment. Their Lordships do not know whether this would be possible or not, and do not find it necessary to investigate the possibility. The appellant has succeeded only on a ground which was not argued either before WILLIAMS, J., or before the Full Court. In these circumstances, their Lordships consider that the proper course to adopt is to declare that the deceased's interest in the goodwill, as in the other assets of the partnership, is part of the testator's estate within s. 8 (3), and is not to be deemed to be part thereof under s. 8 (4), and to remit the matter to the High Court to make such order as the High Court may think fit on the footing of this declaration. This order will enable the parties to advance before the High Court such arguments as they may think proper, having regard to that declaration. In particular, but without restricting in any way the generality of the arguments, (i) it will enable the respondent to allege that the agreement [referred to before WILLIAMS, J.] binds the appellant to accept the figure of £20,000 as the value of the deceased's interest in the goodwill under whatever sub-section it is held to form part of the assessable estate; (ii) it will enable the appellant to allege (a) that the respondent is bound by the valuation made pursuant to the partnership deed which represents the utmost the estate can ever receive; alternatively (b) that if it is open to the respondent to go behind the figure thus ascertained, the existence of the option must be taken into account in arriving at the value of Mr. Thomas's interest in the partnership assets. Both these points were raised before their Lordships, but in view of the advice which their Lordships propose to tender to Her Majesty, their Lordships express no opinion thereon. D E F

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to allow the appeal, and set aside the orders of WILLIAMS, J., and of the Full Court, and to declare that the share and interest of the late Frederick Charles Henry Thomas in the assets of the firm or partnership carried on under the name or style of “ Maples ”, including the goodwill thereof, was part of his estate within s. 8 (3) of the Estate Duty Assessment Act, 1914-42, and that no part of such share or interest is to be deemed to be part of his said estate under sub-s. (4) of the said section, and to refer this matter back to the High Court of Australia to reconsider the objection of the appellant to the assessment made by the respondent in the light of the declaration aforesaid, and, in particular, but without prejudice G H to the generality of the foregoing, to determine (a) whether any binding agreement has been made between the appellant and the respondent which fixed the value of the said share and interest of the said Frederick Charles Henry Thomas in the business and assets of the said firm, including the goodwill thereof, and if not (b) what value ought to be placed thereon under s. 8 (1) of the said Act having regard to all relevant circumstances. If, on such re-consideration by the High Court, the appellant secures a reduction in the assessed value of the said estate, the respondent shall pay the appellant's costs of the appeal to this Board. If the appellant fails to secure such reduction, each party shall pay his own costs of such appeal. The costs of all the proceedings in the High Court of Australia are to be in the discretion of that court.

Appeal allowed.

C AUSTRALIA (COMMONWEALTH) COMMISSIONER OF TAXATION v. SQUATTING INVESTMENT CO., LTD.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Porter, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), November 25, 26, 30, December 1, 2, 3, 1953, January 21, 1954.]

D Privy Council—Australia—Income tax—Income—Trade receipt—Compulsory acquisition of wool by government—Price paid on appraisalment—Subsequent voluntary additional payment—Income Tax Assessment Act, 1936-49, s. 25.

The respondents carried on business as wool growers. Wool grown by them in the seasons 1939-40 to 1945-46 inclusive was acquired by the Commonwealth government pursuant to an arrangement ("the wool purchase arrangement") made in 1939 (at the outbreak of war) between the Commonwealth government and the United Kingdom government by which the latter government purchased all wool produced in Australia for the period of the war and one full wool year thereafter, except wool required in Australia. It was a term of the wool purchase arrangement that the United Kingdom government and the Commonwealth government would divide equally between them any profit arising from the re-sale outside the United Kingdom of wool purchased by the United Kingdom government under the arrangement. A central wool committee was set up, and also a State wool committee for each State in Australia, by the National Security (Wool) Regulations which provided for the appraisalment of wool by the committees and also provided that any moneys which might be received by the central wool committee from the government of Great Britain under the wool purchase arrangement over and above the purchase price payable by such government for the wool which might arise should be dealt with as the central wool committee should in its absolute discretion determine. Any person owning or controlling or having possession of any wool was bound to submit it for appraisalment. From the inception of the wool purchase arrangement, the central wool committee contemplated that the share of the Commonwealth government of any profit to arise should be paid to the wool growers (i.e., those supplying shorn wool), and wool supplied by them was listed in the brokers' appraisalment catalogues as "participating" wool. The respondents were suppliers of participating wool. In 1945 an agreement ("the disposals plan") was reached between the United Kingdom government and Dominion governments, including the Commonwealth government, whereunder a joint organisation was set up to dispose of stocks of wool accumulated in the United Kingdom. Each Dominion government was to purchase a half share in the stocks of wool from their respective Dominions (at cost less accumulated profits from sales of wool outside the United Kingdom), and was to receive half the net proceeds of sale of that wool on its being sold outside the United Kingdom. Payment for this half share was to be made by each Dominion government within four years and each Dominion government's half share in the proceeds of sale by the joint organisation was to be applied in payment of the amount so payable. The operations of the joint organisation in respect of Australian wool resulted in large profits, and the Wool Realisation (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, was passed to provide for distribution. The Act provided by s. 6 (1) for the declaration from time to time of amounts available for distribution, and by s. 7 (1) provided that an amount equal to each declared amount should be distributed. Section 7 (2) provided that out of each amount to be distributed there should be payable in relation to any participating wool an amount which bore to the amount to be distributed the same proportion as the appraised value of that wool bore to the total of the appraised values of all participating wool. Section 7 (3) provided for the payment to be made to the person who supplied the wool for appraisal. On Nov. 30, 1949, under s. 7, £22,851 was paid to the respondents, who still carried on their business as suppliers of wool. They were assessed to income tax on that sum.

HELD: the sum paid to the respondents was an additional payment voluntarily made to them for wool supplied for appraisal, or, if the compulsory acquisition could properly be described as a sale, a voluntary addition made by the Commonwealth to the purchase price of the wool, and in the respondents' hands it was a trade receipt of an income nature, assessable to income tax under the Income Tax Assessment Act, 1936-49, s. 25.

APPEAL by the Commissioner of Taxation of the Commonwealth of Australia against an order of the Full Court of the High Court of Australia, dated Apr. 13, 1953, on a Case stated by SIR OWEN DIXON, C.J., dated July 3, 1952. The facts appear in the judgment.

Sir Hartley Shawcross, Q.C., Heyworth Talbot, Q.C., A. D. G. Adam, Q.C. (of the Australian Bar), Brungate and F. N. Bucher for the appellant.

D. J. Menzies, Q.C., and K. A. Aickin (both of the Australian Bar) for the respondents.

Jan. 21. LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: On Nov. 30, 1949, the respondents received the sum of £22,851 as their share of an interim distribution made by the Australian wool realisation commission pursuant to the Wool Realisation (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948. The respondents were assessed to income tax on this sum as being part of their assessable income derived during the year ending Dec. 31, 1949. The respondents objected to the inclusion of the said sum in the assessment, and the objection was treated as an appeal and forwarded to the High Court under s. 187 of the Income Tax Assessment Act, 1936-1949. SIR OWEN DIXON, C.J., stated a Case for the opinion of the Full Court of the High Court, under s. 198 of the same Act. The questions for the opinion of the Full Court were as follows:

- A “(i) Is the said sum of £22,851 . . . assessable income of the appellant within the meaning of the Income Tax Assessment Act, 1936-1949? (ii) If so, was the said amount part of its assessable income in the year ended Dec. 31, 1949, or in some other and what year or years?”

B The Full Court by a majority (McTIERNAN, WILLIAMS and WEBB, JJ.; FULLAGAR and KITTO, JJ., dissenting) answered question (i) in the negative. The case was then remitted to the High Court and KITTO, J., in accordance with the answer given by the Full Court, ordered that the sum in question be excluded from the assessable income of the respondents.

C The commissioner appeals by special leave from the decision of the Full Court and the consequent order of KITTO, J., and contends that the sum in question is taxable under s. 25 of the Income Tax Assessment Act, which is in the following terms, so far as material:

“(1) The assessable income of a taxpayer shall include—(a) where the taxpayer is a resident—the gross income derived directly or indirectly from all sources whether in or out of Australia . . . which is not exempt income.”

D The commissioner also relied in the alternative on the following clauses of s. 26:

E “The assessable income of a taxpayer shall include—(a) profit arising from the sale by the taxpayer of any property acquired by him for the purpose of profit-making by sale, or from the carrying on or carrying out of any profit-making undertaking or scheme . . . (g) any bounty or subsidy received in or in relation to the carrying on of a business, and such bounty or subsidy shall be deemed to be part of the proceeds of that business.”

F The relevant facts are fully stated in the Case Stated, and may be summarised for the purpose of the present appeal as follows: The respondents own pastoral properties in the States of New South Wales and Queensland and on such properties they carry on (inter alia) the business of wool growers. This business was carried on by the respondents during the years 1939 to 1946 inclusive, and the wool grown by the respondents in the seven wool seasons 1939-40 to 1945-46 inclusive was acquired by the Commonwealth pursuant to the National Security (Wool) Regulations (Statutory Rules, 1939, No. 108). These regulations were made for the purpose of carrying out an arrangement (hereafter referred to as G “the wool purchase arrangement”) made between the United Kingdom government and the Commonwealth government at the outbreak of war in 1939, by which the United Kingdom government purchased all wool produced in Australia for the period of the war and one full wool year thereafter, except wool required for the purpose of woollen manufacture in Australia. One of the terms of the wool purchase arrangement was that the United Kingdom government and the Commonwealth government would divide equally any profit H arising from the re-sale outside the United Kingdom of wool purchased by the United Kingdom government under the arrangement. A central wool committee, and also a State wool committee for each State, was set up by the wool regulations. The following regulations should be set out in full:

“Wool acquired by Commonwealth when submitted for appraisalment

15.—The sale of wool shall be by appraisalment under these regulations and the property in every parcel of wool submitted for appraisalment shall pass to the Commonwealth when the final appraisement thereof is completed in the manner prescribed by the instructions of the central wool committee governing appraisement.

"Table of limits of appraisement types

16.—For the purpose of appraising wool according to description the central wool committee shall cause to be prepared a table of limits or lists of appraisement types of wool.

"Regard to be had to price in preparation of table of limits

17.—In the preparation of such a table of limits regard shall be had to the price payable by the government of Great Britain to the government of the Commonwealth under the arrangement between those governments and the limits shall be so fixed as to ensure that the price per pound payable by the government of Great Britain for the wool of any wool year will not be exceeded by the average price per pound of the total payments made pursuant to the appraisement of that wool.

"State wool committees to carry out appraisement

18.—Each state wool committee shall under the directions of the central wool committee carry out all arrangements for the appraisement of wool.

"All wool to be submitted for appraisement

19.—(1) All wool shall be submitted for appraisement. (2) If any person owning or controlling or having possession of any wool fails to submit it for appraisement he shall be guilty of an offence . . .

"Purchase of wool for woollen manufacture

23.—(1) Any person desirous of obtaining wool for the purpose of woollen manufacture in the Commonwealth may apply to the central wool committee for authority to purchase wool and the central wool committee may authorise the purchase of the wool subject to such conditions as it may think fit to impose . . .

"Finance

30.—(1) All moneys payable by the government of Great Britain under the arrangement made by that government with the Commonwealth for acquiring Australian wool shall be received by the central wool committee and out of such moneys the central wool committee shall defray all costs, charges and expenses of administering these regulations, and make the payments for wool to the suppliers. (2) Any moneys which may be received by the Central Wool Committee from the government of Great Britain under or in consequence of such arrangement over and above the purchase price payable by such government thereunder for the wool and any surplus which may arise shall be dealt with as the central wool committee shall in its absolute discretion determine."

In pursuance of the regulations, the Commonwealth acquired the whole of the Australian wool clip in each year during the war and the suppliers of the wool duly received the whole of the compensation moneys to which they were legally entitled under the regulations. It is unnecessary for the present purpose to refer to the "flat rate adjustment" and the "retention moneys" which are mentioned in the Stated Case. The United Kingdom government re-sold part of the wool purchased by it to other countries, and established in its books an account entitled "Divisible profits account" from which could be ascertained the profit divisible equally between the United Kingdom government and the Commonwealth government under the wool purchase arrangement.

Paragraph 26 of the Stated Case states as follows, so far as material for the present purpose:

"For the purpose of the administration of the regulations there was a basic distinction which separated all wool into two categories. This is the

A distinction between wool obtained from shearing of live sheep, i.e., 'shorn wool,' and wool obtained from the skins of slaughtered sheep, i.e. 'skin wool . . .' From the inception of the wool purchase arrangement the central wool committee contemplated that the Commonwealth government's share of any profit to arise should, if there were any profit, be paid to the wool growers, i.e., the suppliers of shorn wool and not to the suppliers of skin wool. Shorn wool was, therefore, classified as 'participating wool,' i.e., wool the suppliers of which were, according to the intention of the central wool committee, entitled to participate in the Commonwealth government's share of any profit to arise under the wool purchase arrangement, . . . The suppliers of skin wool . . . were not intended by the central wool committee to participate in any profit. Skin wool was, therefore, listed as 'non-participating.' Accordingly, all wool submitted for appraisal was, in addition to being appraised according to type and yield under the table of limits, listed in the broker's appraisal catalogues as 'participating' or 'non-participating.' "

The wool submitted by the respondents was listed as "participating" wool and their Lordships think it can fairly be inferred that this fact, coupled with the terms of reg. 30 (2), must have led the respondents to hope, if not to expect, that the central wool committee might make further payments to them in exercise of the discretion vested in that committee by reg. 30 (2). For a summary of the subsequent events leading up to the passing of the Wool Realization (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, it is convenient to quote three paragraphs of the Case Stated :

C

D " 30.—As a result of negotiations conducted in the year 1945, an agreement was reached between the United Kingdom government, the Commonwealth government and the governments of South Africa and New Zealand upon a plan for the winding-up of the wartime wool purchase arrangements and the disposal of the large stocks of wool held by the United Kingdom government without unduly disturbing the marketing or depressing the price of future wool clips. The agreement so reached was called the 'disposals plan' and is set out in the schedule to the Wool Realization Act, 1945 (Act No. 49 of 1945). Pursuant to that agreement, the United Kingdom government arranged for the formation of United Kingdom—Dominion Wool Disposals, Ltd., a company incorporated in the United Kingdom (commonly called the 'joint organization') and each of the other governments, set up by a subsidiary of the joint organization. The Australian subsidiary is the Australian wool realization commission set up by the Wool Realization Act, 1945. 31.—The joint organization was established in 1945 and commenced operations as from Aug. 1, 1945. The task of the joint organization was the disposal of the accumulated surplus of dominion wool purchased during the war by the United Kingdom government. The stocks held by the United Kingdom government on Aug. 1, 1945, and taken over by the joint organization on that date amounted to 10,407,000 bales of which 6,796,000 bales were Australian wool purchased from the Commonwealth by the United Kingdom government under the wool purchase arrangement. It was agreed that the three dominion governments concerned should each acquire a half interest in the stocks of wool from their respective dominions held by the United Kingdom government and that the value of such stocks for the purposes of the disposals plan, be taken as the original cost of the wool as appearing in the United Kingdom government books, less the accumulated profits from sales of wool outside the United Kingdom, i.e., the cost of the wool held in store less the balances standing in the divisible profits accounts. Each dominion government was to acquire on this basis, a half interest in the stocks of the wool purchased from it and held by the United Kingdom government on Aug. 1, 1945, and was to receive, after due allowance for operating expenses, half the net proceeds of sale of that wool upon its being sold by the joint organization. Payment for this half interest was to be made by each dominion government to the United Kingdom government within four years and each dominion government's half share in the proceeds of sale by the joint organization was to be applied in payment of the amount so payable. 32.—The disposals plan provided that the wool purchase arrangement should terminate on July 31, 1945, but further provided (in Part I, para. 9 thereof) that for the wool year 1945-46, the first year of the disposals plan (known as the interim period and terminating on July 31, 1946), the method of purchase of wool—viz., appraisalment and acquisition—which had operated during the preceding six years, should be continued, and (in Part III, para. 6) that the United Kingdom government would be responsible for financing the purchase of all the wool so acquired but that the management and sale of the 1945-46 wool clip should be entrusted to the joint organization and that such wool should be dealt with by the joint organization in the same manner as the stocks taken over by it as at Aug. 1, 1945. In Australia the acquisition of the 1945-46 wool clip was administered by the central wool committee until Nov. 15, 1945, upon which date the Australian wool realization commission took over. The system of acquisition upon appraisalment continued until June 30, 1946, and in the following wool season the sale of wool by auction was resumed—the first of such auctions being held in September, 1946. Thereafter all wool, both from new clips and stocks held by the joint organization, was disposed of by auction or private sale. Certain small quantities were brought in by the joint organization at reserve prices when other bids at auction did not reach the reserves established pursuant to the disposals plan.”

Section 9 (3) of the Act of 1945 provided that the commission “shall have and perform all the duties, and shall have and may exercise all the powers, authorities and functions, of the central wool committee under—(a) the National Security (Wool) Regulations; . . . and for that purpose—(i) the commission shall, by force of this Act, be substituted for, and be deemed to be, the central wool committee; (ii) the assets of the central wool committee shall, by force of this Act, be vested in the commission; (iii) all rights, obligations and liabilities which, immediately prior to the commencement of this Act, were vested in or imposed on the central wool committee shall, by force of this Act, be vested in or imposed on the commission; . . .”

Thus, the Australian wool realisation commission was the true successor of the central wool committee set up under the regulations of 1939, and s. 10 provided that any reference in the regulations of 1939 to the wool purchase arrangement

“shall include and shall be deemed at all times, on or after Aug. 1, 1945, to have included a reference to the disposals plan.”

The operations of the joint organisation in respect of Australian wool resulted in large profits, and it became necessary for the Commonwealth to decide what ought to be done with these profits. The Wool Realisation (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, is entitled

“An Act to provide for the distribution of any ultimate profit accruing to the Commonwealth under the wool disposals plan, and for other purposes.”

Section 18 of the Act directed the preparation of a list showing (a) the persons who, in the opinion of the commission (i.e., the Australian Wool Realization Commission) were entitled to share in distributions under this Act; and (b) the appraised values of the wool in relation to which each such person was, in the opinion of the commission, so entitled. Section 4 contained a number of definitions, of which the following should be quoted:

“‘appraised value’, in relation to wool, means the value at which the wool was appraised under the National Security (Wool) Regulations ; . . . 'declared amount of profit' means an amount which has been specified in a notice published in the "Gazette" in pursuance of s. 6 of this Act; 'participating wool' means wool appraised under the National Security (Wool) Regulations (whether under those regulations when in force under the National Security Act, 1939, or that Act as amended, or under those regulations when in force under the Wool Realization Act, 1945, or that Act as amended), being wool which was listed as participating wool in the appraisalment catalogue used by the appraisers for the purpose of that appraisalment; . . . 'the net profit' means the amount remaining after deducting from the wool disposals profit the expenses and charges of the commission in administering this Act, other than commission payable to brokers ; "

B Section 6 (1) provides:

"At any time before the wool disposals profit has been ascertained, the Minister may, with the approval of the Treasurer and after consultation with the commission, and if he is satisfied that the financial position under the disposals plan justifies his so doing, by notice published in the 'Gazette', declare an amount to be available for distribution under this Act out of the expected net profit."

Part III of the Act is headed "Persons Entitled", and s. 7 is as follows:

"(1) Subject to this Act, an amount equal to each declared amount of profit shall be distributed by the commission in accordance with this Act. (2) There shall be payable by the commission, out of each amount to be distributed under this Act, in relation to any participating wool, an amount which bears to the amount to be distributed the same proportion as the appraised value of that wool bears to the total of the appraised values of all participating wool. (3) Subject to this Act, an amount payable under this Act in relation to any participating wool shall be payable to the person who supplied the wool for appraisalment. (4) Where two or more persons jointly supplied participating wool for appraisalment, those persons shall, for the purpose of determining their claims in relation to that wool in any distribution under this Act, be treated as one person."

Section 8 contains a provision with regard to wool which was submitted by a dealer for appraisalment, and is not material for the present purpose. Sections 9 to 14 inclusive deal with the situation which may have arisen by reason of various events, such as the death or bankruptcy of the person who supplied the wool for appraisalment, and s. 10 should be quoted in full, as it was the section which came under consideration in Perpetual Executors Trustees & Agency Co. (W.A.), Ltd. v. Maslen & Commonwealth of Australia (1), hereafter mentioned.

H

"(1) Where participating wool was supplied for appraisalment by a company which is defunct, an amount which would otherwise be payable under this Act to the company may be paid by the commission to such person as appears to the commission to be justly entitled to receive it. (2) Where participating wool was supplied for appraisalment by a partnership which has been dissolved, an amount which would otherwise be payable under this Act to the partnership may be paid by the commission to any former partner or partners (including the personal representatives of a deceased former partner). (3) Where an amount has been paid in pursuance of this section, the rights, duties and liabilities of the person to whom it is paid in respect of the amount shall be the same as if it were part of the proceeds of a sale of the wool by the company or partnership, made at the time of the supply of the wool for appraisalment."

The sum of £22,851 now in question was paid to the respondents under s. 7 of the Act of 1948. They are still carrying on business as suppliers of wool. Counsel for the appellant submitted that the sum in question was, in the hands of the respondents, a trade receipt of an income nature, and relied strongly on Ritchie v. Trustees Executors & Agency Co., Ltd. (2). In that case, the High Court had to consider a case in which the trustees of a will had carried on business on a pastoral station, under a power in the will, and had from time to time submitted "participating" wool for appraisalment under the regulations of 1939. They received £4,770 under the provisions of the Act of 1948 and the question before the High Court was whether this sum should be treated as capital or income in the hands of the trustees.

The Full Court of the Supreme Court of Victoria had held that the trustees

"should hold and deal with the moneys as a receipt of an income nature in relation to the Murray Downs station-property business, to be brought into account accordingly and dealt with in accordance with the trusts of the will of Charles Campbell deceased relating to the station properties" and the High Court unanimously affirmed this decision. It is true that the minds of the learned judges of the High Court were not specifically directed to the question of income tax, but there are passages in the judgment of the court which are so important for the present purpose that they must be quoted in full. The court said (84 C.L.R. 576):

"For the purpose of determining whether the payment received by the trustees of the will from the wool realization commission should be regarded as capital or income and if income to what period of enjoyment it is attributable it has been thought important to trace from the beginning the relevant steps in the extensive and complex governmental transaction which the distribution of profit in question brings almost to an end. If this were not done it would be easy to misconceive the relation of the supply of wool for appraisalment to the wool disposals profit and to the right conferred by the Act to share in its distribution in accordance with the appraisalment value of the wool submitted. It is clear that from the beginning the distribution, in whole or in part, of the Australian share of any surplus arising on divisible profits account was contemplated. The decision was taken administratively that skin wool should be excluded and wool was accordingly submitted for appraisalment and appraised as participating and non-participating. That of course implied that the basis of distribution would be appraised value of the wool submitted. But it was equally clear that no legal right to participate in a distribution of profits was conferred upon suppliers of participating wool, that is, until the enactment of the Wool Realization (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948. In the beginning it was made to depend wholly on the discretion of the central wool committee. It is conceivable that a court interpreting the regulations might have implied limitations upon the manner in which the discretion was exercisable, but even so no right to participate could possibly have been imputed, particularly having regard to the reasons upon which were based the decisions in John Cooke & Co. Pty., Ltd. v. Commonwealth (3). No payment to the supplier of wool, beyond, at all events, appraised value (whether appraised value simpliciter or adjusted to flat rate is not material) was required by the regulations; all else remained a matter of administration. But courts should not be unmindful of the fact that administrative measures and understandings may, according to circumstances, raise an expectation almost as assured of realization as if it rested upon a foundation of legal right. Section 9 (3) of the Wool Realization Act, 1945-50, transferred the powers of the central wool committee to the wool realization commission and the Wool Realization (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, removed the whole matter of the disposal of profits from the province of administrative discretion and placed the distribution upon a defined statutory basis. Not only did it convert the expectations which existed into claims which though not actionable (see s. 28)

became claims with a legal foundation; it also provided an appropriate and definitive rule for a number of situations of difficulty arising from death, bankruptcy, change of persons acting in a representative capacity and dissolution of partnerships and of companies, it invalidated assignments and it prescribed the machinery of distribution. The rule which the legislature adopted for cases in which one of the events mentioned occurred between the supply of participating wool for appraisalment and the distribution varied in expression, but in effect it was to require the moneys to be dealt with as if the supply of wool for appraisalment had been a sale made at the time of such supply and the amount payable out of the distributable profits were part of the proceeds of sale. This of course does not mean that there should be any notional change in the date of receipt, only that, treating the payment as received on the actual date of receipt it should for the specified purposes be regarded as though it were a payment, that is, a delayed or deferred payment of part of the proceeds of a sale of the wool made at the time of appraisalment. None of these provisions applies to the facts of the present case. The trustees themselves submitted the wool for appraisalment acting under trusts established long before the wool purchase arrangement, the settlement preceded it and there is no question of an assignment within s. 29."

After setting out certain contentions advanced on behalf of the parties interested in capital, the court proceeded (ibid., 579):

"The course pursued to give effect to the wool purchase arrangement by the acquisition of wool from the grower must be considered as an entirety. The receipt of the payments is an actual consequence of the submission of wool for appraisalment. It is a consequence which from the beginning was contemplated as a contingent result of submitting the wool for appraisalment. Legally it was left for the time being to the discretion of the central wool committee. But administrative arrangements were made from the beginning by that body in readiness for the contingency becoming actual, by determining what wool should share and what should be excluded and by expressly appraising on that footing the wool submitted. The two statutes, the Wool Industry Fund Act, 1946, and the Wool Realization (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, are not disconnected. Together they take up the discretion which reg. 30 (2) vested in the central wool committee, a body superseded under the Wool Realization Act, 1945-50, and proceed to deal with the subject legislatively instead of administratively. The one statute says what part of the funds governed by that sub-regulation should be applied in the language of the Act for purposes associated with the wool industry. The other statute gives legislative effect to the expectation that the amounts arising upon divisible profits account under the wool purchase arrangement with the United Kingdom should be distributed among growers as a percentage of the appraised value of the participating wool submitted and it provides the machinery for the purpose. It is, of course, true that the Parliament, in the exercise of its legislative power, could have dealt in any manner it chose with the fund. But that legal fact does not determine the character or the consequences of the course which the Parliament actually took or the nature, as between capital and income, in trusts for successive interests, of the amounts distributed. They constitute receipts resulting from the operations of wool-growing. As possible or contingent receipts they were in contemplation when the appraisements were made. The title to receive them when in the end it is placed on a legal basis consists in the submission of shorn wool for appraisalment for the purposes of the wool purchase arrangement. The amount is a percentage of the appraised value of the wool so submitted. The source of the distribution is in effect the fund arising under the divisible profits clause in the arrangement. When the Wool Realization (Distribution of Profits) Act, 1948, speaks of the rights, duties and liabilities of a person made a payee in respect of wool submitted by a defunct company, a dissolved partnership or a deceased person being the same as if the amount were part of the proceeds of a sale of the wool by the company, partnership or deceased person at the time of the supply of the wool for appraisement, the purpose is not to require an assumption entirely departing from the truth but simply to bring the situation within an express definition which would remove all doubt of its character. It may possibly be true that the compulsory submission of wool for appraisement did not amount to a 'sale' and that whatever the transaction be called the word 'proceeds' could properly be used only of the appraised value or the appraised value adjusted to flat-rate parity, because all else depended entirely on administrative or legislative discretion. But, apart from questions of legal right and legal definition, there is no closer practical analogy than that which s. 10 (3) and s. 11 (b) adopt, viz., the proceeds of a sale of the wool. They are receipts resulting from the operations of growing wool."

It is obvious that these views, expressed with so much force and clarity, have a strong bearing on the present appeal. There are no circumstances which differentiate the payment made to the trustees in Ritchie's case (2) from the payment made to the respondents in the present case. When the trustees and the respondents respectively received these payments they were still carrying on the business in the course of which they had submitted wool for appraisement in the years 1939 to 1946. Thus, Ritchie's case (2), like the present case, was one to which the special provisions in ss. 8 to 14 inclusive of the Act of 1948 did not apply. Moreover, their Lordships do not think that the decision in Ritchie's case (2) rested on any equitable principles applicable as between life tenant and remainderman; it rested simply on the character of the payment—was it capital or income?

Before commenting further on the judgment in Ritchie's case (2), their Lordships will turn to Perpetual Executors Trustees & Agency Co. (W.A.), Ltd. v. Maslen (1), as the three judges forming the majority in the High Court in the present case, undoubtedly, attached great importance to Maslen's case (1) and to certain observations made by their Lordships' Board in the course of its judgment. The facts in Maslen's case (1) were as follows. One Connolly, who died on Dec. 28, 1946, had until June 30 of that year been in equal partnership with one Laffer in a pastoral business in Western Australia known as the Mardathuna Pastoral Co. By a deed dated June 17, 1946, and operating from July 1 of that year, Connolly assigned the beneficial interest of his half share in the company to the Maslens in equal shares as tenants in common. Since the question as to what the property assigned included was in dispute between the parties, the exact terms in which the assignment was made should be quoted in so far as they are material. By cl. 1 of the assignment it was provided that Connolly assigned to the Maslens

"all his right title and interest in . . . (d) . . . the benefit of all contracts and engagements and book debts to which Patrick Andrew Connolly and Claude Ashley Laffer may be entitled in connexion with the said business together with all other assets of the said business."

The said business referred to was that of the company. By another deed dated Oct. 2, 1946, Laffer assigned his half share to one of the Maslens. Laffer's assignment was in no wider terms than that of Connolly's and need not be further referred to. As a result of the Act of 1948, two sums became payable in respect of "participating" wool supplied for appraisement, prior to June 30, 1946, by Messrs. Connolly and Laffer. The Maslens, on the one hand, and Connolly's and Laffer's representatives, on the other, claimed to be entitled to the two sums, and, in those circumstances, the latter took out originating summonses in the Supreme Court of Western Australia for the purpose of ascertaining to whom the sums were properly payable. In the Supreme Court of Western Australia WALKER, J., decided in favour of the plaintiffs' claim, but the High Court (LATHAM, C.J., and KITTO, J.; FULLAGAR, J., dissenting) reversed that decision, and held that the assignees were entitled. On appeal, their Lordships' Board, in agreement with WALKER, J., and FULLAGAR, J., took the view that the sums in question did not pass under the assignment.

A The issue before the Board (omitting one question not material for the present purpose) was thus stated in the judgment ([1952] A.C. 225):

" . . . what is the true destination of these two sums and any other sums which may be paid by the commission in respect of participating wool furnished by the partnership of Messrs. Connolly and Laffer ? "

B It is important to see exactly what were the contentions put before the Board and how the Board chose between these contentions. The contentions and the choice are set out as follows (ibid., 228):

C " The determination of the matters in issue in Australia, therefore, which are submitted to their Lordship's Board, falls to be decided on the true construction of the provisions of Part III of the Act. The appellants rest their argument on the terms of s. 7 (3) and say that the share of the sums in dispute which they claim are payable in relation to participating wool, and accordingly payable to the persons who supplied it for appraisalment. Messrs. Connolly and Laffer are the persons who supplied the wool jointly and are to be treated as one person (s. 7 (3) and (4)). And accordingly the wool was supplied by a partnership which has been dissolved and the amount D is properly payable to any former partner or partners, including the personal representatives of a deceased partner. The sums in dispute were, they say, properly payable to either of the claimants as representatives of Mr. Connolly or as representatives of Mr. Laffer, but not to the respondents. The respondents, on the other hand, draw attention to the fact that the provisions of s. 7 (3) [in [1952] A.C. 228, s. 10 (3) is referred to, but this is an obvious misprint] are stipulated to be subject to the Act, and rely on the terms of s. 10 and s. 11 as distinguishing this from a case where E a living partner claims the benefit of the payment. Section 10 (3), they say, no doubt authorises payment, where a partnership is dissolved, to a former partner or his representatives. But when the money has been paid to him, his duties in dealing with it are prescribed by s. 10 and s. 11. Those duties, they contend, are to treat the payment as part of the proceeds of the sale F of the wool made at the time of its supply for appraisalment, i.e., as if the supplier was entitled to the payment at that time. An identical obligation is, they maintain, imposed on a personal representative under s. 11, since he is enjoined not to treat the sum paid as part of the personal estate but as having the quality of the proceeds of a sale made by the deceased supplier at the time when he furnished the wool for appraisalment. Their Lordships G have to choose between these two constructions. Obviously the recipient, whether he be a former partner or a personal representative, cannot keep the money for himself. If he be a member of a dissolved partnership, he must account to his former partner, and if he be a personal representative, he must treat the money as part of the estate which he is administering. But do the provisions go further and stipulate that it is to be dealt with as if it were H the result of a contract or debt which came into existence when the wool was supplied for appraisalment ? So to construe the wording would be to do violence to the admitted fact that it is a gift. No doubt the wording might be clearer, but prima facie the sums received are payable to the supplier and it is for the claimants to establish the contrary. The correct view, in their Lordships' opinion, is that it is a true gift to the supplier of the wool. It is not, and never was, part of the assets of the partnership."

In that passage the Board rejects the suggestion that s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1948 has the result that a debt, equal to the amount of the subsequent payment, must be regarded as having been owed to the suppliers of the wool as from the date on which they supplied it. The suggestion thus rejected was the basis of the claim put forward by the assignees. They had contended that a debt of this amount must be deemed to exist at the date of supply, and as that date was prior to the assignment of 1946 the debt must be deemed to have been included in the assets assigned to them. The rejection of that suggestion, and the consequent refusal of that claim, was the only decision given by the Board in Maslen's case (1).

It will at once be seen that, on this footing, the decision in Maslen's case (1) has no bearing on the problem arising in the present case. There are, however, certain passages in the judgment on which counsel for the respondents strongly relied as indicating that sums paid to suppliers under the provisions of the Act of 1948 are not assessable income in the hands of the recipients. In the passage already quoted, the Board described the payment then in question as a "true gift" to the suppliers and later it was described as "a personal gift to the parties concerned". In their Lordships' view the word "gift" does not assist the respondents. It was used in order to negative the idea that a debt was deemed to arise at the time when the wool was submitted for appraisalment. Undoubtedly the Commonwealth was not bound to pay this sum to the suppliers. The payment was a voluntary one, though it fulfilled a well-founded hope or expectation on the part of the suppliers; but it is well settled that a voluntary payment may be subject to income tax in the hands of the recipient: see, for instance, Blakiston v. Cooper (4). Nor does the use of the adjective "personal" assist the respondents, having regard to the circumstances in which it was used. The mind of the Board in Maslen's case (1) was in no way directed to income tax questions, and it is inconceivable that, by using this adjective, their Lordships meant to suggest that the payment in question was awarded to the suppliers because of their exceptional personal merits or sterling characters. It was awarded to them simply because they had supplied wool for appraisalment, and s. 7 of the Act of 1948 makes this abundantly clear. Their Lordships were, of course, quite aware of the distinction, for income tax purposes, between a gift "peculiarly due to the personal qualities" of the recipient: see Blakiston v. Cooper (4) ([1909] A.C. 107), and a payment for goods or services, and they cannot have meant to suggest that the payment in question was of the former kind, as such a suggestion would be inconsistent with the plain words of s. 7 (3).

Counsel for the respondents relied also on the sentence ([1952] A.C. 229):

"It [the payment] is not, and never was, part of the assets of the partnership" as indicating that the payment to the present respondents could not be said to be a trade receipt. Their Lordships cannot accept this suggestion. In their view, the sentence means no more than this, that the partnership between Connolly and Laffer had been dissolved before the payment was made, and the Board was again rejecting the argument that a book debt must be deemed to have come into existence during the continuance of that partnership.

Finally, their Lordships can find nothing in the judgment in Maslen's case (1) to indicate that the Board disapproved of the reasoning or of the decision in Ritchie's case (2). The problem in Maslen's case (1) was to identify the recipient of the sum then in question, not to decide whether that sum bore the character of capital or income in the hands of the recipient. It appears from the transcript of the proceedings in Maslen's case (1), though not from the report in [1952] A.C., that Ritchie's case (2) was cited in the course of the argument: and their Lordships entertain no doubt that, if the Board in Maslen's case (1) had thought that Ritchie's case (2) bore on the question in issue and was wrongly decided, the latter case would have been mentioned in the judgment.

A It was pointed out by counsel for the appellant that there are phrases in the judgment in Maslen's case (1) which support the argument for the appellant. The payment is described as "the extra proceeds" ([1952] A.C. 229) "the extra profit" and "the extra sum paid" (ibid., 230). Their Lordships recognise that these phrases might be read as indicating that, in the view of the Board, the payment then in question should be regarded as an additional sum added to the compensation already paid for the wool compulsorily acquired, but it would not be right to attach too much weight to the wording of phrases used alio intuitu. In their opinion, neither the decision in Maslen's case (1), nor the reasoning on which that decision was based, afford any assistance in the problem now arising for decision. They have dealt with the case very fully because of the importance attached to it by the majority of the High Court in the present case, and because they realise that some passages in the judgment, divorced from their context, are open to misconception.

B What, then, is the nature of the payment now in question, and in what capacity did the respondents receive it? Having regard to the whole history of the matter, beginning with the wool purchase arrangement and the regulations of 1939, continuing with the submission of wool for appraisalment by the respondents and the classification of that wool as participating wool, and ending with the payment of the sum in question, pursuant to s. 7 of the Act of 1948, their Lordships come to the conclusion that the payment must be regarded as an additional payment voluntarily made to the respondents for wool supplied for appraisalment, or, if the compulsory acquisition can properly be described as a sale, a voluntary addition made by the Commonwealth to the purchase price of the wool. Their Lordships are in agreement with the reasoning and the decision in Ritchie's case (2), and the following passages are particularly germane to the present problem (84 C.L.R. 580):

E "They [the payments] constitute receipts resulting from the operations of wool-growing. As possible or contingent receipts they were in contemplation when the appraisements were made. The title to receive them when in the end it is placed on a legal basis consists in the submission of shorn wool for appraisalment for the purposes of the wool purchase arrangement . . . They are receipts resulting from the operations of growing wool."

F The respondents were in business as wool suppliers at all material times, and the payment was made to them, not because of any personal qualities, but because they, among others, supplied participating wool. They supplied the wool in the course of their trade and this further payment was made to them because they supplied it. In the present case, the respondents were still trading when the payment was made. It was in their hands a trade receipt of an income nature. Their Lordships express no opinion as to the proper description of the payment in the hands of a payee who was not trading at the date of the payment, as this case is not before the Board.

G Counsel for the respondents contended that, even if this would have been the result, had the distribution been made by the central wool committee in the exercise of its discretion under reg. 30 (2) of the regulations of 1939, a different situation had arisen, by reason of intervening events, before the distribution was in fact made. This contention, and the answer to it, are fully set out in the judgments of the minority of the High Court, and their Lordships agree with that answer. There is, in their view, a chain of events which sufficiently connects the payment of the £22,851 in November, 1949, with the supply of wool for appraisalment in 1939-1946. It is true that one of these events was a discretionary act on the part of Parliament, but that act was in effect the final link in the chain, since it directly associated the payment with the participating wool supplied for appraisalment, first by directing payment to the suppliers, and, secondly, by making the amount of the payment depend on the proportion which the appraised value of the participating wool supplied by each supplier bore to the total of the appraised value of all participating wool.

For these reasons, which are in substance the same as the reasons given by FULLAGAR and KITTO, JJ., in the High Court, their Lordships are of opinion that the sum in question forms part of the assessable income of the respondents under s. 25 of the Income Tax Assessment Act. It is thus unnecessary to consider the alternative argument of the Crown which was based on s. 26 of the same Act. Counsel for the respondents did not seek to contend that, if the payment was assessable, it could be attributed to any year other than the year ending Dec. 31, 1949. A

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be allowed and each of the questions raised by the Stated Case should be answered in the affirmative. The respondents must pay the costs of the appellant here and in the High Court. B

Appeal allowed.

NIGHTINGALE v. COURTNEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 18, 19, 1954.] C

Rent Restriction—Surrender of tenancy—Surrender by operation of law—Contract by statutory tenant to purchase house—Failure to complete—Rescission of contract by landlord—Tenant remaining in possession—Nature of occupation.

By a contract, dated Feb. 23, 1952, the landlord of a dwelling-house which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts agreed to sell her leasehold interest in the premises to the tenant of the lower flat for the sum of £650, of which £65 was paid as a deposit on that date. The special conditions of sale provided, inter alia, that the date for completion was to be on or before Mar. 17, 1952, that, as to the lower flat, the property was to be sold subject to the existing tenancy, that vacant possession of the top flat (which was then unoccupied) was to be given on completion, and that the landlord, while waiving all arrears of rent of the lower flat up to June 10, 1951, reserved a right to recover all arrears after that date. There was no provision in the contract for the payment of interest on the purchase money until completion. After the date of the contract the tenant continued to occupy the lower flat, but paid no rent. As he failed to complete although extensions of time were given, the landlord treated the contract as repudiated and rescinded it, the deposit being forfeited. She then claimed possession of the lower flat on the ground, inter alia, that the effect of the contract was to put an end to the tenancy, and that, from the date of the contract, the tenant was in occupation merely as a licensee. D

HELD: there was no presumption that a tenant, whether contractual or statutory, who entered into an agreement with the landlord to purchase the house where he resided, acquired an immediate equitable interest in the demised premises which was inconsistent with the continuance of the tenancy so that, by operation of law, the tenancy was determined by surrender, and, therefore, the tenant did not automatically lose the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts by reason of the contract of Feb. 23, 1952; the nature of his occupation of the lower flat from the date of the contract depended on the terms of the contract which showed that, pending completion, he remained a statutory tenant; and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to possession on the ground that there was a surrender of the tenancy. APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE HODGSON, made at Wandsworth County Court on Oct. 12, 1953.

- B On Feb. 23, 1952, the defendant, who was the statutory tenant of the lower flat of a house of which the plaintiff was the landlord, entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff to purchase her leasehold interest in the house and paid a deposit on the purchase money. From the date of the agreement he continued in occupation of the lower flat, but he paid no rent, nor had he paid arrears of rent due before Feb. 23, 1952. The agreement contained no provision for the C payment of interest on the purchase money pending completion. The defendant having failed to complete, the plaintiff brought an action for, inter alia, (a) a declaration that the agreement had been avoided and the deposit forfeited, (b) possession of the lower flat on the ground that, by virtue of the agreement, the defendant had surrendered his tenancy and thereafter had remained in occupation as a licensee, and (c) arrears of rent up to Feb. 23, 1952. Alternatively, she claimed
 D that, if the defendant was entitled to the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, she was entitled to possession on the ground of non-payment of rent. The county court judge found that the contract had been rescinded and the deposit forfeited, and he made an order for possession on the ground that after the date of the contract the defendant had remained in occupation as a licensee and was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts.

Coningsby for the plaintiff.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: On this appeal, with all respect to the learned county court judge, I have come to a different conclusion as regards the effect of the contract for sale by the plaintiff to the defendant, on Feb. 23, 1952, of her leasehold interest in the premises in suit. It is plain that before that contract was entered into there had been a number of disputes between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the intention of the contract for sale was to resolve all outstanding matters between the parties. The premises in question are known as 33, Criffel Avenue, Wandsworth, and are held by the plaintiff under a lease dated Dec. 5, 1885, for a term of ninety-nine years from June 24, 1880.

- G At the material date the upper part, or top flat, was vacant. The defendant occupied the bottom part, or the lower flat, and at the date of the contract his right to such occupation was by virtue of the Rent Restrictions Acts—that is to say, he was a statutory tenant, paying, of course, a rent. The contract provided (putting it for the moment briefly) that the defendant should purchase the whole premises. When he had done so, the plaintiff's interest in them would, of H course, cease altogether, and, in particular, the defendant would cease to be a tenant of the plaintiff, either contractual or statutory. The purchase price was fixed at the sum of £650, of which £65 was paid as a deposit at the date of the signing of the contract.

Clause 4 of the special conditions of sale provided that the date for completion was to be on or before Mar. 17, 1952, i.e., a date little more than three weeks ahead. Clause 5 provided;

"The tenure of the property and the estate, term, or interest sold are as stated in the particulars and the property is sold subject to . . ."

first, matters registered or capable of registration under the Land Charges Act, 1925, tithe and land tax, covenants and conditions contained in the lease in question, and a payment of the yearly rent of £12, and then, last:

"(d) As to the lower flat to the existing tenancy of the purchaser who shall assume the rent now or formerly paid to be the right and proper rent and shall raise no requisition or objection in regard thereto."

Clause 6 of the special conditions provided:

"Vacant possession of the top flat will be given to the purchaser on completion."

Clause 10 was:

"In consideration of the foregoing agreements by the purchaser the vendor hereby agrees with the purchaser that the vendor will on completion waive and release to the purchaser all and any claims that she may have against the purchaser in respect of costs [under certain other actions between her and the purchaser] and further that on completion the vendor will waive and release to the purchaser any arrears of rent due from the purchaser to her up to and including June 10, 1951, but reserves her right to any arrears of rent due to her from and including June 11, [1951]."

It was provided that the Law Society's General Conditions of Sale should also be applicable save as varied by or inconsistent with the special conditions. Only one of the Law Society's General Conditions need be mentioned, and that is cl. 6, which provides that:

"Where the purchaser is authorised (otherwise than under a lease or tenancy entered into or created before the date of the contract) to take physical possession of the property before the actual completion . . .", then certain provisions apply, including (i) an obligation on the purchaser to pay outgoings, rates, insurance, and so forth, and (ii) an obligation to pay interest on the purchase money.

The hope and expectation that the matter would be completed on Mar. 17, 1952, and that thereafter all outstanding causes of the troubles and disputes would cease, was sadly disappointed. As is usual, extensions of time were given, and the date of actual completion was postponed for some time, but eventually it became apparent to the plaintiff that the defendant was not able or willing to complete the purchase, and, accordingly, she exercised the right, which she claimed to have under the contract, of treating it as repudiated, accepting the repudiation, and rescinding the contract, the deposit of £65 being forfeited. Thereafter she brought her present action claiming possession. The issues in the action related, first, to the validity of the plaintiff's rescission of the contract. The judge held in her favour that she was entitled to rescind and to forfeit, and there is no appeal against that part of the decision. Secondly, the plaintiff claimed possession on one or both of two grounds, the first being arrears of rent. As to that it appears from the judgment that the figures were somewhat complicated. The period dates back for some time, and the judge, having regard to the view he took on the alternative branch of the case, stood over the matter of rent arrears, and it remains so adjourned now. In the view that I take it will be necessary for that matter to be resumed, for I gather that no rent has, on any view, been paid for a considerable time, and it will obviously be a question for the county court judge whether in all the circumstances of this case the jurisdiction, which he, undoubtedly, has, because of non-payment of rent, to make an order for possession, should not now be exercised by him. That, however, is a matter for his discretion, and I say no more about it.

The alternative ground for possession, the one which was successful before the county court judge, was this. It was contended by the plaintiff that the effect of the contract was to put an end altogether to the defendant's rights as a tenant, whether contractual or statutory, and to make his possession or occupation of the lower part of the house from the date of the contract onwards referable to a mere licence, a licence (which emerged, it was said, from the terms of the contract) to go on occupying as purchaser until completion. In support of that contention Turner v. Watts (1) was cited. The learned county court judge accepted that submission, held that the defendant's occupation was merely that of a licensee, that the licence had been validly determined, and that he saw, therefore, no answer to the claim for possession.

A One other matter of fact I should state before I proceed to look at Turner v. Watts (1) and come back to a consideration of the terms of the contract here in question. It seems that the defendant said that he had paid rates, and the argument of the plaintiff in favour of the contract operating to determine the tenancy took advantage of that circumstance. I will assume for the purposes of the rest of my judgment that at some stage the defendant did pay some rates in respect of some part of the property. I repeat, however, that that was all he paid. He certainly paid no rent from February, 1952, onwards, nor has he paid any interest on the purchase money. He said that he thought that the rent which was payable would be taken into account on completion. However, as I have said, he did not pay it.

B Counsel for the plaintiff contended that, in light of the decision of Turner v. Watts (1) (where there was an agreement by a sitting tenant to purchase the reversion), that circumstance is, at any rate, prima facie evidence of a surrender by operation of law, at least in the absence of something in the contract negating such a result. I hope that I have correctly apprehended the submission. I am bound to say that I reject it. In Turner v. Watts (1) the contract for sale contained a provision for the payment of interest on the purchase price from the date of the contract until completion, and there was an express agreement on the defendant tenant's part to maintain and keep the premises in repair, pending completion, and to pay outgoings. Thus, SALTER, J., in the Divisional Court, said (97 L.J.K.B. 95):

E "In the present case it is plain that the defendant is not to pay any rent and the plaintiff said that he so understood the agreement. On the other hand, the purchase-money is to be paid by Sept. 1, or interest becomes payable from that date. The defendant, in my opinion, has a right under the agreement, as purchaser, to use and occupy the house pending completion. She can call for a conveyance at any time on paying the purchase-money and any arrears of interest. If she is more than a licensee and acquires any estate in the land, it is no more than a tenancy at will. The weekly tenancy is surrendered, either expressly or by operation of law."

F The case was taken to the Court of Appeal, where SCRUTTON, L.J., examining the particular terms of the contract there in question, said (ibid., 406) that it was an odd agreement. After stating the terms of the agreement, he said (ibid.):

G "I must hold that the agreement . . . amounts to a surrender of the weekly tenancy held by the defendant from the plaintiff."

H In my judgment, that case turned on the particular terms of that particular contract. More especially, it turned on the circumstance that (as SALTER, J., observed) the form of the contract negated the continued payment of rent and provided in lieu for an obligation on the purchaser's part to pay interest and to undertake such matters as repairs, insurance, and maintenance. Thus it was, as I think, an exception to what would be the ordinary rule, where a sitting tenant buys the reversion. That ordinary rule was established many years ago in Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (2), decided in 1836. In FOA'S LANDLORD AND TENANT, 7th ed., p. 619, it is stated:

"Where a tenant entered into an agreement to purchase the reversion, it was held that such agreement, being impliedly conditional on a good title being made, did not operate as a surrender."

When the matter was considered in this court in Leek & Moorlands Building Society v. Clark (3), SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 493):

"That case [Turner v. Watts (1)] we think turned on the terms of the agreement, and, in particular, a provision that interest should accrue on the purchase price from the date of the agreement. In the absence of any provision express or to be implied an agreement to purchase would not so operate [i.e., operate to terminate a tenancy]: Doe d. Gray v. Stanion (2)."

I respectfully agree with that view, which is, indeed, binding in any case on this court. A question remains, which may be dealt with briefly, whether it matters that the right of occupation in question is not one arising under a lease or contract but by virtue of the Rent Restrictions Acts. To put it in another way, is the case different where the purchaser is not a contractual tenant, but (as we say) a statutory tenant? In my judgment, the answer to that is in the negative. If there is nothing in the agreement which indicates that the right of occupation which is to continue is referable to something other than the statute which previously supported it, then, as it seems to me, the statutory tenant continues until the completion to be a statutory tenant, just as a contractual tenant would continue until completion to be a contractual tenant, and there would be no surrender of the statutory tenancy by operation of law any more than there would be a surrender of a contractual tenancy.

But that leaves the question: Was the effect of the contract of Feb. 23, 1952, to alter the situation, to put an end to the statutory tenancy so that the right of the defendant to continue in occupation was to be referable thenceforward, not to his previously existing tenancy, contractual or statutory, but to his right as purchaser under the contract? The first thing to note in answering that question is that no right of occupation, in terms, is given by the contract. To put it at its highest in the plaintiff's favour, the contract is silent on that matter. It is quite true that cl. 6 of the Law Society's General Conditions of Sale is incorporated, but that, of course, is subject to the special conditions, and, in any case, speaks only of an authorisation to the purchaser to take physical possession of the property otherwise than under a tenancy. One is then thrown back to see where is the authorisation. I think, however, that the matter goes further. The indications which I find in the contract are in the opposite direction, and show, as it seems to me, that the supposed occupation, i.e., the contemplated occupation, is that which the purchaser was already enjoying, and his right is referable to his pre-existing rights. The first indication to that effect is in cl. 5 (d) of the special conditions, which says in terms that the property is to be sold subject "as to the lower flat to the existing tenancy of the purchaser" I quite agree that the main object of that clause is directed to something else, namely, to quietening the possible problems about the validity of the rent that the defendant had previously paid. But still, in terms, the contract says that on completion the property sold is sold subject to the existing tenancy of the lower flat, which necessarily supposes that that tenancy, whatever its nature or quality, will be still subsisting. Then, again, cl. 6 of the special conditions speaks of "vacant possession of the top flat" being given "on completion". We are told that it was empty, and it follows that the fact that vacant possession is to be given on completion negatives, as I think, the notion that possession of any part of the premises is to be taken under the contract at any earlier date. Finally, I think that cl. 10 of the special conditions tends in the same direction, for, by its express language, though the vendor waives all arrears of rent up to June 10, 1951, she reserves a right to recover all arrears after that date, and there is no hint that the accrual of rent ceased at any particular date. I, therefore, find myself unable to resist the conclusion that by the express terms of the contract the continued statutory tenancy is contemplated. Certainly, I find nothing in the contract which negatives or displaces what I hold to be the general rule which would otherwise be applicable under the common law.

- That leaves only one point. It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that, in judging the mutual intention, one can pay regard to what happened and observe that (according to the assumption which I have said that I am prepared to make)
- A the defendant paid some rates, and, therefore (it is said), if there is a matter of real doubt on the terms of the contract, then one should resolve the doubt in accordance with the actual behaviour of the parties. In the first place, I do not think that there is doubt. It may be that the parties did not entirely comprehend their proper relationship under the contract. But, if they did misapprehend it, then it does not seem to me that this court is entitled to misconstrue
- B the contract in order that it may share in the misapprehension. But, in any case, it is not clear to me that payment of a particular item of rates by the defendant is inconsistent with the true view of the contract as I think it to be. It would certainly be a very surprising thing if the effect of the contract either was, or was ever thought to be, such that the defendant could go on from the date of the contract to completion (which might be, as in fact it was, postponed
- C so as to be some time after the date of the contract) without any obligation to pay anything whatever. For all those reasons, therefore, though I confess with some regret because I think that the plaintiff seems to have been very ill-used about this matter, I think that this part of the decision of the county court judge cannot be sustained. I repeat that it is not the end of the matter, because in the view which I take, the case must go back to the county court so that the
- D matter of arrears of rent may be further investigated, and, having regard to the whole circumstances and the length of time during which the rent has been in arrear, it seems to me by no means clear that the learned judge would think it right not to make an order for possession. But that, as I have also earlier said, is, of course, a matter for his discretion and not for this court. On this appeal I think the result is that we should set aside the decision of the county court
- E judge and make an order accordingly.

- DENNING, L.J.: When a statutory tenant has entered into a contract to purchase a house but has not yet completed the purchase, then in the interval pending completion he does not automatically cease to be a statutory tenant. It all depends on the agreement between the parties. If it is agreed between
- F them that the tenant shall no longer pay rent, but only pay interest on the purchase money, that goes a good way to show that he becomes in law a licensee and is not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts : see Turner v. Watts (1). But if nothing is agreed about his position in the interval, then in law he remains a statutory tenant until completion. In that case, if he cannot ultimately find the purchase money, he will, no doubt, forfeit his deposit, but he does not lose
- G his statutory tenancy as well.

- The difficulty in this case, to my mind, is to know really what was the agreement, if any, between the parties on the point. The judge inferred an agreement from the conduct of the parties. He relied on the fact that after the contract of purchase the tenant did not pay rent, and that the landlord's agent in his rent book closed the rent account and the tenant himself paid the rates. Those
- H are points well worthy of consideration, but, to my mind, they are over-powered by the fact that there was nothing in this agreement compelling the tenant to pay any interest on the purchase money in the interval before the date fixed for completion, and it is not likely that the parties intended that the tenant should have, even for a short period, complete freedom to stay in the house without paying either rent or interest. The more likely interpretation of the facts is that the tenant was to be liable for rent in the interval, and that it was not to be paid in cash but included in the completion account. Balancing the various considerations, I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., that there is not sufficient in this case to outweigh the ordinary rule that pending completion the tenant remained a statutory tenant. That decides the appeal, but it does not necessarily decide the question of possession, because it may well be that owing to non-payment of rent for all this time an order for possession can be made on other grounds. I agree that the appeal should be allowed accordingly.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree, and I only add a few words as we are differing from the learned county court judge. It was the foundation, as I understood it, of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff that, when a tenant enters into a contract with his landlord to purchase the reversion, he acquires an immediate equitable interest in the demised premises which is inconsistent with the view that the tenancy continues as a tenancy, and that by operation of law, accordingly, the lease is determined by surrender. From that starting point counsel then went on to say that there is nothing in the terms of the contract between the parties in the present case which would displace that general presumption. For my part I am quite satisfied that there is no such presumption at all. Certainly there is not where the tenant's lease is a contractual one, as was pointed out by SOMERVELL, L.J., in the passage in Leek & Moorlands Building Society v. Clark (3) to which SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has referred, and I can see no reason why the position should be in any way different where the tenancy is a statutory tenancy. It seems to me that the question of surrender or no surrender is one of intention of the parties, to be discovered from the terms of the contract into which they have entered.

Turner v. Watts (1) was a case where, on the true construction of the contract and having regard to the various provisions which it contained, the court came to the conclusion that the intention of the parties was that a surrender was intended to operate. In the present case it seems to me that the indications to which my Lords have referred support the general rule that no surrender was in contemplation and that no surrender was brought into operation. First, there is the very significant fact that under cl. 5 (d) of the special conditions of sale the tenancy is expressly preserved, because the property is bought subject to the existing tenancy, and, even if the full operation of that provision is ineffectual, nevertheless it shows what the intention of the parties was. How, on the one hand, it can be said that the tenancy determined and came to an end at once on the signing of the contract, and, on the other hand, that the parties contemplated it as still existing on completion, it is difficult to see. Then, secondly, there is this to be observed, that, if there was a surrender which was to operate at once, then the plaintiff, during the period prior to completion, would get nothing in return for the defendant's occupation of the property. She would get no rent because, ex hypothesi, the lease had determined, and she would get no interest on the purchase money because there was no contractual provision which provided for it, because I agree with the Master of the Rolls that cl. 6 of the Law Society's General Conditions of Sale would not operate in that contingency. Therefore, it seems to me that there is ample corroboration in the terms of the contract of sale for the view that prima facie no surrender was intended. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the county court for further investigation as to arrears of rent.

(1) Robertson v. Rosenberg, (1951), 115 J.P. 128; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Northampton justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Northampton on May 18, 1953, the respondent, Herbert Cecil Johnson, a wages inspector, preferred an informa-F tion against the appellant, Elsie Doris Edith Stephenson, charging that on Dec.
21, 1952, she unlawfully failed to pay remuneration not less than the statutory minimum to George Harry Tarry, contrary to the Wages Councils Act, 1945,
s. 11, and the Milk Distributive Wages Council (England and Wales) Wages Regulation Order, 1952.

The respondent was a wages inspector under the Wages Councils Act, 1945.
On Dec. 21, 1952, the appellant was carrying on a business known as G Anderton’s Dairy at premises in Foundry Street, Northampton, and was concerned in the course of the business in the retail sale of milk. On Sunday, Dec. 21, 1952, one George Harry Tarry worked for the appellant at the dairy from 9.0 a.m. to 1.30 p.m. as a washer of milk bottles, such work being incidental to the appellant’s business of selling milk by retail. He was paid 16s. 6d. for his H work on that day by the appellant’s husband on her behalf. Tarry was in the full-time employment of Northampton Corporation for whom he normally worked in each week on all days except Sunday, but when there was work for him to do for his employers on a Sunday he attended and performed it. He never had a formal agreement with the appellant as to his employment at the dairy. He did not go every Sunday, nor was he under any obligation to the appellant to attend for work on Dec. 21, 1952, or any other Sunday. The appellant was not bound to employ him on Dec. 21, 1952, or on any other Sunday. In fact, he had worked intermittently for the appellant on Sundays for some years prior to Dec. 21, 1952. He worked four and a half hours on each Sunday when he went, for which he was paid 16s. 6d.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the information was insufficient. Before any evidence was heard, an application for particulars as to (i) what sums, if any, ought to have been paid in respect of work except overtime, and the basis on which, and under what provision of the order, each such sum was calculated; (ii) what sums ought to have been paid for (a) overtime, and (b) waiting time, and the basis on which, and under what provisions of the order, each such sum was calculated; (iii) what further sums, if any, ought to have been paid under Part IV of sched. I to the order; (iv) what sum was alleged to have been the statutory minimum remuneration of the worker mentioned in the information; and (v) what sum was alleged to have been paid to the worker below the statutory minimum remuneration. These particulars had been requested by a letter dated July 22, 1953, on behalf of the appellant, to which the respondent's solicitors had replied on July 23, 1953, that the particulars set out in the information were sufficient and gave reasonable information of the nature of the charge, that the questions referred to matters which, if relevant, would be the subject of evidence at the hearing, or to questions of law arising on the application of the relevant statutory instrument to facts relating to a worker employed by the appellant, which facts were peculiarly within the appellant's knowledge, but that the appellant was referred to para. 6 (2) of the schedule to the order, dealing with the minimum remuneration payable at the relevant date to workers (other than six-day workers) for work on a Sunday.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the information was sufficient as it stood and gave reasonable information as to the nature of the charge. If a worker was to be excluded from the Act and the order, he must be both casually employed and employed otherwise than for the purpose of his employer's business; if he was either not employed casually or was employed for the purposes of his employer's business, he was within the Act and the order, if the order, by its terms, applied to him. The evidence of Sunday work and payment therefor and of the fact that Tarry worked for the appellant on Sundays only was sufficient to support the information under the order. On Dec. 21, 1952, George Harry Tarry was working overtime and was a worker to whom Part III of the schedule to the order applied, and under para. 6 (2) (b) (i) of the schedule to the order he was entitled to be paid 18s. 11d. in respect of his work on Dec. 21, 1952.

The justices were of opinion that the information as laid was sufficient and refused to order the respondent to give any further particulars, and convicted the appellant, who now appealed.

J. G. S. Hobson for the appellant.

S. B. R. Cooke for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant was summoned before justices for the county borough of Northampton on an information preferred by an inspector of the Ministry of Labour, the information being that she

"being an employer of workers to whom the Milk Distributive Wages Council (England and Wales) Wages Regulation Order, 1952, made under the Wages Councils Act, 1945, applies, did on Dec. 21, 1952, at Anderton's Dairy, Foundry Street, Northampton, unlawfully fail to pay remuneration not less than the statutory minimum remuneration to George Harry Tarry one of the said workers, contrary to s. 11 of the Wages Councils Act, 1945, and the said order made thereunder."

The first point that was taken by counsel for the appellant before us and before the justices was that the information was defective in that it did not give reasonable information or sufficient particulars to enable the appellant to know what case she had to meet. In the opinion of the court, that is a good point, and this information does not give reasonable information of the nature of the charge.

Rule 77 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules, 1952, which replaced a corresponding enactment in the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 32 (to which I need not refer, though that was the Act in force at the time the information was laid) provides by para. (1):

- A "Every information, summons, warrant or other document laid, issued or made for the purposes of, or in connection with, any proceedings before a magistrates' court for an offence shall be sufficient if it describes the specific offence with which the accused is charged, or of which he is convicted, in ordinary language avoiding as far as possible the use of technical terms and without necessarily stating all the elements of the offence, and gives such particulars as may be necessary for giving reasonable information of the nature of the charge."

- As is well known, the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, was designed so that informations before magistrates' courts should be substantially in the same concise form as indictments had been since the Indictments Act, 1915. Since the Act of 1915
- C an indictment has been a very different thing from what it was before that date, when indictments were very long and very prolix and often had to make a great number of averments which were not necessary for the purpose of knowing what the case was about. Now an indictment simply states, first, the statement of offence, which may be obtaining money by false pretences, burglary, or whatever it may be, quite shortly, contrary to the relevant enactment. Then the
- D particulars tell the defendant what he is actually charged with, the nature of the offence.

- In the present case we have had to deal, first, with a section of an Act of Parliament which appeared to the court at first somewhat difficult to understand, but the argument of counsel for the respondent has made it clear to us. We have then had to deal with the order made by the Minister, called the Milk Distributive
- E Wages Council (England and Wales) Wages Regulation Order, 1952. The order itself is very short; it is the schedule that matters. There is one schedule with several parts, several paragraphs and several definitions, and to find out what a man has to be paid, you first have to find out his age, then the actual nature of his employment, then whether he is a seven-day worker or a six-day worker, and other things. In this case it was, apparently, proved to the satisfaction of
- F the justices that Tarry ought to have been paid 18s. 11d., whereas, in fact, he was only paid 16s. 6d. with which, one may say in passing, though, I suppose, it is not material, he was perfectly satisfied, and probably now he will not get any more of this work which he used to do on Sunday mornings to supplement his income. Be that as it may, it is most important when a person is being summoned before a criminal court that he should know exactly what he
- G is being charged with, and, when one has to deal with a schedule of this complication, it does seem to me that merely to tell a person that he is going to be charged with not paying the statutory minimum remuneration to some particular worker, he is not being given reasonable information as to the nature of the charge. As I have pointed out, many things have to be taken into account in order to find out what is the minimum remuneration. The appellant would,
- H no doubt, know what she did pay to this man. It may be that with the assistance of her solicitor or accountant she can work out what she ought to have paid, but one can very well understand the case in which an employer may say: "You are saying I did not pay this man enough. I say I did. Why do you say I did not. What am I going to be charged with when I get to the court? Why is it said I did not pay enough?" If the inspector lays the information in respect of, we will say, a pasteuriser, and it turns out that, instead of being a pasteuriser, the man is a roundsman at the material time, a different schedule may apply and a different sum would have to be paid.

In my opinion, especially having regard to Robertson v. Rosenberg (1), where we emphasised the necessity in cases of summary jurisdiction of letting people know exactly with what they were charged, the information should contain, first, a reference to the particular paragraph of the schedule to the order which it is alleged has been violated. That seems to me to be quite elementary, especially considering that r. 77 (2) provides:

“ If the offence charged is one created by or under any Act, the description of the offence shall contain a reference to the section of the Act, or, as the case may be, the rule, order, regulation, bye-law or other instrument creating the offence.”

This information does not refer to any section or any rule, order or regulation, and yet when the case comes into court this order is produced and different parts of it have to be gone into to find out exactly what remuneration it is said the man ought to have been paid. I think that these informations ought to specify the relevant part of the order and the nature of the man's employment. I am not sure that they ought not to contain a statement of his age because the amount that he is entitled to receive depends on his age. At any rate, I am satisfied that in this case the appellant was not given enough information. Therefore, the information was bad and the justices should not have entertained it. In my opinion, they were wrong in a matter of law, and this appeal succeeds.

BYRNE, J.: I agree. This information was defective. It should at the least have contained a reference to para. 6 (2) of the schedule to the Milk Distributive Wages Council (England and Wales) Wages Regulation Order, 1952, and it should also have contained a statement to the effect that the man in question was paid 16s. 6d. instead of 18s. 11d. for the work he did. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

PARKER, J.: I agree with both judgments.

Appeal allowed.

THABO MELI AND OTHERS v. REGINAM.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lord Reid and Mr. L. M. D. de Silva),
January 13, 1954.]

Criminal Law—Murder—Series of acts—Erroneous belief that death caused by first act—Death actually caused by second act—No mens rea in respect of second act.

A The appellants, in accordance with a preconceived plan, took a man to a hut, gave him beer so that he was partially intoxicated, and then struck him over the head. They then, believing him to be dead, took his body and rolled it over a low cliff, dressing up the scene to make it look like an accident. In fact, the man was not then dead, it being established from medical evidence that the final cause of his death was exposure when he was left unconscious at the foot of the cliff. On their trial for murder the appellants contended that the two acts done were separate acts, and that, while the first act was accompanied by mens rea, it was not the cause of death, but that the second act, while it was the cause of death, was not accompanied by mens rea, and that, therefore, they were not guilty of murder.

C HELD: it was impossible to divide up what was really one series of acts; the crime was not reduced from murder to a lesser crime, merely because the appellants were under some misapprehension for a time during the completion of their criminal plot; and, therefore, the appellants were guilty of murder.

D APPEAL by special leave in forma pauperis by the four accused from a judgment and sentence passed by the High Court of Basutoland on Mar. 26, 1953, whereby they were convicted of murder and sentenced to death. The facts appear in the judgment.

E S. N. Bernstein and Hughes-Chamberlain for the appellants.
Gahan, Q.C., and J. G. Le Quesne for the Crown.

Jan. 13. LORD REID: The four appellants in this case were convicted of murder after a trial before SIR WALTER HARRAGIN, judge of the High Court of Basutoland, in March, 1953. The appeal which has been heard by this Board dealt with two matters: first, whether the conclusions of the learned judge on questions of fact were warranted: and, secondly, whether, on a point of law, the accused are entitled to have the verdict quashed.

F On the first matter, there really is no ground for criticising the learned judge's treatment of the facts. It is established by evidence, which was believed and which is apparently credible, that there was a preconceived plot on the part of the four accused to bring the deceased man to a hut and there to kill him, and then to fake an accident, so that the accused should escape the penalty for their act. The deceased man was brought to the hut. He was there treated to beer and was at least partially intoxicated; and he was then struck over the head in accordance with the plan of the accused. Witnesses say that while the deceased was seated and bending forward he was struck a heavy blow on the back of the head with a piece of iron like the instrument produced at the trial. But G a post-mortem examination showed that his skull had not been fractured and H medical evidence was to the effect that a blow such as the witnesses described would have produced more severe injuries than those found at the post-mortem examination. There is at least doubt whether the weapon which was produced as being like the weapon which was used could have produced the injuries that were found, but it may be that this weapon is not exactly similar to the one which was used, or it may be that the blow was a glancing blow and produced less severe injuries than those which one might expect. In any event, the man was unconscious after receiving the blow, but he was not then dead. There is no evidence that the accused then believed that he was dead, but their Lordships are prepared to assume from their subsequent conduct that they did so believe; and it is only on that assumption that any statable case can be made for this appeal. The accused took out the body, rolled it over a low krantz or cliff, and dressed up the scene to make it look like an accident. Obviously, they believed at that time that the man was dead, but it appears from the medical evidence that the injuries which he received in the hut were not sufficient to cause the death and that the final cause of his death was exposure when he was left unconscious at the foot of the krantz.

The point of law which was raised in this case can be simply stated. It is said that two acts were done:—first, the attack in the hut; and, secondly, the placing of the body outside afterwards—and that they were separate acts. It is said that, while the first act was accompanied by mens rea, it was not the cause of death; but that the second act, while it was the cause of death, was not accompanied by mens rea; and on that ground, it is said that the accused are not guilty of murder, though they may have been guilty of culpable homicide. It is said that the mens rea necessary to establish murder is an intention to kill, and that there could be no intention to kill when the accused thought that the man was already dead, so their original intention to kill had ceased before they did the act which caused the man's death. It appears to their Lordships impossible to divide up what was really one series of acts in this way. There is no doubt that the accused set out to do all these acts in order to achieve their plan, and as parts of their plan; and it is much too refined a ground of judgment to say that, because they were under a misapprehension at one stage and thought that their guilty purpose had been achieved before, in fact, it was achieved, therefore they are to escape the penalties of the law. Their Lordships do not think that this is a matter which is susceptible of elaboration. There appears to be no case, either in South Africa or England, or for that matter elsewhere, which resembles the present. Their Lordships can find no difference relevant to the present case between the law of South Africa and the law of England; and they are of opinion that by both laws there can be no separation such as that for which the accused contend. Their crime is not reduced from murder to a lesser crime merely because the accused were under some misapprehension for a time during the completion of their criminal plot.

Their Lordships must, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HARTLEY v. MAYOH & CO. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), January 14, 15, 1954.]

A Factory—Fire—Fireman electrocuted while fighting fire—“Persons employed” —Regulations for Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 to 1907 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312), reg. 9—Factories Act, 1937, s. 60 (1), as amended by Factories Act, 1948 (c. 55), s. 12 (1).

Fire—Negligence—Fireman electrocuted—Liability of occupiers—Invitee—Mains supply of electricity to lighting circuit not cut off—Obsolete type of mechanism—Unusual danger.

B In breach of the duty of the defendant firm, the occupiers of a factory, under reg. 9 of the Regulations for the Generation, Transmission, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907, 1908, ordinary tumbler switches similar to those in use in a house, adjoining the main switchboard, were used to control the electricity supply in the lighting circuit of the factory. Through the negligence of the defendant electricity board and their predecessors, the connections from these tumbler switches to the master switchboard had been transposed, with the result that current still flowed from the live wire of the tumbler switches, when switched on, and, through the neutral wire of the master switch, to the earth wire throughout the circuit after the master switch had been switched off. The defendant board did not discover this defect after they had done work in the factory in the 1930's, 1946 and 1950, and did not point out to the defendant firm that the tumbler switches were obsolete. Firemen summoned to a fire at the factory were directed by the manager to the main switchboard and the master switch, where they switched off. But, excusably as it was found, they did not realise that the tumbler switches were main switches, and they were not so informed, even after complaint that the electricity was not all switched off, by the manager, who had been with the defendant firm twenty years and knew that they did not serve lighting points in the building, but not that they were the main switch. One of the firemen was electrocuted, and, in an action by his widow, the trial judge found both defendants guilty of negligence and the defendant firm in breach of statutory duty, and apportioned the responsibility for the damage as to ninety per cent. against the defendant board and as to ten per cent. against the defendant firm. In an appeal by the defendant firm,

HELD: (i) the fireman was not a person for whose benefit the electricity regulations were made, not being of the class of “persons employed” to protect whom power to make the regulations was conferred by s. 60 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, as amended by the Factories Act, 1948, s. 12 (1), and the defendant firm were, therefore, not liable for their breach of their statutory duty in respect of his death.

G

Decision of BARRY, J. ([1953] 2 All E.R. 525) on this point, reversed.

(ii) although the primary cause of the accident was the defendant board's negligence in not discovering the defect in the connections, and in not informing the defendant firm that the tumbler switches were obsolete, in view of the requirements of reg. 9 of the electricity regulations the defendant firm were under a duty to know where their main switches were, and the manager was negligent in not knowing this and in failing to warn the firemen, who were invitees, of the unusual danger presented by the fact that they were not the usual type of main switch and might so be overlooked and, therefore, the apportionment of the responsibility for the damage must be upheld.

APPEAL by the defendant firm against an order of BARRY, J., dated Mar. 28, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 525, in an action for damages for negligence against the two defendants (the defendant firm and the North Western Electricity Board) and for breach of statutory duty against the defendant firm. BARRY, J., held both defendants liable and awarded the plaintiff £10,000 damages, and he apportioned the responsibility for the damage as to ninety per cent. against the defendant board and as to ten per cent. against the defendant firm. The defendant firm appealed.

Laski, Q.C., and Da Cunha for the defendant firm.

Brabin, Q.C., and P. Curtis for the plaintiff.

SINGLETON, L.J.: In March of last year BARRY, J., had before him the claim of Mrs. Doris Hartley, a widow, for damages for negligence against Mayoh & Co., the defendant firm, and the North Western Electricity Board. The claim was that her husband, Reginald Dingle Hartley, a divisional officer in the fire brigade of the city of Salford, had met his death through the negligence of both defendants, or through breach of statutory duty. The judge found negligence proved against both defendants, and, with some hesitation, held that the defendant firm were responsible in damages for breach of statutory duty, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff for £10,000 damages. He apportioned the responsibility for the damage ninety per cent. against the defendant board, and ten per cent. against the defendant firm. The firm appeal against that order in so far as it held them responsible, and contend that the whole responsibility lies on the board. Counsel for the defendant firm said that he could conduct the appeal almost entirely by reference to the considered judgment of BARRY, J., which sets out the facts clearly.

On the morning of Sunday, Sept. 24, 1950, there was a fire at the works of the defendant firm, who are pickle manufacturers, carrying on business in a comparatively small factory in Ford Lane, Salford, to which the Factories Acts apply.

When a fire brigade attends a fire, one of the first things done is to see that all electricity is cut off, so that there is no danger of anyone receiving a shock while working in the damaged premises, since the risk of a shock is the greater when a person's clothes are wet. Inquiries are made as to where the electricity main is and where the electric supply can be cut off. The deceased, as a member of the fire brigade, arrived at the factory at about 11.35 a.m., on the Sunday, and went with Sub-officer Bigland to find the main electric switches. Mr. Bigland asked the manager of the defendant firm, Mr. Holland, where the switches were. Mr. Holland, who started with the defendant firm in 1932, more than twenty years ago, directed them to the main switchboard, which was on the ground floor within a few yards of where they were, and quite near the door of Mr. Holland's office. As the photograph shows, there was one switch on the left and one, the switch controlling the motor circuit, just before the main board. Those were both switched off by Mr. Bigland or by one of the fire brigade officers. They do not directly affect the portion of the factory with which we are concerned. To the right of the board there were two other switches, called tumbler switches, similar to the ordinary switch seen in a house. They were not thought to have anything to do with the main supply, and on the evidence given it was said to be reasonable that no one should so regard them. A little distance away, at the

- A bottom of some steps, there was what was considered to be the master switch, and if that switch, which was referred to as switch S, was turned off, in the ordinary course there would be no electric current in the part of the factory where the fire was. There were also two individual switches, S.1., and S.2., which were switched off, and the switching off of those likewise should have been a guard against there being any electric current in that part of the factory.
- B Those switches being off, the firemen felt that there was no danger of any electric current in the neighbourhood of the fire, but within a short time one or two of the men received minor shocks, and Mr. Bigland returned to Mr. Holland to make further inquiries. Mr. Holland looked at the switchboard downstairs, ascertained that the main switches were both off there, and gave an assurance that the switches were off and that there was no other main switch. Within a
- C short time the deceased was dead. He was seen by another officer going towards the fire, when he collapsed almost into the fire. He had an electric wire in his hand, and he had been electrocuted. It was in respect of his death that his widow brought the action.

BARRY, J., having found the facts, said:

- D "Before considering any question of legal liability I must now inquire how this fatality occurred. There can, I think, be no doubt that it was due to two causes, in the absence of either one of which the deceased would not have met his death. The first of these two causes was that the electricity supply in the lighting circuit had not been cut off. This circuit was, in fact, controlled by the two tumbler switches to which I have already referred. No one had turned these two switches into the 'off' position, because no one had realised their true function. Despite this failure to turn off the main
- E lighting supply, the lighting wires in the upper part of the building should have been 'dead', as they should have been disconnected by the master switch at the foot of the stairs. In addition to the fact that this switch was 'off', no current should in any event have been flowing through the lighting wires in the long room as the switch controlling the lighting in this room
- F was also in the 'off' position, but thus arises the second and more complicated cause of the disaster. Put shortly, the connections between the two tumbler switches and the meter on the one hand and the neutral phase on the switchboard on the other were crossed."

I think I am right in saying that "were crossed" should read "were transposed". The judge continued:

- G "Those connections consisted of two leads, both blackened with age, but one of them was, in fact, red and the other black. This difference in colour between the two leads could be detected without any undue difficulty by wiping the dirt from the insulating material surrounding the leads. The lighting system in the building consisted, as is normal if not invariable, of two wires running immediately adjacent to each other, one being the
- H phase wire through which the current should be passed, and the other the continuous neutral or earth wire which, nowadays at least, is invariably coloured black. For the system to work as designed, the red lead should have travelled from the meter to the right hand tumbler switch, thereby conveying the current to the phase wire, which ran throughout the lighting circuit and carried the current to the various lighting points. The black lead should have run from the left tumbler switch to the neutral bar on the switchboard, which is shown in the agreed photograph and marked with a letter 'H'. As I have said, at the time when the accident occurred these two leads were, in fact, crossed. The result of this was that the black, neutral or earth wire was 'live' throughout the whole circuit. The master switch to which I have referred, and the switch controlling the lighting in the long room operated on the phase wire, which should, of course, have been the only 'live' wire in the circuit. These switches did not, and could not, cut off the electric current from the continuous neutral wire. As a result, although these two switches were in the 'off' position the neutral wire was still charged, and wrongly charged, with electricity. If a man in wet clothing came into contact with it, the whole of the power of the mains was liable to pass through his body with the fatal results which, unfortunately, eventuated in the present case. It follows, therefore, I think, that this accident could never have happened if the tumbler switches had been in the 'off' position, nor could it have occurred if the current had been flowing, as it should have done, through the phase wire which was controlled by the master switch and the switch controlling the lighting in the long room and not through the neutral wire."

Thus, at the time when it was thought that there was no current in the neighbourhood of the fire, through this unfortunate transposition of the wires on the tumbler switches there was a live wire, and that was not affected by the cutting off of the main S switch or of the other switch or switches in that room. The defendant board have not appealed against the order made against them, and that is not surprising, for it is found by the judge that they were responsible for this transposing of the wires. The judge said:

"I am, however, forced to the conclusion that, on a strong balance of probability, the original crossing of the two leads from the tumbler switches to the board's apparatus was the fault of someone, some unknown employee of the board. This fault was committed on some previous occasion which it is wholly impossible to identify", and he gave other reasons for the conclusion which he reached.

When any work of importance was done to the electricity system in this factory a representative of the board, or of their predecessors, tested it, and if there had been a proper test this defect, which must have been of long standing, must have been found. The tumbler switches, indeed, constituted what ought to have been regarded as the main switch. A main switch ought to have an iron bar across it, so that it would be recognised as a main switch. But when merely two tumbler switches appear, as these two did, they are unlikely to be recognised by anyone, and certainly by any fire brigade officer coming to the factory, as a main switch. From what I have said it is clear that an appeal on the part of the defendant board could have had no hope of success. They have not appealed, and it cannot be gainsaid that the main responsibility, if not the whole responsibility, for this unfortunate happening, lies on them or on their predecessors. Work which should have been followed by a test had been done in the late 1930's, again in 1946, and again in 1950. Witnesses from the defendant board said that the system of having a main switch of this kind was obsolete, and that their practice was to point that out to occupiers. They had not pointed out anything of that nature to the occupiers of this factory, the defendant firm, which is a matter for great regret.

H

Counsel for the defendant firm submitted that the whole of the responsibility arising from the death of the deceased rested on the defendant board, that no negligence was proved against the defendant firm, and that there was no breach of statutory duty by them. He said that, in any event, if there was a breach of statutory duty, the deceased was not a person for whose benefit the regulations were made, and an action for breach of statutory duty would not lie at the instance of his widow. The Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 and 1907 (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1312), are preserved for present purposes by s. 159 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. The power to make regulations now is given by s. 60 of the Act of 1937, as amended by the Transfer of Functions (Factories, etc., Acts) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 376), para. 2, and the Factories Act, 1948, s. 12 (1), and sched. I, as follows:

A “(1) Where the Minister [of Labour and National Service] is satisfied that any manufacture, machinery, plant, equipment, appliance, process, or description of manual labour, used in factories is of such a nature as to cause risk of bodily injury to the persons employed, or any class of those persons, he may, subject to the provisions of this Act, make such special regulations as appear to him to be reasonably practicable and to meet the necessity of the case.”

B The power to make the regulations is given when the Minister is satisfied that the work is of such a nature as to cause risk of bodily injury to persons employed. Before the amendment made by s. 12 (1) of the Factories Act, 1948, the power to make the regulations was given if the Minister was satisfied that the manufacture, etc., was of such a nature as to cause risk of bodily injury to persons
C employed “in connection therewith”. I do not think that the deceased was a person for whose benefit the regulations could be made, or were made, and I do not think that an action lies for breach of statutory duty in this case.

A somewhat similar position arose in Groves v. Lord Wimborne (1) each of the judgments in which discussed whether the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, or a particular section of it, was passed in the interests of the public at large or of a particular class of persons, see per A. L. SMITH, L.J. ([1898] 2 Q.B. 407), RIGBY, L.J. (ibid., 413, 414), and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. (ibid., 415, 416). In my view, the deceased was not one of the class of persons for whose benefit the regulations were made in that he was not a person employed. For that reason I do not think that any action for breach of statutory duty lies against the D occupiers.

E Regulation 9 on which reliance was placed provides:

F It is agreed for the purpose of this appeal that the tumbler switches, as they are placed and as they were at that time, constitute a breach on the part of the occupiers of reg. 9. Though that breach does not, in my view, give the right to an action for damages for breach of statutory duty, I feel that regard must be had to it from another point of view. The occupier of a factory is in a different position from the occupier of a private house or flat. He is charged with certain
G duties under the Factory Acts, and under the regulations which are made under those Acts in so far as they affect factories. Regulation 9 puts a duty in regard to a single-pole switch on the occupier of a factory. Thus it is clear that the occupier of a factory must know something about his switches, and it seems to me that he ought to know where the main switch is. That is a matter for consideration when one has to deal with the claim for damages for negligence
H at common law. It was said on behalf of the plaintiff against the defendant firm: “You are occupiers of a factory on which the deceased went, and thus the ordinary law with regard to invitor and invitee applies, and the deceased, being an invitee and using reasonable care for his own safety, was entitled to expect that you would use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger of which you knew, or ought to have known”. It was added no warning was given of any unusual danger.

The unusual danger of which the occupiers knew, or ought to have known, was that their main switch, which consisted of two tumbler switches, was not indicated in the normal way. Mr. Holland, their manager, did not know that that was the main switch. The judge pointed out that, if he knew that those switches did not serve any lighting points in the building, he was at least put on inquiry to see what they were. Although he had been there almost twenty years, he did not know where the main switch in the building was, and though he showed the fire brigade officers the switches of which he knew, he did not show them this main switch. I do not think he can be heard to say that he was not negligent in that respect, for his duty as manager of the factory was to know where the main switch was.

Counsel for the defendant company submitted that that did not matter, because the real cause of this accident was the transposing of the two wires in connection with the tumbler switches, which brought current into the neighbourhood of the fire and caused the death of the deceased, to which it was replied: Yes, but if the main switch had been indicated as a main switch, or if the firemen had been told it was the main switch, this accident would never have happened. BARRY, J., said that he accepted the evidence of the many witnesses who told him that any fireman would assume that two unconnected tumbler switches controlled some lighting points, but not the main supply. There was no negligence, in other words, on the part of any officer of the fire brigade. In dealing with the duty owed by an invitor to an invitee the judge said this:

"Stated at its very lowest, the duty of an occupier of premises to his invitee is to use proper care to ensure that his premises are free from any unusual danger, or, alternatively, to give due warning of any unusual danger of which he knows or ought to know. With this standard in mind I am quite satisfied that the defendant firm failed to fulfil their common law duties towards the deceased. It is, however, right to say that I acquit them of any conscious default. I am also far from satisfied that they ought to have known that the polarity of the lighting system had been reversed by the crossing of the leads between the tumbler switches and the meter and neutral phase. On the other hand, I consider that the occupiers of premises of this kind ought to have been aware of the way in which the mains supply to the lighting and power circuits could be switched off. I am fortified in this view by the evidence of Mr. Holland, the defendant firm's manager. He told me that he knew that the two tumbler switches did not control any local lighting points. This should, I think, have put him on inquiry as to their true function. Neither Mr. Holland nor anyone else in the employment of the defendant firm warned the deceased of the unusual danger which existed in those premises for firemen or other persons who might come into contact with the electric wires, this unusual danger being, of course, the fact that the lighting supply was controlled by a switch which did not appear to be a mains switch and that electric current could circulate through the electric circuit when the only two switches which appeared to be mains switches were turned to the off position. Put in another way, the defendant firm ought, I think, to have realised that the absence of any link-bar between the two tumbler switches constituted an unusual danger to persons in the situation of the deceased, against which such persons clearly ought to have been warned. If no warning was to be given, the defendant firm should have fulfilled their alternative duty, i.e., they should have rendered their premises safe and eliminated this unusual danger by the simple means of fitting a link-bar between the two tumbler switches or fixing some label or notice in the neighbourhood of the switches indicating that they controlled the main lighting supply to the building."

That is how the judge put the case on the plaintiff's claim against the defendant firm for negligence. I was much impressed by the argument of counsel for the defendant firm on this part of the case. I think it is extraordinarily hard on them, when they may well have thought they were entitled to rely on the visits from time to time of officers of the defendant board, to be found guilty of negligence in bringing about the death of a fire brigade officer because they had not pointed out the unusual danger, which would have been avoided if the regulations had been carried out. The real danger was introduced by the transposing of the wires. That was at least the main cause of the death. BARRY, J., heard all the evidence, and he came to the conclusion that the defendant firm were guilty of negligence, too, in that they had not pointed out the main switch, but had indicated another as the main switch. Clearly, their manager ought to have known that the tumbler switches were the main switch, and if he had done so this accident would not have happened. BARRY, J., felt, accordingly, that he could not acquit the defendant firm altogether from responsibility.

- A I feel myself that he might have reached the conclusion that, as the main responsibility was on the defendant board, who either had not tested or had not ascertained what they should have ascertained, the whole fault was on them, as counsel for the defendant firm submits. When a fire brigade is called to a place the most important thing is to turn off the main switch. There would have been no danger if the main switch had been turned off, and, although the factory was not a large one, with only some sixteen electricity points altogether, no one knew which was the main switch.

In considering the position of the defendant firm it is necessary to look at the evidence of Mr. Bigland, the sub-officer of the fire brigade, who went to the premises with the deceased just after 11.30 on the morning of Sept. 24, 1950. He was asked:

- D "And at about 11.35 did you, as a result of what was said to you, seek out the main electrical switches on the premises? (A) I did. (Q) Is the turning off of the main switches followed as a general rule when you are summoned to a fire? (A) Always, sir. The men are ordered to attend to the switches and to knock them off—and the gas. (Q) Did you go down to the switchboard on this day? (A) I did. (Q) Was the deceased with you? (A) Yes, sir. (Q) How did you find the switches—as the result of what the first defendants' works manager told you? (A) Yes, sir, Mr. Holland pointed out where the correct switches were. (Q) Look at the photographs. No. 1, that is the photograph of the switchboard. Is that right? (A) Yes, sir. (Q) When you went there did you what you call 'knock off' the handles of the switches shown on the photograph—one below the board and one to the left hand top corner of the board? (A) I did. (Q) Did you speak to Mr. Holland at that time? (A) Yes, sir. (BARRY, J.): Did Mr. Holland go with you? (A) He pointed out the position of the switches. (Counsel for the plaintiff): Are they in the basement? (A) On the ground floor. (Q) He came into the room in which the switches were? (A) Yes. (Q) And did you say anything to him about the switches, or he to you? (A) No, sir. Immediately after I had knocked off the switches I returned to the upper floor. (Q) When you went to the upper floor did you receive a minor shock yourself? (A) I did, sir. (Q) Mr. Bigland, was there in addition to the ordinary light switches a master switch on the premises? (A) Yes, sir, adjacent to the office door on the first floor there was a master switch just above my height. (Q) Was that off? (A) Yes, sir. (Q) When you found you had this minor shock did you then go back to the switchboard? (A) I immediately contacted Mr. Holland and ascertained from him that there were no other switches in that electric circuit other than those he took me to in the first onset. (Q) Did you go back to the switchboard? (A) I went back to the switchboard with Mr. Holland. (Q) And what did Mr. Holland do or say? (A) I asked him were there any more switches and he said 'No', and I told him this: We were still receiving shocks and that there must be other switches which were not in the off position. He immediately put on his glasses and stood on a packing case in front of the switchboard and ascertained that the switches on the board were in the off position, and I brought him then to the master switch which he said isolated all the lights on the upper storey. He got as near to it as six or nine inches. (BARRY, J.): To see that all the switches were off. (A) Yes, sir, it was rather dark. There was a little smoke knocking about in the ground floor premises. It was awkward to see, but Mr. Holland put on his glasses and got into a position where he could see the switchboard quite satisfactorily. (Q) He told you they were all off? (A) He said in his opinion they were all off, my Lord. (Counsel for the plaintiff): I think that shortly after that you realised that the deceased man had been electrocuted? (A) That is correct, sir. (Q) Now, Mr. Bigland, looking at that switchboard as you did, there are on the right hand side two tumbler switches, are there not? (A) Yes, sir. (Q) You now know this also formed the main switch? (A) I do now. (Q) At that time did you know that? (A) No, sir. (Q) Did they look like a main switch to you? (A) No, sir, they didn't. (Q) What did you think they were? (A) From their appearance they looked like ordinary lighting switches. (Q) Have you ever seen—well, first of all, was there a link bar connecting the two switches? (A) There was no link bar connecting the two switches. Had there been I would have had another look and made sure they were in the off position. (Q) Have you ever seen yourself tumbler switches without a link bar acting as main switches such as these? (A) Never in my experience and I was in the building trade. Nor have I since seen switches like that. (Q) How old are you? (A) Forty-two. (Q) Mr. Holland had not pointed them out to you? (A) No, sir, he had not pointed them out to me as main switches."

It appears fairly clear that, before the deceased was electrocuted, there had been not only the initial pointing out of the switches, but a return to them and an assurance that they were switched off, and thus that they were the only main switches. That was after Mr. Bigland had pointed out that they were still getting shocks and there must be another switch. From the cross-examination of that witness, it might be said that it is not wholly clear, even if such an assurance was given, that it was given before the electrocution of the deceased. There may be a doubt about that, though I should have thought that immediately the fire brigade officer was electrocuted there would be a cry-out at once, and in these comparatively small premises someone would have heard. It looks to me as though the assurance was given before the electrocution of the deceased, but I do not think one ought to place great reliance on that if there be any doubt about it.

I believe it to be the duty of the occupier of a factory to know where the main switch is. The manager of this factory did not know. The main switch was not as a main switch ordinarily is. There was no iron bar across, which would have indicated that it was the main switch, and which, as the fire brigade officer said, would have caused him to look again to see that it was off. In that respect I feel it difficult to say that the judge's finding against the defendant firm was wrong. I approach the matter in this way. Suppose there had not been any defendants other than the defendant firm. Suppose time had run in favour of the defendant board as a public authority before an action was brought, that the only defendants had been the defendant firm, and that it had been proved that their manager did not know where the main switch was, but had indicated to the fire brigade other switches as being the main switches. Is it clear that an action against the defendant firm in those circumstances would have failed? I do not think it is. It would have been for the judge to make up his mind on the evidence given whether negligence was proved or not. The judge examining this case carefully, and setting down his finding, arrived at the conclusion that he could not exonerate the defendant firm entirely.

H

Counsel for the defendant firm reminded the court that this is a re-hearing, and that, if we reached the conclusion that the judge was wrong, we ought to say so. I am not satisfied that he was wrong. In those circumstances no good purpose would be served by my saying what I should have found myself. I am not prepared to say that it would be right for this court to overrule the judgment of BARRY, J. I am sorry that I have reached that conclusion, for I think the far, far greater responsibility lies upon the defendant board who created the danger.

A I think there is much to be said in favour of the submission of counsel for the defendant firm that, if they have visits now and then from the defendant board, they are entitled to expect the board to point out if something is wrong. In this case the real mistake was the mistake of the defendant board's representatives. In the years that went by no one from the board pointed out to the defendant firm that anything was wrong. That is a terrible state of affairs, but it does not
B enable me to say that the learned judge was wrong in deciding that the occupiers of the premises, the defendant firm, were responsible to some extent. I have already said that I do not agree with the judge's finding that an action for damages for breach of statutory duty would lie in this case, but on the other part of the claim I feel that the appeal of the defendant firm must be dismissed.

C JENKINS, L.J.: I have found considerable difficulty in this case, but on the whole I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge's decision to the effect that the defendant firm are liable at common law to the plaintiff in respect of the accident to her husband ought not to be disturbed. I think that the defendant firm, in the person of their manager on the spot, Mr. Holland, ought to have known that the two tumbler switches in fact constituted the main switch for the lighting circuit on this building. I think Mr. Holland ought to have
D known that in his capacity as the manager of this factory, particularly in view of the statutory obligations to the defendant firm's own workpeople owed under the electricity regulations. Further, I think Mr. Holland, as representing the defendant firm, ought to have known that this was not a normal or modern type of main switch, and that the men of the fire brigade would be likely to overlook the fact that it was a main switch, and to consider that, by turning off the two-
E power circuit main switches adjacent to the switchboard, they had turned off the whole of the electric supply to this factory. Further, I think Mr. Holland must be taken to have known that it would be highly dangerous for the firemen to proceed to deal with the fire unless all current was cut off from the building, so as to prevent the risk to them of injury by electric shocks. In these circumstances, it seems to me that Mr. Holland ought to have known that the firemen
F here were exposed to an unusual danger consisting of the risk that, owing to the unusual and obsolete character of the main switch relating to the lighting circuit, they might seek to deal with the fire on the mistaken assumption that, by turning off the two-power circuit main switches, they had effectively made the whole of the electrical system in the factory dead. That being so, under the ordinary law of invitor and invitee, it was the duty of the defendant firm through
G Mr. Holland to protect the firemen from damage arising from this unusual danger, or to warn them of it. In actual fact he did neither of these things, and the result was that the current in the lighting circuit was not cut off at the main switch. So far, it seems to me, it would be reasonably plain that the learned judge was justified in holding the defendant firm liable. It is, however, still necessary to consider the effect on that conclusion of the circumstance that the master switch
H controlling all the lights in the upper part of the building (which was the seat of the fire) was turned off, so that, if all the wiring in connection with this system had been in proper order, no current would have reached the upper storey by reason of the omission to turn off the two tumbler switches, which constituted the main switch for the lighting circuit.

Counsel for the defendant firm has forcefully argued that, inasmuch as this master switch would have effectively rendered dead the electric wires in the immediate vicinity of the fire if the wiring had been in order, it cannot be said that Mr. Holland's omission to see that the firemen understood which were the main switches caused, or contributed to, the death of the deceased to any extent. The true cause, he said, was the reversing of the phase wire and the neutral wire at the switchboard, which prevented the master switch from effectively cutting off the current. It will be remembered that the learned judge in effect found it impossible to hold that the defendant firm or Mr. Holland knew, or ought to have known, of this reversing of the wires, and, accordingly, on counsel's argument, the true cause of the fatal accident to the deceased was an unusual danger of which it could not be said that Mr. Holland or the defendant firm knew, or ought to have known. I certainly would not differ from that finding of the learned judge. Nevertheless, in my view, the defendant firm cannot escape liability on account of the fact that the master switch was shut off. I think that feature of the case should be looked at in this way. For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, there was negligence on the part of the defendant firm in the person of Mr. Holland, and that negligence had resulted in an omission to shut off the main switch of the lighting circuit. If the wires had not been crossed at the switchboard, the circumstance that the master switch was shut off would have averted the consequences of that negligence, but inasmuch as the wires were crossed, or reversed, although that was not a circumstance of which Mr. Holland either knew, or ought to have known, nevertheless the result was that the consequences of the original negligence did operate; and, accordingly, although, as I have said, I regard this as a difficult case and I think that it is very near the line, I am on the whole of opinion that the learned judge's conclusion on this aspect of it ought not to be disturbed.

I agree that the existence of the statutory obligation under reg. 9 of the Regulations for the Generation, Transformation, Distribution and Use of Electrical Energy in Premises under the Factory Acts of 1908 which provides: affords strong support for the view that one must conclude that Mr. Holland, and through him the defendant firm, ought to have known of the probability that the two tumbler switches would not be recognised as a main switch, inasmuch as it was the duty of the defendant firm to link those two switches by means of a bar or other device in order to satisfy the provisions of reg. 9. On the other hand, I agree with my Lord that the deceased was not a person belonging to the class of “persons employed” for whose benefit these regulations were enacted, and, accordingly, I agree that the plaintiff could not successfully maintain a civil claim based on breach of that statutory duty.

I have only to add that, in my view, the case would be clearer against the defendant firm if it was plain on the evidence that the report of Mr. Bigland or other members of the fire brigade that they were still receiving electric shocks after the main switches had supposedly been turned off had been made, and that Mr. Holland's assurance that all the main switches were turned off had been given, before the moment when the deceased met his death. But the evidence as to the order of events is not sufficiently definite to make it possible for me to form any conclusion on that. Even so, for the other reasons I have endeavoured to state, I think that the learned judge's judgment on the matter of common law liability should stand. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered. It is abundantly clear that the substantial cause of this grievous accident was the negligence of the defendant board, who have been found ninety per cent. to blame. Counsel for the defendant firm has based his argument on the language of LORD WRIGHT in Yorkshire Dale Steamship Company v. Minister of War Transport (2), which is as follows ([1942] 2 All E.R. 15):

“ This choice of the real or efficient cause from out of the whole complex of the facts must be made by applying common-sense standards. Causation is to be understood as the man in the street, and not as either the scientist or the metaphysician, would understand it.”

Counsel for the defendant firm said, looking at this matter from the common-sense point of view without endeavouring to be unduly scientific or metaphysical, that the cause of this accident was the fact that the wires from the main switch to the meter were transposed, so that, the main switch not being in the off position, the electricity was running wild in the building along the neutral wires which should have been dead. That is a very strong argument, but the learned judge has found that there was a subsidiary and less important cause of this accident, which was that the defendant firm, the occupiers of the factory where the fire occurred and where the deceased met his death, were in breach of their common law duty, because if the main switch, which they ought to have known was a main switch, had been in the off position, the accident would not have happened. That is sufficient to establish a causal connection between the negligence and the accident. It is true that the manager had switched off another switch between the main switch and the premises where the man met his death, and two subsidiary switches, three in all, which would, if the wiring system had been in order, have prevented the accident. As JENKINS, L.J., has pointed out, the wiring system not being in order, in my view it is open to the court to come to the conclusion that the consequences of the original negligence persisted, and it is not right to exclude from consideration the deficient knowledge of the defendant firm of the inefficiency of their switch, and its situation.

I think that the way in which LORD WRIGHT put it, that this is a matter for the man in the street and is not a matter of scientific investigation, leads one to the conclusion that on the question of causation this court should be slow to interfere with the conclusion of the trial judge. Counsel for the defendant firm said, quite rightly, that, although the court should be slow to act, nevertheless it is open to the court to do so. I accept that, but, difficult as this case is, I feel myself unable to say with any certainty—indeed, I feel the reverse—that one can exclude from consideration, in dealing with the position at common law, the fact that the defendant firm were in breach of the electricity regulations.

I agree that it is not open to the plaintiff to found her cause of action on the regulation on which she relies. That regulation, reg. 9, is in general terms. It does not exclude the plaintiff from the class of persons who may bring an action, but it is made under what is now s. 60 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, which gives power to the Minister, on being satisfied that any manufacture, or machinery, or other matter, in a factory is of such a nature as to cause the risk of bodily injury to the persons employed, to make such regulations as appear to him to be reasonable and practicable and to meet the necessity of the case. That involves that regulations can only be made within the limits of the powers conferred by s. 60 (1), and s. 60 (1) contains the words “ persons employed ”, which were substituted for the words “ persons employed in connection therewith ” in the earlier legislation. These words do not, in my opinion, extend the ambit of the Act far enough to include a fireman who comes on the premises to fight a fire, whether called by the occupier or anyone else. I respectfully disagree with the learned judge’s construction of the words “ persons employed ” as being wide enough to cover such a person, and, as I have already, I think, made clear, I do not regard the regulations as being open to separate construction apart from the section of the Act under which they are made. I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Police—Pension—Appeal to quarter sessions—Appeal against decision of medical referee—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions—Police Pensions Act, 1948 (c. 24), s. 5 (1)—Police Pensions Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 1241), reg. 45 (1).

While a member of the metropolitan police force the appellant developed an infection which disabled him from performing his duties, and he was retired from the force and awarded an ill-health gratuity under the Police Pensions Regulations, 1949, reg. 5. The appellant applied for a supplementary pension under reg. 43 (2) in lieu of the gratuity, and when his disablement was certified by a duly qualified medical practitioner under reg. 43 (1) as not being the result of any injury received by him in the course of duty, he gave notice of appeal under reg. 44 (2). The Home Secretary appointed a medical referee who confirmed that the disablement was not the result of an injury received in the course of duty, and the appellant appealed to quarter sessions under the Police Pensions Act, 1948, s. 5 (1). The appeal committee dismissed the appeal on the preliminary objection that under reg. 45 (1) quarter sessions had jurisdiction only to decide whether or not the evidence before the medical referee was inaccurate or inadequate and did not have jurisdiction to review the decision of the medical referee or to hear further evidence. On appeal, HELD: section 5 (1), proviso (b), of the Act expressly stated that the regulations under the Act might provide for the reference of a case "to a medical practitioner, whose decision thereon shall, subject to such rights of appeal as may be provided by the regulations . . . be final"; by reg. 44 (3) the decision of the medical referee was final subject to reg. 45; reg. 45 (1) provided for an appeal only for the purpose of considering whether or not the evidence before the medical referee was "inaccurate or inadequate"; and, therefore, no appeal lay to quarter sessions against the decision of the medical referee.

APPEAL by John Raymond Ead from a decision of the Appeal Committee of the County of London Quarter Sessions.

The appellant joined the metropolitan police force on July 22, 1946, after a medical examination. By September, 1950, a tuberculous infection of his spine had developed. On Apr. 17, 1952, the appellant was examined by a consultant surgeon who issued a certificate dated Apr. 24, 1952, stating that the appellant was suffering from tuberculosis, that he was disabled from performing his duties as a member of the police force, and that such disablement was likely to be permanent. By letter dated May 13, 1952, the commissioner informed the appellant that, in view of that certificate, the date of the appellant's retirement from the police force would be May 15, 1952, and that he had been granted an ill-health gratuity under the Police Pensions Regulations, 1949, reg. 5. The appellant then applied for a supplemental pension under reg. 43 (2) in lieu of the gratuity, but, by a certificate dated July 24, 1952, the consultant surgeon certified that the disability was not the result of any injury received by the appellant in the course of his duty as a member of the police force and a supplemental pension was refused. By letter dated Aug. 19, 1952, the appellant gave notice of appeal under reg. 44 (2), and stated, inter alia, that he had received injury while arresting two prisoners on Jan. 20, 1948. In accordance with the provisions of reg. 44 (2), the Home Secretary was informed, and he appointed a medical referee to decide the appeal. On Nov. 13, 1952, the medical referee examined the appellant and the documentary evidence and decided that the disablement was not the result of any injury received by the appellant in the execution of his duties. The appellant appealed, under the Police Pensions Act, 1948, s. 5, to the County of London Quarter Sessions. The appeal was heard on Apr. 29, 1953, when counsel for the respondent, the Secretary of State, submitted that it was not open to that court to review the decision of the medical referee, but that their powers were limited to considering whether or not the evidence which had been placed before the medical referee was inaccurate or inadequate. The court upheld the submission, and on May 8, 1953, the appeal was dismissed.

R. D. L. Du Cann for the appellant.

Mervyn Griffiths-Jones for the Home Secretary.

PARKER, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This case comes before this court under the Police Pensions Act, 1948, s. 5 (3), which provides:

"An appeal shall lie on a point of law from any decision of a court of quarter sessions under this section to the High Court in accordance with rules of court and the decision of the High Court shall be final."

By the Police Pensions Regulations, 1949, reg. 43:

"(1) . . . the question whether a person is entitled to any and, if so, what awards . . . shall be determined in the first instance by the police authority.

(2) Where the police authority are considering whether a person is disabled they shall refer for decision to a duly qualified medical practitioner selected by them . . . (a) whether the person concerned is disabled, and . . . (c) whether the disablement is the result of an injury received in the execution of duty. (4) The certificate of the selected medical practitioner on the questions referred to him under the preceding provisions of this regulation shall, subject to the provisions of reg. 44 and reg. 45, be final."

Regulation 44 provides machinery for the aggrieved person to get a copy of that certificate and also enables him to appeal from the decision contained in it. That appeal is notified to the Secretary of State who is to appoint an independent person, called the medical referee, to decide the appeal, and that decision is final subject to the appeal provided for in reg. 45. Regulation 45 (1) reads as follows:

"A court hearing an appeal under s. 5 of the Act . . . may, if they consider that the evidence before the medical authority who has given the final decision was inaccurate or inadequate, refer the decision of that authority to him for re-consideration in the light of such facts as the court . . . may direct, and the medical authority shall accordingly re-consider his decision and, if necessary, issue a fresh certificate which, subject to any further re-consideration under this paragraph, shall be final."

In the present case the appellant was dissatisfied with the decision of the consultant surgeon, being the qualified medical practitioner. He appealed and the Secretary of State appointed a medical referee who came to the conclusion that the injury of which the appellant complained did not result from the appellant's service. From that decision of the medical referee the appellant appealed to the County of London Quarter Sessions, the appeal being, not on the ground that the medical referee had before him "inaccurate or inadequate evidence" on which to base his conclusion, but, as is admitted, against the medical referee's decision. Argument took place and the appeal committee ruled that they could not go into that question and that their jurisdiction was limited to deciding whether or not the evidence before the medical referee was inaccurate or inadequate so that they could determine whether or not they should refer the matter to him for re-consideration.

Before this court counsel for the appellant argued that by s. 5 of the Police Pensions Act, 1948, a person in the position of an appellant has a general right of appeal from the refusal of the police authority to grant a pension, and it must be remembered that the police authority has to be guided by or to act on the medical certificates. Accordingly, he says that the right of appeal is quite general except in so far as it has been expressly cut down by regulations. He agrees that there is power to cut down that right of appeal by regulations because by s. 5 (1), proviso (b), it is provided:

"regulations made under this Act may provide, in relation to questions arising out of those regulations, for the reference of any such matter as is specified in the regulations, either by the police authority or by the court, to a medical practitioner, whose decision thereon shall, subject to such rights of appeal as may be provided by the regulations to such tribunal as may be constituted thereunder, be final on the matter so referred."

Counsel says that, if one looks at reg. 45 (1) it is clear that the general right of appeal has not been cut down, but that that regulation is merely setting out what the court may do with such an appeal, the court being the quarter sessions.

In our view, the answer to that argument is that s. 5 of the Act gives no general right of appeal as such in the sense that it exists except in so far as it is taken away by the regulations. Section 5 provides, in sub-s. (1), proviso (b), that the regulations may contain provisions that certain medical matters shall be decided by the medical practitioner and that the certificate of the medical practitioner shall be final subject to any rights of appeal that the regulations may give. When one looks at the regulations, one finds that the certificate or the decision of the medical referee is final and there is no right of appeal except in so far as provided by reg. 45. I am satisfied that the only appeal provided by reg. 45 (1) is an appeal by an appellant who says that the medical referee had inaccurate or inadequate evidence on which to come to his conclusion, and that there is no appeal against the conclusion itself. In these circumstances, we dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. TANN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, J.J.), January 27, 28, 1954.]

Metropolis—Building—“Structure”—Car shelter of tubular steel framework covered with canvas—London Building Act, 1930 (c. clviii), s. 22 (1).

A The respondent erected in the front garden of her dwelling-house, which was situated in the administrative county of London, a car shelter, consisting of tubular steel framework, the main members of which were fixed together by pipe screw angles and joints, the framework being covered with a canvas covering fastened to it by canvas tapes and small tie-ropes. The shelter was affixed to two wooden gateposts in the forecourt wall of her house, and had sliding canvas curtains at its entrance from the road. The
B respondent was charged with unlawfully erecting a structure beyond the general line of buildings in the street in question without the consent in writing of the appellants, in contravention of the London Building Act, 1930, s. 22 (1).

C HELD: “structure” in s. 22 (1) was not to be construed ejusdem generis with the term “building”, since there was no genus and, on construction, s. 22 (1) was meant to include something wider than a building; “structure” in the sub-section meant a structure in the nature of a building, and, in deciding whether an erection was a structure its intention must be looked at; here, the shelter was intended to serve the purpose of a garage; and, therefore, it was a structure in the nature of a building, and the respondent was in breach of s. 22 (1).

F CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the North London Magistrate's Court on Oct. 21, 1953, the appellants, the London County Council, preferred an
G information against the respondent, charging that within the six months immediately preceding the laying of the information she unlawfully erected a structure (a car shelter) at 25, Paget Road, Stoke Newington, in contravention of s. 22 of the London Building Act, 1930, in that the structure was erected beyond the general line of buildings on the north side of Paget Road without the consent in writing of the appellants, whereby she became liable to the H penalty prescribed by s. 148 (2) (iii) of the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, and to have an order made against her to demolish the structure or a part of it.

The following facts were found. The car shelter was put in the forecourt or garden of the respondents' dwelling-house which was situate on, or fronting, the north side of, and was No. 25 in, Paget Road, Stoke Newington, by the respondent within the six months immediately preceding the date of the laying of the information. Paget Road was a street within the meaning of the London Building

Act, 1930, s. 22, and the general line of buildings on the north side on which No. 25 was situated was as defined by the certificate of the superintending architect of metropolitan buildings given in pursuance of s. 22. The general line of buildings was within fifty feet of Paget Road, and the car shelter was erected or brought forward in front of the general line of buildings without the consent in writing of the appellants. The car shelter consisted of a tubular steel framework, the main members of which were fixed together by pipe screw angles and joints, the framework being covered with a canvas covering, with sliding canvas curtains at its entrance from Paget Road. At the date of the laying of the information, the car shelter had rested on the ground without wheels, but small wheels had subsequently been affixed to and under the tubular framework. The canvas covering was fastened to the tubular framework by a series of canvas tapes and small tie-ropes. The shelter was affixed to two wooden gateposts in the forecourt of No. 25, Paget Road, by means of four metal fittings round the upright tubular framework with screws which were screwed to the wooden gateposts. The width between the gateposts was seven feet, and the overall width of the car shelter framework was seven feet, nine inches. The metropolitan borough of Stoke Newington had formed and made a vehicular crossing of the footway from the carriage way to the gateway in the forecourt wall of No. 25, the cost of which the respondent had paid to the council. The shelter had remained in situ since its erection and its purpose was to provide shelter for a car. A

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the shelter was a "building or structure" within the meaning of the London Building Act, 1930, s. 22, and that the respondent was liable to the penalties prescribed by the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, and to an order to demolish pursuant to the London Building Act, 1930, s. 30. The question was one of law, alternatively of mixed fact and law. Counsel for the respondent agreed that the question was one of law or of mixed fact and law, but contended that, nevertheless, the car shelter was not a structure within the meaning of s. 22 of the London Building Act, 1930. B

The magistrate dismissed the information and the appellants appealed. C

Percy Lamb, Q.C., and Scrivens for the appellants. D

C. Lawson for the respondent. E

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The learned magistrate found that this shelter was not a "structure", and, if it was a mere question of fact, we should be bound by his decision, but it seems to me that he has not asked himself the proper questions. What he says is this : F

"I was of opinion that the car shelter was not a building within the meaning of s. 22 of the London Building Act, 1930; that the term 'structure', as there used, must be construed ejusdem generis with the term 'building'; that a structure to be within the section must be something in the nature of a building; and that, applying those principles, the 'car shelter' was not a structure within the meaning of s. 22 of the said Act, but was something in the nature of a tent which in no way defeated or adversely affected the general objects of the London Building Act, 1930, as specified in the preamble to such Act." G

I think the learned magistrate was wrong in saying that he must construe the term "structure" as ejusdem generis with the term "building." There is no genus, and it is obvious that the Act is meant to include something wider than a building. If you had simply to construe the word "structure" ejusdem generis with the word "building" and say that "structure" meant a building, there would have been no necessity for the legislature to use both words. The real question is: Is this a structure? "Building" should be omitted from consideration altogether. H

A convenient test was laid down by LINDLEY, L.J., in Lavy v. London County Council (1) ([1895] 2 Q.B. 582), where he said:

"We must look at this case, and not at the effect of other cases. In this case we must ask ourselves, as men of the world, whether such a new wall [he was dealing with a wall] as this is not a building, structure, or erection within the mischief of s. 75 [of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862]."

- A I do not pretend that I know what the mischief is in these matters, but, if I ask myself whether this shelter is a structure, I confess I think the question is only capable of one answer. I think it is a structure. If it was a mere temporary thing, such as a tent in the summer time would be, I am not saying that it would be a structure, but the object of this thing is to provide this house with something which it has not got at present, namely, a garage. Clearly one would never be
- B able to get permission to build a garage at the place where this shelter is—when I say "build", I mean a garage consisting of ordinary building material—and this shelter is put there to remain their permanently. It is not a thing put up one week and moved the next.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., in London County Council v. Pearce (2) ([1892] 2 Q.B. 112), said:

- C "I do not mean to say that a man is to be allowed to evade the Act of Parliament by building on wheels what he intends to be a wooden structure, and then saying that it is not within the Act because it is on wheels. In all cases we must be guided by what I may call the intentions of the structure, and must inquire with what intention it was made."
- D In this case we are ignoring wheels. If you apply that test, it seems to me obvious that this structure, whatever you like to call it, was put there for the purpose of permanently housing a car at a place where there was no other garage. I think one must look at it as, I was almost going to say, a home-made garage, placed where it is in place of an ordinary garage. I think, therefore, that we must hold that the magistrate did not direct himself properly, and that,
- E if he had asked himself as an ordinary citizen what this shelter was, he must have come to the conclusion that it was a structure, and, therefore, this appeal must be allowed.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

- F PARKER, J.: I agree. I would only add that, speaking for myself, I am prepared to accept the view that "structure" in this context means a structure in the nature of a building. That was the phrase used by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in London County Council v. Illuminated Advertisements Co. (3) ([1904] 2 K.B. 892). The same meaning was put on that word, though in connection with a different Act, by ATKINSON, J., in South Wales Aluminium Co., Ltd. v. Neath Assessment Area Assessment Committee (4) ([1943] 2 All E.R. 592).
- G It seems to me that, in deciding whether a structure is something constructed in the nature of a building, it is perfectly proper to look at the intention of the structure, as, in the passage my Lord has referred to in London County Council v. Pearce (2), VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., expressly so states. Looking at the matter in that light and adopting the test laid down by LINDLEY, L.J., in Lavy v. London County Council (1), the question posed is this: As men of the
- H world can we say that this thing, to use a neutral expression, is a structure constructed in the nature of a building? It is quite clear that this erection was intended to be a garage, and, looked at in that way, and asking oneself the question: Is this a structure in the nature of a garage?, the answer is clearly, Yes. It seems to me that the learned magistrate misdirected himself in first of all seeking to apply the ejusdem generis rule, and then treating "structure" as in the nature of a building in the sense that, if it was made of canvas, it could not be a building, because it was in the nature of a tent. It seems to me that the statement of facts admits of only one conclusion, that is, that this was a structure within the meaning of the Act.

Fishery—Salmon fishery—“Fixed engine”—Drifting net with light anchors attached to act as brake—Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923 (c. 16), s. 11 (1), s. 92 (1) (c).

B

Where light anchors are attached to a salmon net merely for the purpose of acting as a brake or drag and the net is intended to, and does in fact, drift with the tide, it is not a “fixed engine” within the meaning of s. 11 (1) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923, as it is neither “fixed”, nor “secured by anchors”, nor “made stationary in any other way”, within the definition of “fixed engine” in s. 92 (1) of the Act.

CASE STATED by Northumberland justices.

On Sept. 5, 1953, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Alnwick, an information was preferred by the appellant, John Percival, on behalf of the Northumberland and Tyneside River Board, charging the respondents, William Stanton and George Robert Stanton, with an offence against the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923, s. 11, in that on July 30, 1953, they unlawfully used a fixed engine, namely, a net secured by anchors, for taking salmon in tidal waters, namely, the sea, south of Alnmouth.

E

At the hearing of the information on Oct. 15, 1953, the following facts were proved or admitted. On July 30, 1953, the respondents were fishing for salmon in the open sea, in a bay off the coast of Northumberland, by means of a salmon net which was shot from a fishing coble in the form of a letter “T”. The net was suspended in the water by means of cork floats. The approximate length of its headpiece was one hundred yards and of its tailpiece two hundred yards, and its approximate weight, when wet, was above eight hundredweights. The end of the tailpiece was close to the water's edge and the headpiece was some two hundred yards outward into the sea, lying approximately parallel to the water's edge. There were strong tidal currents in that part of the sea, and at the time of the fishing operation there was a reasonably strong wind blowing. Without some means of keeping the net in formation, the action of the wind and currents would have reduced the net into a shapeless tangle, and fishing by this method would not have been possible. To keep the net in formation, the respondents attached a bundle of metal quoits to the end of the tailpiece and, by means of detachable ropes tied to the net, they also attached three anchors to the headpiece. The anchors were made of iron, were of light type and of conventional two-fluked pattern, and each weighed about three pounds. Their effect was to act as a drag or brake on the drift and movement of the net, and they did not act, and were not intended to act, so as to secure the net, as a stationary object, to the sea-bed. At that place the sea-bed consisted of smooth, soft, shingly sand, and the net was able to, and in fact did, drift substantially with the currents, although braked in its freedom of unrestricted movement by the dragging of the anchors through the sand. The respondent, William Stanton, had followed this method of fishing for over thirty years.

- The issues were: (i) Was the net a "fixed engine" within the meaning of s. 11 of the Act of 1923? (ii) Was the sea wherein the net was shot "tidal waters" within the meaning of the section? On the issue of "fixed engine", it was A contended by the appellant that the three anchors attached to the net made it a "fixed engine" within the meaning of s. 11, as it thereby became a "net secured by anchors" within the definition of "fixed engine" in s. 92 (1) of the Act, and that it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove, or for the court to find, that the net, by reason of the anchors, became affixed to and stationary on the B sea-bed. The respondents contended (i) that the phrase "secured by anchors" meant moored to the sea-bed as a fixed and stationary object, and that, as the anchors in this case were not intended to, and did not, have that effect, but merely acted as a brake or drag to keep the net in formation, and allowed substantial drift, the anchors did not "secure" the net and make it a "fixed engine"; (ii) that the words "secured by anchors" should be construed C ejusdem generis with the words "or made stationary in any other way" in s. 92 (1); and (iii) that, the Act being a penal Act, the words "secured by anchors" should be read in their ordinary meaning as making fast, and that a wider and more generalised meaning should not be attached to the phrase. The respondents relied on the meaning of the words "anchor" and "secure" in the OXFORD DICTIONARY. The justices were of the opinion that the net used by the D respondents was not a "fixed" engine within the meaning of s. 11 of the Act, and dismissed the charge. At the invitation of both parties they formally determined that the open sea in which the respondents were fishing was not "tidal waters" within the meaning of the section.

Widgery for the appellant.

Aarvold and R. A. Percy for the respondents.

- E LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices of the county of Northumberland, who, I expect, know a good deal about salmon fishing along that coast and about the habits and methods of salmon fishers. The justices dismissed an information against the respondents which charged them that they

- F "did unlawfully use a fixed engine, namely, a net secured by anchors, for taking salmon in tidal waters, namely, the sea south of Alnmouth, contrary to the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923, s. 11."

- Two questions were stated by the justices for our decision. The first was whether the net used by the respondents was a "fixed engine" within the meaning of s. 11. If it was not, obviously no offence has been committed. The G second question was whether or not, as the net was in the sea, it could properly be described as being "in tidal waters". That rather depends on some definitions which appear and which have from time to time appeared in the Salmon Fishery Acts, but, as the court is of the opinion, on the facts found by the justices, that no offence has been committed because this was not a "fixed engine" it would not be desirable for us to give any opinion on the construction of "tidal waters", H because our opinion would be merely obiter and could be challenged in any future case.

The facts found by the justices, to put them shortly, are that the net which the respondents were operating was a T-shaped net. Exactly how the tailpiece is attached to the headpiece does not appear, and I do not think it matters, but the tailpiece, when it is shot from the boat, comes very nearly, though not quite, to the shore. It is weighted at one end with some quoits. At the top it has cork floats to keep it floating in the water and on the bottom it has some steel quoits at the end, to keep it straight. The headpiece, which also has cork floats to keep the net at the proper depth, has at the bottom, or sea-bed, end three light anchors. The approximate weight of the net when it is wet is upwards of eight hundredweights, and each anchor weighs about three pounds. The object of the anchors is to weigh down the net to some extent so as to keep it from getting into a "shapeless tangle", as the justices said. The justices found that the effect of the anchors was to act as a drag or brake on the drift and movement of the net, and that they did not act, and were not intended to act, so as to secure the net to the sea-bed as a stationary object. The sea-bed at the place consisted of smooth, soft, shingly sand, and the net was able to, and in point of fact did, drift substantially with the currents, albeit braked in its freedom of unrestricted movement by the dragging of the anchors through the sand. The question is whether those anchors turn this net into a "fixed engine" within the meaning of s. 11 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923.

The definition in s. 92 (1) of the Act of 1923—and I shall have to deal with the earlier Acts historically in a moment—is:

"The expression 'fixed engine' includes . . . (c) any net secured by anchors and any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way, not being a fishing weir or fishing mill dam . . ."

That definition is not an absolute definition, as it states what a "fixed engine" includes, but the first thing I should say with regard to a "fixed engine" is that it must be fixed. I do not see how, whatever the definition clause says that the expression is to include, it could remove the necessity for a "fixed engine" to be fixed, and, if a thing is fixed, it seems to me, it must be stationary. The words of the definition are:

" . . . any net secured by anchors and any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way . . ."

Applying the ordinary canons of construction, I think that the words "secured by anchors" show, in view of the words which follow, that the net is meant to be secured so that it is fixed, so that it is stationary. I think that that is supported by the history of the Salmon Fishery Acts, because the Act of 1923 is a consolidating Act as well as an amending Act, and it is quite obvious that, being a consolidating Act, it has borrowed the words of the definition from the previous Acts which it consolidates, and one has to see what those Acts provided. The Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, s. 4, provided:

" 'Fixed engine' shall include stake nets, bag nets, putts, putchers, and all fixed implements or engines for catching or for facilitating the catching of fish."

There, again, I emphasise the word "fixed", because, as I have said, it seems to me that nothing can be a "fixed engine" unless it is fixed. Then, in s. 11 of the Act of 1861, that definition was somewhat expanded. By s. 11, which prohibited the placing of "fixed engines" in any inland or tidal waters, it was provided that, for the purposes of the section,

" . . . a net that is secured by anchors, or otherwise temporarily fixed to the soil, shall be deemed to be a fixed engine . . ."

While that was the state of the law, Thomas v. Jones (1) came before a court of the Queen's Bench Division. In that case a net was used on the River Tivy, near Cardigan, by a fisherman who had got his net secured at one end, but the court held that it was not a "fixed engine" because, being unsecured at the other end, directly the salmon hit the net the net rolled round the salmon and, therefore, because it could roll round the salmon, it was not a fixed net. Whether I should have decided the case in the same way as the Court of Queen's Bench decided it in 1864, if I had been alive and sitting in 1864, I do not know. I have a strong suspicion that I should not. That was a decision which was not open to appeal, and, therefore, in 1865 the legislature stepped in and put an amending definition of "fixed engine" in s. 39 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1865, which runs in this way:

"'Fixed engine' shall in this Act and the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, include any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way . . ."

A So, first, there is s. 11 of the Act of 1861, which deals with "a net . . . secured by anchors, or otherwise temporarily fixed to the soil", and then in s. 39 of the Act of 1865 there is a "net or other implement . . . fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way". In the Act of 1923, which, as I have already said, is a consolidating Act, the legislature naturally refer back to the two earlier Acts and incorporate both of those definitions or descriptions in s. 92 (1): "Any net secured by anchors"—that is borrowed from the Act of 1861—

" . . . and any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way . . ."

C That is borrowed from the Act of 1865 and is intended to enlarge the words of the first definition. I do not think that that means that one ought to contrast "secured by anchors" with "made stationary in any other way". The history of the definition of "fixed engine" makes it clear that Parliament used the words which they used in s. 92 (1) of the Act of 1923 because the words "secured by anchors" were in the Act of 1861, and they incorporated them into the Act of 1923 together with the extended definition which was put into the Act of 1865 because of Thomas v. Jones (1).

D It seems to me, however, that in all cases of this kind to some extent it must be a question of degree. If it is a question of degree, it is a question of fact for the justices, and in the present case the justices have found that the net was not a "fixed engine" because it was not fixed. I do not want it to be said that, if it is shown that a net has been let down with anchors attached to it, the net ceases to be a "fixed engine" merely because the anchors have dragged, as they might do in a storm. If they are put down with the intention of anchoring the net to the sea-bed, then I think that the net becomes "secured by anchors". But if, as the justices found in this case, these little light anchors were used, not for that purpose, but merely to act as a brake or a drag on a net which was intended to drift with the tide, it seems to me that one cannot say that the net is a "fixed engine". First, it is not "fixed", and, secondly, it is not "secured by anchors".

F It has got some anchors on it, but they do not secure it. Nor is it "made stationary in any other way", because it is not stationary. It moves. It is partly a question of fact and partly a question of construction, but I have come to the conclusion that we cannot interfere with the decision of the justices in this case. Indeed, I think they were right.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 25, 1954.]

Education—Cleanliness of pupil—Verminous hair—Proceedings against parent—Pupil living with father and mother—Liability of mother—Education Act, 1944 (c. 31), s. 54 (6).

A pupil at a school whose hair was cleansed under a compulsory cleansing order of a medical officer of health made under s. 54 (3) of the Education Act, 1944, was again found to have his hair infested with vermin. The child lived with his father and mother, and the mother was charged, as his parent, with an offence against s. 54 (6) of the Education Act, 1944. She contended that, where a child lived with his father and mother, the mother was not "his parent" within the meaning of that sub-section. It was found as a fact that the child's condition was due to the neglect of the mother.

HELD: "parent" in s. 54 (6) included the mother; and as, on the facts, the condition of the child was due to her neglect, she was guilty of an offence under the sub-section.

CASE STATED by the Liverpool stipendiary magistrate. E

On June 27, 1953, the respondent, Thomas Alker, clerk to the Liverpool education authority, preferred an information against the appellant, Catherine Plunkett, and against James Plunkett, her husband, charging that they, on May 15, 1953, were the parents of Christopher Plunkett, a pupil in attendance at Prince Rupert County School, Liverpool, whose person, after cleansing under the order of the medical officer of health had been carried out, was again found to be infested with vermin while in attendance at the said school, and that the said condition of his person was due to neglect on the part of the appellant and the said James Plunkett, contrary to the Education Act, 1944, s. 54 (6). F

At the hearing of the information on Aug. 5, 1953, no evidence was offered against the said James Plunkett, and the information was amended to read against the appellant only. It was proved or admitted that the appellant was the mother of the said Christopher Plunkett; that on June 1, 1951, he was a pupil at Hayworth Street School and, on May 15, a pupil at Prince Rupert County Secondary Modern School; that on June 1, 1951, the hair of the boy was examined by a school nurse under s. 54 (2) and was found to be infested with vermin; that a notice under s. 54 (3) of the Act of 1944 was posted to the appellant and her husband, requiring them within twenty-four hours to cleanse the hair of the boy to the satisfaction of the nurse; that the hair was not so cleansed and a compulsory cleansing order was made under s. 54 (3); that a notice was posted to the appellant and her husband, informing them that the hair of the boy had been cleansed and drawing their attention to the provisions of s. 54 (6) of the Act; that the appellant and her husband, the parents of the boy, lived together as man and wife with the boy at all material times in Liverpool; that on June 11, 1951, the nurse visited and spoke to the appellant who admitted receipt of the notice. G and advised and instructed her about the cleansing of hair; that on May 15, 1953, the nurse examined the boy and his hair was again found to be infested with vermin; that the appellant admitted to the nurse that she had not attended to the hair of the boy for a week, saying that she had been kept busy canvassing for her husband's business; and that the condition of the hair of the boy was due to neglect on the part of the appellant.

- A On behalf of the appellant it was contended that where the parents of a child were living together in the same house with their child the father was the "parent" of the child for the purposes of the Education Act, 1944, and that, accordingly, the present proceedings against the mother were not competent. On behalf of the respondent it was contended (i) that the appellant was the parent of the child within the meaning of s. 54 (6) and s. 114 (1) of the Act of 1944; (ii) that the authorities relied on by the appellant, namely, London County Council v. Stansell (1) and Woodward v. Oldfield (2), were no longer of binding force inasmuch as they were decided under the Education Act, 1921, which was repealed and replaced by the Act of 1944 with changes of wording sufficient to remove the binding force of those authorities; (iii) that s. 54 (6) of the Act of 1944 imported the element of neglect as an integral part of the offence thereunder and that the term "parent" for the purposes of the said section meant or included the person within the meaning of the definition of the term "parent" laid down by s. 114 (1) to whose neglect the condition complained of is due.

The magistrate was of opinion that the contention of the respondent was correct and that the appellant was properly charged in these proceedings. Accordingly, he convicted the appellant and fined her 10s.

- D Collinson for the appellant.
D. B. McNeill for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The Education Act, 1944, s. 54 (6), provides:

- E "If, after the cleansing of the person or clothing of any pupil has been carried out under this section, his person or clothing is again found to be infested with vermin or in a foul condition at any time while he is in attendance at a school maintained by a local education authority or at a county college, and it is proved that the condition of his person or clothing is due to neglect on the part of his parent, or in the case of a pupil in attendance at a county college to his own neglect, the parent or the pupil, as the case may be, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding 20s."

The word "parent" is defined in s. 114 (1) as follows:

" 'Parent', in relation to any child or young person, includes a guardian and every person who has the actual custody of the child or young person."

- G That sub-section does not say that the mother is not a parent, and I take it that if a child is living with, say, an aunt or grandparent so that that person has the actual custody of the child, that person might be answerable under s. 54 (6). I think it is at least a reasonable interpretation of those words in s. 114 (1) that the legislature is drawing a distinction between actual and legal custody, and that the words "actual custody" show that the person responsible is that person who at the time of the summons really has the child in his or her custody. We have also to remember that, unless the contrary intention appears, the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 1 (1) (b), requires us to read the singular as including the plural. Therefore, the word "parent" must be construed as "parents" unless the contrary intention appears.

H If, therefore, the matter were free of authority I do not think I should have any hesitation in holding that, if the magistrate finds as a fact, as he must be taken to have done in the present case, that the condition of the child was due to the neglect of the mother, she, as a parent, contravenes s. 54 (6). If the child is living with and is in the care of the mother, I think it can be said that she has the actual, though she may not have the legal, custody. But whether or not she has the actual custody, as I have already said, s. 114 (1) does not exclude the mother, but merely says who may be included in the word "parent". In the present case the mother was found to be responsible for the condition of the boy, but it is said that this court is bound by London County Council v. Stansell (1) which was a decision under the Education Act, 1921, s. 87 of which provides:

"(1) A local education authority for elementary education may direct their medical officer, . . . to examine in any public elementary school . . . the person and clothing of any child attending the school, and, if on examination the medical officer, . . . is of opinion that the person or clothing of any such child is infected with vermin . . . the local education authority may give notice in writing to the parent of the child, requiring him to cleanse properly the person and clothing of the child within twenty-four hours . . .

(4) Where, after the person or clothing of a child has been cleansed by a local education authority under this section, the parent of the child allows him to get into such a condition that it is again necessary to proceed under this section, the parent shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 10s."

In Stansell's case (1) the mother was summoned, and the justices, on the authority, as they stated in their Case, of Hance v. Burnett (3) and Woodward v. Oldfield (2), held that the father, and not the mother, was the person who ought to have been summoned. On appeal this court held that the justices came to a right decision. LORD HEWART, C.J., giving the judgment, said (154 L.T. 242):

"The justices were clearly right. They came to the conclusion that the 'parent' referred to in s. 87 of the Education Act, 1921, where the father and mother were living together and the child was living with both of them, was the father. They have set out their reasons for their decision, and I think that they have come to the right conclusion for the reasons which they have given."

Both SINGLETON, J., and I agreed. I say at once that, having further considered that case, I am in doubt whether or not we were right. The Interpretation Act, 1889, does not seem to have been brought to the attention of the court nor did the court remind itself of that Act.

The justices in that case said that they followed Hance v. Burnett (3) and Woodward v. Oldfield (2). Woodward v. Oldfield (2) was a case of a defective child over seven years old residing with and in the actual custody of her mother, and the father was serving a sentence of penal servitude. The mother was held by the court to be the parent of the child within the meaning of Part V of the Education Act, 1921, so that steps could be taken under s. 54 (1) of that Act requiring her to send the child to a special school, because she had the custody of the child while the father was in prison. In Hance v. Burnett (3) it was decided that a mother could be made liable for not sending a child to school if the father was a seaman and was away at sea at the time, because he could not possibly attend to the matter. With regard to many of the offences under the Education Act, 1921, it may be that both father and mother are liable, but we are now dealing with a section of the Act of 1944 in which the word "neglect" is used. If the condition of the child is due to the neglect of the mother, who, as I have already pointed out, is, undoubtedly, a parent, I have difficulty in seeing why the mother does not commit the offence which is mentioned in s. 54 (6). Supposing the father had been summoned, he might have said: "It is not a question whether I have 'allowed' it [see s. 87 (4) of the Act of 1921]. It is a question whether or not the condition of the child is due to my neglect. I do not wash the child, and I do not brush the child's hair. All that is done by his mother. I am not called on to examine the child every day or every week to see if his

- hair has got vermin in it. I have not neglected my duty as a parent because I have not inspected the child to that extent, because I am entitled to rely on my wife ". I can see that in many cases under the Act of 1944 the father would have a defence on the ground that he had not been negligent. I have doubt whether or not London County Council v. Stansell (1) was rightly decided, and, in any case, we now have another Act which contains other words, and I think we can treat the present case as res integra and put our own construction on the words of s. 54 (6).
- A I do not say that, if both parents were summoned, they might not both be convicted, provided the court came to the conclusion that both had neglected the child, but, in coming to the conclusion whether or not there has been neglect, the court would have to take into account, as in all cases of negligence, the circumstances of the case. I can quite well see in a case of this sort that justices could come to the conclusion that a father had not been guilty of neglect, though
- B the mother had, and, I suppose, in some circumstances they might find the other way round. There are frequently cases under the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 1 (1), in which a father and mother are charged with neglecting a child so as to cause unnecessary suffering or injury to health apart from actual cruelty. The words of s. 1 (1) of that Act certainly refer to "... any person who ... has the custody, charge or care of any child ". In theory of law,
- C if the father is living in the house, he is the person who has the custody, and, I suppose, may be said to have the charge and to some extent the care of the child, but the mother can also be, and frequently is, charged under that sub-section. I have never yet heard it suggested that the mother cannot be charged if she is responsible for the neglect of the child, although her husband may also be charged.
- D I think that in the present case we can say that, the magistrate having found as a question of fact, and it not being suggested there was no evidence on which he could so find, that the condition of the boy's head was due to the neglect of the mother, she is answerable under this sub-section. Therefore, I think the magistrate came to a right decision on the facts he found, and that this appeal fails.
- E BYRNE, J.: I agree. I think there is such a difference between the wording of s. 54 (6) of the Act of 1944 and that of s. 87 (4) of the Act of 1921 that this court is not bound by the decision in London County Council v. Stansell (1), and I am of opinion that the learned magistrate was right.

NATIONAL ASSISTANCE BOARD v. PRISK.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 29, 1954.]

National Assistance—Husband and wife—Deed of separation—Grant of national assistance to wife—Liability of husband to National Assistance Board—National Assistance Act, 1948 (c. 29), s. 42 (1) (a), s. 43 (2).

The respondent and his wife separated in 1938, and under a deed of separation, dated Mar. 11, 1938, he agreed to pay her £1 a week for maintenance, which sum he had paid regularly. On Dec. 17, 1952, justices dismissed a complaint by the wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, that the respondent had wilfully neglected to maintain her. In 1953 the wife applied for, and was granted, assistance by the National Assistance Board, she having been forced to cease working owing to ill health, and the board sought to recover the amounts which they had paid to the wife from the respondent.

HELD: the existence of a deed of separation and the fact that the respondent had made his payments in full under the deed did not debar the wife from taking proceedings in respect of maintenance: Tulip v. Tulip ([1951] 2 All E.R. 91), and Dowell v. Dowell ([1952] 2 All E.R. 141), applied; under the National Assistance Act, 1948, s. 42 (1), the respondent remained liable to maintain his wife even though he was paying a weekly sum under the deed of separation, since that sum was not reasonable maintenance, and, therefore, the appellants were entitled to recover from him under s. 43 (2) of the Act of 1948, the money which they had paid to the wife by way of assistance.

The case must be sent back to the justices for them to inquire what would be a reasonable sum for the respondent to pay under s. 43 (2).

CASE STATED by Cornwall justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Penzance on Aug. 5, 1953, the appellants, the National Assistance Board, preferred two complaints against the respondent, William Prisk, alleging that he was the husband of Elizabeth Moon Prisk, whom he was liable to maintain pursuant to the National Assistance Act, 1948, s. 42, and by reference to whose requirement (i) assistance under Part II of that Act, amounting to £27 19s., was given at the Post Office, Cornor Downs, Hayle, between Jan. 19, 1953, and July 13, 1953, and (ii) assistance under Part II of the Act was given at the Post Office, Cornor Downs, Hayle, on Mar. 3, 1953, and divers other days, and was continuing to be given at the weekly rate of 21s. 6d., and they applied for summonses to be served on the respondent to show cause why orders should not be made on him under s. 43 (2) of the Act of 1948 (i) to repay the £27 19s., and (ii) 21s. 6d. weekly or otherwise, as the court might think appropriate.

The following facts were found. The respondent was lawfully married to Elizabeth Moon Prisk on July 13, 1920. On Mar. 11, 1938, they entered into a separation agreement whereby they agreed to live apart and the respondent agreed to pay her the weekly sum of £1 in respect of her own maintenance, together with a weekly sum of 10s. being 5s. each for the maintenance of the two children of the marriage. The respondent complied regularly with the agreement and all payments due thereunder had been made to date. The children were now over sixteen years, and the payments in respect of them had ceased. The respondent's wife had supplemented her allowance by employment, but she decided to live with her aged mother, and was forced to relinquish her employment owing to her own and her mother's ill health. The respondent's wife was in need of assistance and had received it to the extent and in the manner alleged in the complaints. On Dec. 17, 1952, the respondent was summoned to appear before justices to answer a complaint by his wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, that he had wilfully neglected to maintain her. The summons was dismissed. It was applied for on the advice of the appellants. The respondent's wife was not prepared to resume cohabitation with him. He was employed as a road foreman by Cornwall County Council, and received an average gross wage of £7 2s. a week, which included £1 7s. for travelling to work. Out of his weekly wage he paid £1 to his wife, £2 10s. for his board and lodging, and £2 5s. under a hire-purchase agreement relating to his motor bicycle which he used for his work as a road foreman. He also had other expenses in connection with his work.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, for the purposes of the National Assistance Act, 1948, the respondent was liable to maintain his wife, unless she had committed a matrimonial offence. The respondent's wife had committed no matrimonial offence. Even if she had failed to obtain an order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, the appellants were entitled to orders against the respondent under the National Assistance Act, 1948, s. 43. The existence of the separation agreement of Mar. 11, 1938, with which the respondent had regularly complied, was no bar to the appellants' obtaining an order under s. 43 of the Act of 1948. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the liability under s. 43 of the Act of 1948 was subject to the common law defence open to him. The existence of the separation agreement, with which he had regularly complied, was a bar to the appellants' obtaining an order under s. 43. The matter had been considered by the court on the hearing of the summons of Dec. 17, 1952, brought at the appellants' instance, and had been determined in the respondent's favour, and there was no fresh evidence now offered at the hearing of Aug. 5, 1953, to justify any order. Having regard to the evidence adduced as to the respondent's means, the court should not consider it reasonable to make an order.

The justices dismissed the complaints and the appellants appealed.

J. P. Ashworth for the appellants.

H. E. Park for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: It appears that the respondent and his wife separated nearly sixteen years ago when the value of money was very different from what it is today. Under the deed of separation the respondent undertook to pay his wife £1 a week, and 10s. a week for the two children of the marriage. The obligation to pay 5s. a week for each child has ceased, but that is not a ground on which we are going to decide the case in any respect, although it may be a matter for the justices to consider when it is sent back to them.

The wife took proceedings before the justices in December, 1952, alleging wilful neglect to maintain. At first sight it looks rather odd that a husband should be said to be wilfully neglecting to maintain his wife if he is paying money due under a deed, but it is too late to argue that now. "Wilful" means, in the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, "deliberate", that is to say, deliberately refusing to pay, with no excuse except the deed. It was decided in Tulip v. Tulip (1) and in Dowell v. Dowell (2), that the existence of a deed, and the fact that a husband has made his payments under the deed, is no bar to the wife's taking proceedings in respect of maintenance, either before the justices under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1949, or before the High Court under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949. If one analyses those cases, the reason why the deed cannot be set up as an answer is that the respondent still remains liable to maintain his wife unless, of course, she has committed a matrimonial offence. He remains liable to maintain his wife because of the common law relationship of husband and wife. It may be shown that the fact that he has covenanted to pay her £1 a week does not provide her with adequate maintenance and, of course, one object of these orders that are made against husbands in respect of their wives is to prevent the wives becoming a charge on public funds. So the courts have held in the two cases which I have mentioned (which are binding on this court and which, if I may say so, seem to me to lay down most excellent law) that, as long as the obligation remains on the husband to support his wife, the fact that the deed provides that the husband shall pay £1 a week to his wife does not prevent the court saying: "That is not now adequate maintenance, and, as you are bound to provide adequate maintenance, notwithstanding that £1 a week has been agreed, we shall make an order against you." The order would take into account the £1 a week, and it would be a matter for the justices to find what is a fair and adequate sum in all the circumstances of the case, among the circumstances being the husband's means.

Counsel for the respondent has asked us to say that National Assistance Board v. Wilkinson (3) lays down that if the husband would have had any defence at common law or under any statute, it is still open to him if the National Assistance Board take proceedings. I will say a word about the National Assistance Board's position in the matter in a moment. So far as the relationship of husband and wife is concerned, Wilkinson's case (3) merely laid down that the husband could always show, whether he was prosecuted by the National Assistance Board or taken to court by his wife, that his obligation to maintain his wife had ceased. It would not be sufficient to show merely that they had separated under a deed, for that does not terminate the husband's obligation to maintain his wife. No husband is obliged to support his wife if she has committed adultery. That has been laid down ever since the earliest times in our law, and I see that in Wilkinson's case (3) I cited a well-known dictum of LITTLEDALE, J., in R. v. Flintan (4) (1 B. & Ad. 230):

"[the wife] having rendered herself unworthy of her husband's protection, she returns to the same state as if she were not married", and (ibid., 231):

"If the husband is not obliged to answer for the wife's contracts, or to receive her into his house, it cannot be said that he is 'legally bound to maintain her'."

In a case where the wife has deserted her husband, the law is different. It was laid down in Jones v. Newtown & Llanidloes Union (5), that the right of the wife who is in desertion of her husband to maintenance is only suspended, and if she returns to her husband then she has a right to be maintained: but, as long as she is in desertion, the husband is under no obligation to support her. In Wilkinson's case (3) there was desertion by the wife. The husband provided a perfectly proper and adequate home for the wife, but she wanted to live elsewhere and would not go and live with him. The husband was not bound to support her so long as she lived apart from him. That is what Wilkinson's case (3) decided, and it decided nothing else. It was left open to the husband to say that he was under no obligation to maintain her.

The only other question is whether the appellants, in these circumstances, can obtain an order against the respondent for such amount as the court may think reasonable that he should, in addition to the sum under the deed, provide for his wife. In my opinion, they can because the National Assistance Act, 1948, s. 43, provides:

A “(1) Where assistance is given or applied for by reference to the requirements of any person (in this section referred to as a person assisted), the board or the local authority concerned may make a complaint to the court against any other person who for the purposes of this Act is liable to maintain the person assisted. (2) On a complaint under this section the court shall have regard to all the circumstances and in particular to the resources of the defendant, and may order the defendant to pay such sum, weekly or otherwise, as the court may consider appropriate.”

The liability is perfectly clear ; a husband is liable to maintain his wife.

B In this case, the wife applied to the justices in December, 1952, and they, wrongly in our opinion, felt that they could not order any maintenance because the respondent was paying under the deed. The result was that the wife was left with £1 a week—and one has only to state the amount to show that she could not live on that. What was she to do ? She had to obtain relief, the respondent still remaining liable to maintain her. If the appellants have paid money to her, they can go to the respondent, who is liable to maintain her, and say: “You must repay us the money that we have paid to your wife because you are in default. You are not maintaining your wife by paying her reasonable maintenance; you are only paying her the money under the deed. We have had to pay her, and, therefore, we ask that you should repay us and pay us that which we shall have to pay her in the future.” The case must, therefore, go back to the justices and they must inquire what would be a reasonable amount for the respondent to pay.

E Attention has been called to the presence in the deed of what I may call a set-off clause, that is to say, if the respondent made his payment under the deed the wife had to discharge all her debts and liabilities out of that, and if he, by her pledging his credit, had to pay anything in addition, he would be entitled to deduct it from what he had to pay under the deed. Of course, we do not intend this case to go back to the justices with the absurd result that, if the justices come to the conclusion that the respondent should pay £1 a week in addition to the £1 a week that he is paying, that is a total of £2 a week, he should set off against the £1 that he pays under the deed the amount that he is ordered to pay by the justices. What we intend is that the appellants shall show the justices F what they have paid, and, if they think that sum is reasonable, the respondent must pay it, or, at any rate, so much of the sum as they think is reasonable, in addition to the £1 a week which he has been paying. If the justices find that the amount of £27 which was paid by the appellants between January and July, 1953, was a reasonable amount, they will make an order on him to pay that amount and he will have to pay it and will not get the right to set-off. If the justices G then go on to say that, in future, he is to pay £1 a week in addition to the £1 he has paid under the deed, then, so long as he pays £2 a week, he will discharge his obligation. Should the wife in some way manage to pledge his credit after she has received the £2 a week, then it seems to us that he may be able to set-off something against the £2 a week, but not against the £1 a week.

H For these reasons, we think the justices came to an erroneous conclusion in point of law and the case must go back to them with a direction that they must find what sum it is reasonable that the respondent should pay, first, in respect of the arrears, and, secondly, in respect of the future.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), January 18, 19, 1954.]

Factory—Floor—Opening—Hole in sand ground level at edge of steel-flagged gangway—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 25 (3).

A
A factory used for making castings had a ground level of sand on portions of which castings were made and also steel-flagged gangways six feet wide. A hole over three feet deep forming part of the bed of a casting had been cut out of the sand area at the edge of the gangway where it turned at right angles. While walking backwards carrying one end of a shank bearing a ladle of molten metal, a workman stepped off the gangway and over the edge of the hole and was injured. B

C
HELD: the sand surface of the factory in which the hole was cut was its floor and the hole was an opening therein within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the occupiers of the factory were, therefore, liable for breach of statutory duty in failing to fence it securely under the section.

FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 25 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 1017.

APPEAL by the defendants and CROSS-APPEAL by the plaintiff against an order of STABLE, J., dated May 5, 1953, in an action for damages for breach of statutory duty and for negligence. D

The defendants were the occupiers of a factory in which the plaintiff, an employee, had been injured through falling into a hole at the edge of a steel-flagged gangway at ground level. STABLE, J., held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty to fence securely the hole as an opening in the floor of the factory under s. 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937, but that they were not guilty of negligence at common law, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The defendants contended that the area in which the hole was did not constitute part of the floor of the factory within the meaning of the sub-section. E

H
SINGLETON, L.J.: The defendants have a large factory at Trafford Park, Manchester, in which they make castings of various kinds and sizes. The plaintiff was employed in the factory as a core-maker, and on Nov. 27, 1951, he met with an accident when he was working for the defendants. He and a man named Hatton had to fill core moulds with molten metal. The molten metal was carried to the mould in a ladle which was suspended on a double-handled shank, and one of the men was at each end of the shank. The time came when the contents of the ladle became too cool, or too stiff, for the operation of pouring to be continued successfully, and it was necessary for the men to return to the supply ladle. That meant that one of them had to walk backwards down a narrow way on to a six feet wide steel-flagged gangway, which was at a right angle to the course they had been taking. The plaintiff walked backwards on this occasion. The shank was seven feet, two inches in length, so that there was not much room for the turn across the gangway towards the supply ladle, and at the edge of the gangway there was a hole which formed, or part of which formed, the bed of another casting. There was a sheer drop from the gangway of at least three feet, four inches. As the plaintiff was backing he stepped a shade beyond the gangway and into this hole, and some of the metal went on his face and he received injuries. There was no warning of any kind and no guard, and the fact that the hole was flush with the gangway deprived the plaintiff of the warning which he might have had if the hole had been further from the gangway.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages for negligence, and also for breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (3) of which provides:

A "All openings in floors shall be securely fenced, except in so far as the nature of the work renders such fencing impracticable."

The plaintiff's case is that the hole into which he stepped was an opening in the floor. The defendants' reply is that the hole was not an opening in the floor in that the hole was not in the floor. It is not disputed that it would have been practicable to fence the space. Indeed, that was done after the accident. Thus, the question is what is a floor within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937.

B The defendants' factory at ground level was mostly sand. The photographs show castings and the like on portions of what appears to be the floor. In certain parts of the factory there are steel-flagged gangways which, according to the defendants' argument, constitute the floor for the purposes of the section. I find it difficult, if not impossible, to say that by constructing such gangways the defendants took away the character of the ground level of the factory so as to make what would normally be considered to be the floor something other than the floor. It is true that portions of the sand floor are used for castings, but the normal level of sand is the same as the level of the gangways. A floor may be of stone, or concrete, or wood, or steel, or earth, or sand, or it may be a combination of several substances. The making of a gangway does not mean that the remainder of the ground level ceases to be part of the floor. Photograph No. 2 shows a number of things on the left of the photograph stacked. If they are not stacked on the floor, I do not know how it would be proper to describe where they are stacked.

E Counsel for the plaintiff drew our attention to the proviso to reg. 10 of the Grinding of Metal (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925 (S.R. & O., 1925, No. 904). The regulation itself, in para. (b), makes use of the word "floor". It reads:

"In every room, or part thereof, in which cleaning of castings is done—. . . (b) all accessible parts of the floor shall be properly swept or otherwise cleaned at least once every day and for this purpose the floor shall be maintained in a smooth and firm condition so as to permit of such proper sweeping or cleaning. Provided that this regulation shall not apply to—(i) cleaning of castings done upon the foundry floor at or near the place where the metal for the said castings is poured."

G The foundry floor in this case was mostly sand, and parts of the foundry floor were used from time to time for the making of castings, which meant interference with the floor. The floor at the ground level, though it was sand, was still the floor of the factory, and, in my view, it was a floor for the purposes of s. 25 (3) of the Act. The word "floor" was used during the evidence and in a question addressed by counsel for the defendants to Mr. Beech, a witness called for the defendants, and, furthermore, document 9, a plan made for the defendants, described the place where the sand is as "floor level". I think that this level of the factory, though it was of sand, constituted the floor of the factory. In the floor there was an opening into which the plaintiff stepped when going backwards. That was an opening in the floor. In my view, the judge rightly held that that opening in the floor constituted a breach of s. 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937, and that the defendants were responsible for damages in this action.

H [His LORDSHIP said that a further head of claim by the plaintiff under s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, had not been argued, but had been kept open, held that there was no ground for disturbing STABLE, J.'s findings as to negligence and contributory negligence, and continued:] It follows from what I have said that, in my judgment, the judge was right in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the basis that there had been by the defendants a breach of the duty they owed to him under s. 25 (3) of the Act, and it follows, too, that the cross-appeal ought to be dismissed. I think each should be dismissed with costs.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. In my view, there is no sufficient reason for holding that the so-called sand floor of the foundry in this case was not a floor within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Factories Act, 1937. It is true that it was a floor made of sand as distinct from materials such as timber or cement, but, nevertheless, it seems to me that it was a floor, and a floor of such a kind that pits or openings could be made in it and re-filled at will as the exigencies of the work demanded. I think, therefore, that the hole into which the plaintiff fell was an opening in a floor within the meaning of s. 25 (3) of the Act. It is not disputed that it would have been perfectly practicable to protect this opening by means of a fence, and, accordingly, in my view, the learned judge was right in holding that there was in this case a breach of that statutory duty.

[His LORDSHIP held that they should not disturb the conclusion of STABLE, J., on the question of negligence, and contributory negligence, and said that both appeal and the cross-appeal should be dismissed].

HODSON, L.J.: I think these appeals fail for the reasons which have been already sufficiently given by my Lords.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

R. v. HIGHGATE JUSTICES. Ex parte PETROU.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 27, 1954.]

Club—Striking off register—Summons against secretary to show cause—Order for costs for sum in excess of costs of prosecution.

The applicant, the secretary of a club, was summoned before justices to show cause why the club, registered in accordance with the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 91 and s. 92, should not be struck off the register under s. 95 (1). At the same time there were ten summonses against the manager, five relating to the sale of liquor without a justices' licence, contrary to s. 65 (1) of the Act of 1910, and five relating to the supply of liquor during other than permitted hours, contrary to the Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (a). At the conclusion of the hearing, the justices inquired the costs of the prosecution and were told twenty-one guineas. They then convicted the manager, fined him £10, and ordered him to pay a total of twenty guineas costs, ordered the applicant to pay £100 costs, and ordered the club to be struck off the register. On a motion by the applicant for an order of certiorari, HELD: the justices had no power to inflict on the applicant a penalty in the guise of costs, and, therefore, an order for certiorari would go.

AS TO THE POWER OF JUSTICES TO AWARD COSTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 21, p. 622, para. 1080; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, p. 365, Nos. 741, 742.

MOTION for an order of certiorari.

The applicant, Helen Costas Petrou, was the owner of certain premises which she let to one Frank Reeves for use as a club, known as the Sportsmen's Club and registered pursuant to the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, s. 91 and s. 92, the applicant being the secretary thereof.

A On the complaint of the respondent, Philip Scott, a superintendent of police, ten summonses were issued against the said Reeves charging him, as manager, with the offences in connection with the club stated in the headnote and calling on him to show cause why the club should not be struck off the register under s. 95 (1) on the ground that it was not conducted in good faith as a club, that illegal sales of intoxicating liquor had taken place on the club premises, and that the supply of intoxicating liquor was not under the control of its members; and one summons was issued against the applicant, as secretary, to show cause why the club should not be struck off the register. At the conclusion of the hearing B on Dec. 9, 1953, the justices inquired the costs of the prosecution and were told twenty-one guineas. The justices then convicted the said Reeves, fined him £10, and ordered him to pay two guineas costs on each of the ten summonses, ordered the applicant to pay £100 costs, and ordered the club to be struck off the register. The applicant now applied for an order of certiorari to quash the order made against her on the grounds (i) that under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, C 1910, s. 95, the justices had no power to inflict a fine or penalty on the applicant; (ii) that, by ordering the applicant to pay £100 costs after they had already made an order for payment by another person of twenty guineas of the twenty-one guineas that was the total amount of the costs of the prosecution, the justices were in substance imposing a fine on the applicant; and (iii) that they had exceeded their jurisdiction and acted improperly.

D N. R. King for the applicant.
S. A. Morton for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts and continued: The justices were not imposing costs on the applicant. They were imposing a penalty on her when she had not been convicted of any offence, but had only come before E the court to show cause why the premises should not be struck off the register. Under the guise of making an order for costs, the justices inflicted what could only have been intended as a penalty, since they had made an order dealing with all but one guinea of the costs asked for. Certiorari will go. I shall direct that the papers be sent to the Lord Chancellor, and we shall give costs against the justices.

GLUCHOWSKA v. TOTTENHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.),
January 19, 29, 1954.]

Rent Control—Furnished house—Excess rent—Rent of premises fixed and registered—Subsequent letting of part of premises at rent exceeding that registered—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 4 (1) (a).

A rent tribunal fixed the rent of three furnished rooms and a kitchen with the use of a bathroom at £1 7s. per week, and that rent was registered pursuant to s. 3 (2) of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. Afterwards the landlord let one of the rooms and the kitchen at a weekly rent of £2, later reduced to £1 15s., and occupied the remainder of the premises herself. She was convicted under s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1946 of receiving rent for the premises in excess of the registered rent.

HELD (LORD GODDARD, C.J., dissenting): the words "those premises" in s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1946 referred to the subject-matter of the original letting referred to the tribunal in respect of which the rent was fixed and registered; the payments received by the landlord were made with regard to different premises, albeit part of the premises originally let; and, therefore, no offence was committed.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Tottenham, on June 4, 1953, the respondents, Tottenham Borough Council, preferred twenty informations against the appellant, Wladyslawa Kazimiera Gluchowska, charging that she, on twenty occasions between Dec. 6, 1952, and Apr. 18, 1953, received excessive rents, contrary to the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 4.

At the hearing on June 18 and 25, 1953, it was proved or admitted that the respondents, as local authority, had prepared a register of rents in pursuance of s. 3 of the Act of 1946; that in March, 1949, a contract between Michael Gluchowski and August Sikora for the letting of three fully furnished rooms and a kitchen in the basement of a dwelling-house situate at No. 9, Willoughby Lane, Tottenham, under the terms of which the lessee had the use of the bathroom in the said dwelling-house in common with other persons, was referred to the rent tribunal for the district and the rent was reduced to £1 7s. per week, and on Mar. 10, 1946, an entry to that effect was made in the register; that on Sept. 22, 1951, the appellant, who was then and at all times thereafter the owner of the dwelling-house, let fully furnished one room and a kitchen in the basement to one Arnold Edward Hayes at a rent of £2 per week which was subsequently reduced to £1 15s. per week, the said room being one of the three rooms, and the kitchen being the same kitchen, mentioned in the entry in the said register; that, although the rent included payment in respect of board, the value of such board did not form a substantial proportion of the whole rent (whether £2 or £1 15s. per week); that from Dec. 6, 1952, till Jan. 1, 1953, the appellant received from Hayes £2 per week on account of rent and from Jan. 10 till Apr. 15, 1953, the sum of £1 15s.; that on Jan. 28, 1953, Hayes referred the said contract to the rent tribunal, and the tribunal entered on the reference but adjourned it sine die; that the two rooms forming the remainder of the premises in respect of which the rent was entered in the register were at all times occupied by the appellant and her family; that the total amount by which the rent received by the appellant on the twenty occasions exceeded the registered rent of £1 7s. was £9.

A On behalf of the appellant it was contended that no offence had been committed in that the premises on account of which rent was received were not the premises for which a maximum permitted rent was registered. On behalf of the respondents it was contended (i) that the whole included the part and that, therefore, rent received on account of the premises let was received on account of the registered premises; (ii) that the contract between the appellant and Hayes defeated the object of the rent tribunal and contravened the spirit of the Act of 1946; (iii) that the letting of part only of the premises was a change of circumstances within the meaning of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1946 in respect whereof B the appellant should have referred the contract to the rent tribunal and asked them to determine the rent properly payable in respect of the said room and kitchen. The justices were of the opinion that the contentions of the respondents were correct; convicted the appellant and fined her £2 in respect of each of the twenty offences; and ordered her to pay £5 5s. costs and to repay to the said Hayes £9 (being the total amount paid in excess of the registered rent of £1 7s. C per week).

J. F. Donaldson for the appellant.

Widgery for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29. The following judgments were read.

D LORD GODDARD, C.J.: PARKER, J., will read the first judgment.

E PARKER, J.: The judgment I am about to read is the judgment of BYRNE, J., and myself. This is an appeal by way of a Case stated by Middlesex justices before whom the appellant was charged under twenty informations with receiving on twenty occasions excessive rents, contrary to the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 4 (1) (a). Though the total of the excess amounted to only £9, which was ordered to be repaid to the tenant, the appellant was fined no less than £40 (a fine which seems out of all proportion to the offences found proved) and ordered to pay £5 5s. costs. Section 4 of the Act of 1946, as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 12 (4), provides as follows:

F “(1) Where the rent payable for any premises is entered in the register under the provisions of this Act, it shall not be lawful to require or receive—
(a) on account of rent for those premises in respect of any period subsequent to the date of such entry . . . payment of any sum in excess of the rent so entered . . . (2) Where any payment has been made or received in contravention of the foregoing sub-section, the amount thereof shall be recoverable G by the person by whom it was made.”

[HIS LORDSHIP read the facts and continued:] The short point for the decision of the court is whether or not the receipt by the appellant of the rents complained of constituted offences, and this depends on the meaning to be given to the words “receive on account of rent for those premises” in s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act.

H “Those premises” clearly refer back to the premises the subject of the contract referred to the tribunal, and to the specification of those premises which has under s. 3 (2) (b) to be entered in the register. The specification entered in the register in the present case is of the original letting, namely, three rooms and kitchen in the basement together with use of a bathroom. That is the unit in respect of which the rent is fixed and registered. The receipts from Hayes were on account of rent, not for that, but for a different, unit of letting, namely, one room and kitchen, albeit part of the premises originally let. Accordingly, on the natural meaning of the words in the sub-section it would appear to us that no offences were committed. It is urged, however, for the respondents that we should construe the words "those premises" in s. 4 (1) (a) to mean "those premises or any part thereof" in that, it is said, it would be contrary to the spirit of the Act, and to common sense, if a landlord were to be permitted to re-let part of the premises at a rent in excess of that registered for the whole premises. It is true that in penal as well as other statutes words should be read in their widest sense if to do otherwise would result in a failure to suppress the mischief aimed at by the legislation. At the same time, to use the words of WRIGHT, J., in London County Council v. Aylesbury Dairy Co., Ltd. (1) ([1898] 1 Q.B. 109), the court "... ought not to do violence to ... language in order to bring people within it, but ought rather to take care that no one is brought within it who is not brought within it in express language."

In our opinion, even if the words in s. 4 (1) (a) are capable of being read in the wide sense contended for, we ought not to read them in that sense. A tenant in the position of Hayes can at once refer his contract to the tribunal, and on such a reference the tribunal would have to fix a rent for the premises let to him, and cause it to be registered. It would then become an offence for the landlord to receive rent for the premises so let in excess of that registered rent. Accordingly, it is unnecessary, to suppress the mischief aimed at, to read the words in the wide sense contended for by the respondent. Accordingly, we would allow this appeal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: While I regret there should be a difference of opinion in the court on a matter which, as here, does not admit of appeal, since I have formed a definite opinion I feel bound to express it with diffidence though not with hesitation. Unless I am satisfied that there is a casus omissus in the Act, it would appear to me unfortunate to be obliged to hold that, while it would be an offence to let three rooms and a kitchen at a rent in excess of that which is registered, no offence is committed if only one of the three rooms and the kitchen is let at a rent which exceeds that registered in respect of the four. I entirely agree that the court ought not to read into an Act, and more especially into one which carries penal consequences, words which are not there because it would seem convenient so to do or to effect what the court may think Parliament intended but has failed to say. But it is possible when construing a statute to expand the literal meaning of words if it appears that an extended meaning must have been intended.

By way of illustration I will cite two cases, namely, Hewett v. Hattersley (2), where the words "so condemned" in a prosecution relating to unsound food were read as "so liable to be condemned", and Barnard v. Gorman (3), where, in a prosecution under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, the court had to construe the words "the offender may either be detained or proceeded against by summons", and the word "offender" was held to include "a person who is suspected on reasonable grounds to have committed the offence". This is but an application of the maxim "ut res magis valeat quam pereat". There is another well-known maxim that the greater includes the less, a rule of logic which has become a rule or maxim of law. These considerations, in my opinion, entitle the court to expand the word "premises" so as to include any part of the premises without reading additional words into the sub-section. Moreover, the matter can be regarded in another, though, perhaps, rather technical, light. As is well-known, at common law rent issues out of the land demised and out of any part of it. The registered rent takes the place of the contractual rent and so issues out of any part of the property demised. Accordingly, it issues as much out of any one of the rooms as it did out of all. One of the rooms out of which a registered rent of £1 7s. per week issued has been let at a rent in excess of that sum and that seems to me to support the view that it is possible to read the word "premises" as including "part of the premises", or, in other words, to say that in this statute the greater does include the less.

I would mention one other matter on which I differ from the opinion of the other members of the court. I cannot agree that because the tenant can take the new contract before the tribunal and obtain a reduction this gets rid of the mischief aimed at by the sub-section. The tenant appears to have paid the increased rent for a period of twenty weeks. If it is an overpayment he can, under s. 4 (2), recover the excess by action, but if the tribunal were now on a fresh reference to reduce the rent the reduction would be effective only from their decision, and he, accordingly, would not be able to recover under that sub-section the excess which he has paid. On another point I am in complete agreement with my brothers. I regard the penalties inflicted by the justices as excessive, and, indeed, I would say oppressive, especially when it is remembered that, had the convictions been affirmed, the tenant could have recovered under s. 4 (2) the amount adjudged to have been overpaid. As the convictions are quashed it is not necessary to say more about this matter.

Appeal allowed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), January 19, 1954.]

Charity—Stamp duty—Petition on breach of trust—Liability to duty—Charities Procedure Act, 1812 (c. 101), s. 3.

The fee payable by way of impressed stamps on an originating petition under the Charities Procedure Act, 1812, s. 1, is a court fee which remains payable, and is not a stamp duty remitted by s. 3 of that Act.

FOR THE CHARITIES PROCEDURE ACT, 1812, s. 3, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 2, p. 829.

ORIGINATING PETITION under the Charities Procedure Act, 1812, s. 1.

On the hearing of the petition the question arose whether the fee of 50s. payable on the petition by way of impressed stamps was a stamp duty which had been remitted by s. 3 of the Act, or whether it was a court fee and as such remained payable.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

W. F. Waite for the Official Solicitor.

J. L. Arnold for the trustee of the charitable fund.

HARMAN, J.: I have been dealing with a petition entitled (inter alia) "In the matter of the Charities Procedure Act, 1812". That Act was passed under the tutelage, or, rather, under the advocacy, of LORD ROMILLY, and has been known of recent years as Lord Romilly's Act. The Act in question is entitled:

"An Act to provide a summary remedy in cases of abuses of trusts created for charitable purposes."

The object of the Act was to allow remedies for breaches of trust to be sought before the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls or the Court of Exchequer in a summary manner by petition and to be heard on affidavit. The petition had to be signed by the persons preferring it, attested by the solicitor or the attorney for the petitioners, and allowed by the Attorney-General's or Solicitor-General's fiat before it could be presented. In fact, nowadays the Attorney-General presents such petitions as come under the aegis of that Act. Section 3, as amended by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1888, s. 1, is in these terms:

"And . . . neither the petitions, nor any proceedings upon the same or relative thereto, nor the copies of any such petitions or proceedings, shall be subject or liable to the payment of any stamp duty whatever."

When I asked what stamp duty was then payable on the petitions or proceedings on the same or copies thereof, I was referred to the Probate and Legacy Duties Act, 1808, then comparatively recently passed, which is entitled:

"An Act for repealing the stamp duties on deeds, law proceedings, and other written or printed instruments, and the duties on legacies and successions to personal estate upon intestacies now payable in Great Britain, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof."

That was a comparatively elaborate Act which altered the various rates of duty, including the one familiar to us until quite recently, namely, stamp duty under the Legacy Duty Act, 1796. At that time, documents had to be copied on stamped paper specially purchased for the purpose, and, in that way, the Commissioners of Stamps collected a large part of their revenue. When I look at Part II of the schedule to that Act I see that there are set out the duties on law proceedings

"in the courts of law and equity at Westminster . . . and in other courts in England . . . and also before the Lord High Chancellor . . ."

I also find, in Part II of the schedule, among other things, a fee of 2s. 6d. payable on a petition in any suit or action in any of the courts of equity at Westminster or before the Lord Chancellor in matters of bankruptcy and lunacy. That was a stamp duty which was clearly remitted by Lord Romilly's Act. There were, at that time, other fees payable by suitors; the petitioner would have had to pay to the clerks in chancery, so far as I can ascertain, certain fees by way of court fees for the assistance which they gave him and which they retained as their remuneration. It follows, then, that, although in 1812 the stamp duty was remitted, the court fee was not.

A further Act of 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 4) made certain amendments in the duties, as they were called, in law proceedings, and also in so-called duties on the parchment or vellum on which certain documents had to be copied. In 1833, I am told, certain reforms were made in the Court of Chancery under which the clerks in chancery were no longer entitled to retain such fees as they could obtain, but they must account for the surplus over and above such sum as was necessary to pay their salaries and pay that surplus into the consolidated fund.

By an Act of 1866 (29 and 30 Vic. c. 76), an arrangement was made whereby many court fees could, if the Treasury thought fit, be paid by stamps instead of in cash. That Act was repealed by the Public Offices Fees Act, 1879, s. 8, which shows the then method of collecting fees in public offices. Section 2, as amended by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1894, s. 1, provides:

"The fees payable in any public office shall be collected either in money or by means of stamps, or partly in one way and partly in the other way, according as may be from time to time directed by order of the . . . Treasury."

The Treasury was empowered to make regulations relating to the manner in which the fees taken were to be accounted for and paid over and for determining the use of impressed or adhesive stamps and the mode of cancellation of adhesive stamps. Therefore, from that time onwards their lordships of the Treasury could determine how fees payable, including court fees, could be discharged—whether in cash or by means of stamps. Under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 213, the power of regulating those matters was vested in the Lord Chancellor with the concurrence of the judges. The section reads:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and consent of the judges of the Supreme Court or any three of them, and with the concurrence of the Treasury, may by order fix the fees and percentages to be taken in the High Court . . ."

A In accordance with that provision, the Supreme Court Fees Order, 1930 (S.R. & O., 1930, No. 579), is now the regulating instrument, which, by virtue of the Act of 1925, has statutory force. By that order the Lord Chancellor directs by art. 1 that the fees and percentages set out in the second column of sched. I to the order are to be taken in the Supreme Court. Under art. 5 (1),

B "The fees and percentages prescribed by this order shall, subject to the other provisions of this and the next following paragraph, be taken by impressed stamps."

There are certain exceptions to that, for instance, some stamps are to be adhesive stamps, and art. 6 provides that in the district registries of the High Court, other than in Manchester, fees are to be taken in cash and not in stamps at all.

C That being the position, it is said, that, as in the High Court fees on an originating petition, being, I think, 50s., are payable by way of impressed stamps in the ordinary course, that is a duty payable in stamps, and, therefore, a stamp duty, and, therefore, within the words of s. 3 of Lord Romilly's Act which speaks of "any duty whatsoever". In my judgment, that is not so. Stamp duties are one thing: court fees another. It is notable that in the Stamp Act, 1891, which is now the code for all stamps, court fee stamps, judicature stamps, are excluded.

D It seems to me that the fact that fifty or sixty years after Lord Romilly's Act was passed certain judicature stamps were ordained to witness the collection of court fees is irrelevant and does not enlarge the ambit of exemption which Lord Romilly's Act sought to confer. In my judgment, the ordinary fees are payable on a petition under that Act.

HIGGINS AND ANOTHER v. NORTH WEST METROPOLITAN REGIONAL HOSPITAL BOARD AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), January 15, 18, 19, 29, 1954.]

Public Authority—Limitation of action—Action for negligence against medical specialist at hospital administered by hospital board—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21 (1).

The second defendant was a part-time specialist in charge of the physical medicine department at a hospital administered by the first defendants (the hospital board). The board were entitled to control and criticise the second defendant's work with regard to the administration and organisation of his department, but had no control over him in regard to treatment which he gave or prescribed. On July 17, 1949, the female plaintiff attended the hospital as an out-patient for treatment which was administered to her by the second defendant and consisted of an injection into her left trapezius (a neck muscle). It was alleged by the plaintiffs that by reason of the second defendant's negligence, the needle penetrated the female plaintiff's pleural cavity as a result of which she became seriously ill. The writ in an action against the board and the second defendant alleging negligence by the second defendant was issued by the plaintiffs on Feb. 13, 1952, and by his defence the second defendant pleaded (inter alia) that he was protected by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), since at all material times he had acted in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of the National Health Act, 1946, or of a public duty, and the action had not been commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued. On trial of this issue as a preliminary point,

HELD: the treatment given by the second defendant was an act done on behalf of and with the authority of the hospital board in the execution or intended execution of a public duty which had been imposed on the board by the Act of 1946 and the orders made thereunder, and, therefore, he was entitled to the protection of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1).

PRELIMINARY POINT in action for damages for negligence.

The first defendants were the board appointed under the National Health Service Act, 1946, to administer Mount Vernon Hospital, Northwood. The second defendant was the doctor in charge of the physical medicine department at that hospital. The plaintiffs were husband and wife. On July 17, 1949, the second plaintiff (Mrs. Higgins) attended at the hospital for treatment which was prescribed and administered by the second defendant, and consisted of an injection into her left trapezius (a neck muscle). It was alleged by the plaintiffs that, as a result of the second defendant's negligence, the needle which he was using penetrated the second plaintiff's pleural cavity and caused a traumatic pneumothorax as a result of which she became seriously ill and was unable to work for two years.

The writ in the action was issued on Feb. 13, 1952 (i.e., more than two and a half years after the occurrence). Paragraph 5 of the second defendant's defence was in the following terms:

"This defendant at all material times was acting in pursuance or execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament, namely, the National Health Service Act, 1946, and/or a public duty or authority, and these proceedings were not commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued. This defendant relies on s. 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939."

The hospital board put in a defence denying negligence, but did not claim the protection of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). On May 11, 1953, an order was made that the point raised by the above paragraph of the second defendant's defence be tried as a preliminary point, to determine whether he was entitled to the protection of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). The terms of the second defendant's appointment and his contract with the board appear in the judgment.

Blackledge, Q.C., and Andrew Rankin for the plaintiffs.

J. Stirling for the hospital board.

Cumming-Bruce for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29. PILCHER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The second defendant was called, and his evidence can be summarised as follows:

"I am a registered medical practitioner, a master of arts, a doctor of medicine of the University of Oxford, a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and I hold a diploma of physical medicine. I was qualified in 1926, and specialise in physical medicine. Before July 5, 1948, which was the 'appointed day' under the National Health Service Act, 1946, I was the consultant physician in charge of the physical medicine department at the Mount Vernon Hospital. This hospital then was, and still is, a general hospital with some eight hundred beds. Before the appointed day it was a voluntary hospital. The hospital is organised in departments, of which the physical medicine department is one. The functions of this department are to supply facilities for the rehabilitation of patients by means of physiotherapy, remedial gymnastics, occupational therapy, etc. Patients are referred to me by members of the consultant staff of the hospital, and by medical practitioners outside the hospital. As physician in charge of the department, I was at all times responsible for the organisation and internal administration of my department, the general supervision of patients presented to me for treatment, the supervision of diagnoses and actual diagnosis in cases which I considered to require my personal attention. I also myself gave treatment in cases when I considered this desirable. Immediately under me I had a medical registrar, a part-time house physician for patients in the ward and a team of medical auxiliaries qualified to give treatment prescribed by myself. I myself was at all material times the hospital's recognised specialist in physical medicine. I did not, before the appointed day, and do not since, recognise the right of anyone to control the way I do my work. Before the appointed day I was paid a salary. I was supposed to work at the hospital for seven hours a week, but as a rule I worked there considerably longer than this. After the appointed day I entered into a contract with the hospital board to carry on the same duties at the hospital as I had previously performed. In fact, I worked considerably longer at the hospital than I had before the appointed day. Under my contract with the board, I was supposed to devote two 'notional half days' to my work at the Mount Vernon Hospital, and on this basis I was at the material time paid at the rate of £400 per annum by cheque monthly. My appointment at the Mount Vernon Hospital was that of a part-time specialist. In July, 1949, I held similar appointments at other hospitals, and was devoting eight-elevenths of my time to hospital work. The remainder of my time was spent in attending to my private consulting practice in Devonshire Place. I specialise in rheumatic diseases as well as physical medicine. Under the terms of my contract with the board, I can be required, within certain limits, to attend at other hospitals in the region. If the board so desired, they would be entitled to criticise and control my work in so far as it consists of internal hospital administration. [The female plaintiff] was an out-patient of the hospital. She was referred to me for treatment. I diagnosed her case, prescribed the treatment, and, on July 17, 1949, gave her the injection complained of. I do not recognise that any official of the board had any right to control my actions in any way in regard to the way in which I gave the injection. I have taken the oath of Hippocrates to do my work as well as I can. I am classed as an 'employed person' for the purposes of National Health Insurance. I subscribe out of the salary which I receive from the hospital board towards a superannuation fund."

I have thought it desirable to summarise Dr. Bach's evidence fairly fully in order that a reasonably clear view of his position and duties at the Mount Vernon Hospital may be presented.

On June 23, 1948, the hospital board sent a printed form of letter to Dr. Bach. This was headed:

"North West Metropolitan Regional Hospital Board. National Health Service Act, 1946. Medical and dental staff of the hospital and specialist services; arrangements from the appointed day."

The letter then proceeds as follows:

"By virtue of the provisions of the Regional Hospital Boards, etc. (Functions) Regulations, 1948, and regulations to be made under s. 14 (2) of the Act, it will be for regional boards to appoint specialist staff including staff senior to the grade of registrar--and for management committees to appoint other medical and dental staff. Specialists will be remunerated by the regional boards. . . . The invitation to take part in the service on the basis of the remuneration and conditions now proposed is made for a limited period only in order to allow of review and the substitution of firm contracts on a permanent basis as soon as possible Broadly, the position under the National Health Service Act is that medical and dental staff engaged whole-time in hospital, clinic, etc., work, will be transferable to the service of the board and no new contract will be required; but that part-time staff will not, in general, be transferable and a new contract will be necessary in each case. The following paragraphs set out the position in more detail."

I merely pause there to say that Dr. Bach was a member of the part-time staff. Transferable staff and non-transferable staff are then defined in detail, and the necessity for making short-term arrangements is gone into. The question of remuneration for specialists is referred to in the following terms:

"The contract with each part-time specialist and the remuneration paid to him will cover all services rendered to the board other than domiciliary visits (which are referred to below). The scale of remuneration which the Ministry of Health have directed the board to offer is set out in the appendix, together with the conditions of service which will be applied provisionally. To arrive at the appropriate remuneration, the average time given to the various activities has been assessed and aggregated in terms of half days per week."

A number of further provisions follow with regard to the remuneration of medical officers acting under this form of contract, and in the schedule at the end of the form Dr. Bach is appropriated, if that be the correct word, to the Mount Vernon Hospital, and his duties are said to be the "Existing duties as physician in charge of the physical medicine department", on two half days per week. Dr. Bach signed the form at the end of that letter and sent it back to the board, and, in substance, continued to perform his duties in exactly the same fashion as he had before he signed that document.

On Feb. 28, 1949, a further letter was addressed to the second defendant which, in effect, provided that the interim arrangements arrived at under the document to which I have referred should be extended from the contemplated date of Mar. 31, 1949, to July 4, 1949. On June 22 a further document of the same nature was addressed to Dr. Bach by the hospital board, which had the effect of continuing the provisional arrangement after July 4, 1949, on the same terms as had been entered into before. Finally, on Mar. 14, 1950, a more permanent arrangement was arrived at with Dr. Bach on substantially the same terms, except as to remuneration, and it is quite unnecessary that I should say anything about that. The matters out of which this case arise having taken place on July 17, 1949, it was while carrying on his duties at the hospital under the provisional arrangements set out in the board's original letter to which I have referred that the second defendant gave the treatment to Mrs. Higgins which gave rise to these proceedings.

It is common ground that the first defendants in the action, the hospital board, are a public authority. Section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, is in the following terms:

"No action shall be brought against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty or authority, unless it is commenced before the expiration of one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued."

I am not now concerned whether the second defendant was or was not negligent in giving the treatment which he did to the female plaintiff, nor am I concerned whether the relationship of the second defendant to the hospital board was such as to render the board liable for the negligence, if any, of the second defendant on the principle of respondeat superior. My only task is to determine whether, in the particular circumstances of this case, the second defendant is entitled to claim the protection of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act.

It was not really in dispute that, in giving to Mrs. Higgins the injection which he did, the second defendant was acting in the ordinary course of his duty as a part-time specialist under the National Health Service Act in charge of the physical medicine department of the Mount Vernon Hospital. For the purposes of this case I assume that the duty of treating patients within the region which they administer, as well as the duty of administering the health service provided under the Act, was on the hospital board, which was itself a public authority and entitled to the protection of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act. If the second defendant, who was a part-time specialist at the hospital, can properly be regarded as a servant of the hospital board, and if he was at the material time performing or purporting to perform, as the servant of the board, a public duty laid on the hospital board by statute, it is not in dispute that he is entitled to the protection of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act. The plaintiffs, however, contend that, in giving the treatment which he did, the second defendant was not the servant of the hospital board, but was in the position of an independent contractor in respect of whose negligence, if any, the board was not responsible on the basis of respondeat superior. They contend that principals can only act through servants, for whose acts they are legally responsible, or through independent contractors, for whose acts they are not responsible. Admitting that the servants of a public authority, while performing a public duty on behalf of the authority, are protected by the section, they deny that persons in the position of the second defendant, who are, it is said, independent contractors in the sense that they are uncontrolled and uncontrollable in the exercise of their professional duties, are entitled to any protection.

The argument presented on behalf of the second defendant ran along these lines. In giving the treatment which he did, he was performing on behalf of the hospital board one of the very duties which it had been directed to perform by the Minister. This duty was a public duty and one which the board (on the assumption that the duty had been properly delegated to them) could only properly perform by the hand of an experienced doctor. The second defendant, in giving the treatment in question, was in no sense performing an act collateral to the duty of the board: see Bradford Corpn. v. Myers (1). I do not propose to spend time on this branch of the argument advanced on behalf of the second defendant, because I am satisfied that it is correct. In support of this view, I need only refer to Griffiths v. Smith (2), and, in particular, to the passages in the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. ([1941] 1 All E.R. 71, 72). I also refer to Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. (S.S.), Ltd. v. Singapore Harbour Board (3). The act of which the plaintiff complains in the present case was, in my view, clearly an act done by the second defendant on behalf of the hospital board in execution or intended execution of a public duty. It was an act in respect of which the hospital board, if they are responsible in law for the negligence of the second defendant, would have been entitled, had they thought fit, to claim the protection of s. 21 (1).

I was referred during the course of the argument to a long line of cases dealing with the responsibility in law of hospitals of different constitutions for the negligent acts of their "staff", using that word in its widest sense. This line of cases starts with Hillyer v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (Governors) (4). Until Gold v. Essex County Council (5) came before the Court of Appeal, Hillyer's case (4) was regarded as having decided that the only duty owed by the governors of a public hospital towards a patient was to exercise due care and skill in selecting their medical staff, that the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the governors and the medical staff, and that the nursing staff, when assisting at an operation performed by a consulting surgeon, ceased to be the servants of the governors. Gold's case (5) in effect reversed what had hitherto been regarded as the effect of the decision in Hillyer's case (4), and since the decision in Gold's case (5), which concerned the negligence of a competent whole-time radiographer on the staff of a hospital, the law has been that a public hospital, whether administered by a local authority or by a board of governors, owes to a patient the duty to nurse and treat him carefully and is liable for the negligence of its whole-time staff with the possible exception of honorary physicians and surgeons.

In Gold's case (5) LORD GREENE, M.R., says ([1942] 2 All E.R. 242):

"The question which presents itself in the present case may therefore be formulated as follows. When a patient seeking free advice and treatment such as that given to the infant appellant knocks at the door of the respondents' hospital, what is he entitled to expect? He will find an organisation which comprises consulting physicians and surgeons, presumably also house physicians and surgeons, a staff of nurses, equipment for administering Grenz-ray treatment and a radiographer, Mead, employed to give that treatment. So far as consulting physicians and surgeons are concerned, clearly the nature of their work and the relationship in which they stand to the respondents precludes the drawing of an inference that the respondents undertake responsibility for their negligent acts. The same may be true of the house physicians and surgeons, but their case is not relevant to the present inquiry and I say nothing about it. The position of the nurses again, though no doubt analogous, is not strictly relevant; but, if the nature of their employment, both as to its terms and as to the work performed, is what it usually is in such institutions, I cannot myself see any sufficient ground for saying that the respondents do not undertake towards the patient the obligation of nursing him as distinct from the obligation of providing a skilful nurse. Nursing, it appears to me, is just what the patient is entitled to expect from the institution and the relationship of the nurses to the institution supports the inference that they are engaged to nurse the patients."

In Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council (6) HILBERY, J., found the hospital authority responsible for the negligence of a resident non-qualified junior house surgeon. In Cassidy v. Ministry of Health (7) the Court of Appeal in effect decided that a qualified medical practitioner, in that case a whole-time assistant medical officer at Walton Hospital, Liverpool, was a person for whose negligence the hospital authority were responsible. DENNING, L.J., in an interesting judgment, went further than this and clearly took the view that hospital authorities, in every case when the patient did not select his own physician or surgeon, were liable on the basis of respondeat superior for the negligence of part-time consulting staff as well as permanent full-time staff. This point was not necessary for the decision of Cassidy's case (7), but it would seem that the learned lord justice would, in the case with which I am dealing, have been prepared to hold the hospital board responsible for any negligence proved against Dr. Bach. In Roe v. Ministry of Health (8) McNAIR, J., took the view that the hospital authority would not be responsible for the negligence of a part-time consultant anaesthetist, who was, I suppose, a specialist in much the same position as the second defendant.

I hope that I have made it quite clear that I am not now concerned with the question whether or not the hospital board in the present case are vicariously responsible for any negligence which may be proved against the second defendant, and I have only referred to the line of cases dealing with the vicarious responsibility of hospital authorities for the negligence of their staff because these cases were cited to me in argument and tend to show the way in which the view of the courts has changed since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Gold's case (5) in regard to the vicarious responsibility of hospital authorities for the negligence of their staff.

I will now turn to cases which have a more direct bearing on the point which I have to determine, starting with Nelson v. Cookson (9), which was a decision of ATKINSON, J. The facts of the case were as follows. In March, 1937, the infant plaintiff entered a county hospital and was operated on for the removal of tonsils and adenoids by the defendants, who, at the time, were assistant medical officers of the institution. After the operation the second defendant, who acted as anaesthetist, placed a gag in the mouth of the patient to enable an examination of her throat to be made, and by reason of the gag, which was taken from a sterilizer, being too hot, the girl suffered severe burning of her left cheek, which resulted in a permanent scar. It was admitted that the hospital was an institution which the county council were empowered by the Local Government Acts, 1888 and 1929, to maintain for public health purposes, and, the writ in the action having been issued more than six months after the act complained of, the defendants, while denying negligence, pleaded that the action was barred by s. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. It will be seen that this case raises very much the same point as I have to determine in the present case, there being no difference, for my purposes, between the terms of s. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 and the terms of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. It is to be observed that Nelson v. Cookson (9) was decided some three years before Gold's case (5) and at a time when the responsibility or lack of responsibility of hospitals for the negligence of their permanent staff was regarded as being settled by the decision in Hillyer's case. The fact that this was then the situation is referred to by ATKINSON, J., in his judgment in a passage which I will presently quote. Recognising that, as the law then stood, a hospital was not in general terms vicariously responsible for the negligence of its permanent staff, ATKINSON, J., none the less came to the conclusion that two whole-time medical officers of the hospital in question were entitled to the benefit of s. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff in Nelson v. Cookson (9) that it was anomalous to confer on medical practitioners, for whose negligence, on the law as then understood, the hospital was not responsible, the protection afforded to the hospital by the Act. It was submitted that the two defendant doctors in that case were in the position of independent contractors, and reliance was placed on the case of T. Tilling, Ltd. v. Dick, Kerr & Co., Ltd. (10), where a firm of independent contractors, carrying on work on behalf of the London County Council under contract, were held not to be entitled to the protection of the Act. This argument was rejected summarily by ATKINSON, J.

Unless Nelson v. Cookson (9) can be distinguished from the case now before me on its facts or on principle, it is a decision which binds me and a decision with which, if I may say so with respect, I agree. The only distinction which is sought to be drawn between the facts of the case which I have to decide and the facts in Nelson v. Cookson (9) is that in the present case the second defendant was a part-time specialist, whereas the defendants in Nelson v. Cookson (9) were whole-time medical officers on the permanent staff of the hospital and, as such, more in the category of "servants" than was the second defendant in this case. Even if it be assumed that the second defendant is now a person for whose negligence the hospital board are not vicariously responsible, the defendants in Nelson v. Cookson (9) were, at the time of the decision of that case, regarded as being in precisely the same position. This fact in itself does not, therefore, in my view, afford any distinction between the present case and Nelson v. Cookson (9). I think, moreover, that the development of the law since the decision in Hillyer's case (4) in regard to the vicarious responsibility of hospital authorities for the negligence of their medical staff serves rather to support than to weaken the decision in Nelson v. Cookson (9).

Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that, in so far as actions in tort were concerned, a person carrying out a duty on behalf of another must be either a servant for whose negligence the principal was responsible or an independent contractor for whose negligence the principal was not responsible. He submitted that the second defendant, who did not admit the right of the hospital board to control the way he did his professional work, should be regarded as an independent contractor. He submitted that there was no decided case in which the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act or the Limitation Act had been held to cover the deliberate act or negligence of anyone who could not properly be called a servant of the public authority. He referred to Greenwell v. Howell (11), where the protection of the Act was granted to a county surveyor and a deputy clerk of a council who were in fact the servants of the council, although in the case they are referred to also as "officials" and "subordinates".

- B It seems to me that in this connection the decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Western India Match Co., Ltd. v. Lock (12), is, perhaps, of some interest. In that case three defendants, the representative at Basra of the Minister of War Transport, a sea transport officer, and the divisional sea transport officer at Bombay, were held entitled to the protection of the Limitation Act although the exact position of two of these officers in relation to the Minister of War Transport was never precisely defined and nowhere in the report are they referred to as servants.
- C

Reverting to Nelson v. Cookson (9), I respectfully adopt the reasoning of ATKINSON, J., in that case. He says ([1939] 4 All E.R. 32):

- "It is curious that the precise point never seems to have been argued before. It has been recognised, I think, as law for a long time that if a public duty, or an act done in pursuance of a public authority, is being carried out by a public authority through some servant or agent, that servant or agent has the same right to the benefit of this section as the public authority would have. That, certainly, I think, has been recognised as the law for some time. It was treated as good law in Greenwell v. Howell (11). I think common sense would indicate that that must be the position.
- E Every public authority has to act by an agent or delegate or servant, and it would be idle merely to protect the public authority itself if the party complaining could bring an action against the actual person who had performed the act complained of. I do not gather that it is challenged in this case that that as a general principle is undoubted law; but it is said that it is equally clear law that local authorities or hospital authorities under a county council are not responsible in law for the negligence of their medical officers and that, therefore, as the authority could not be sued, the medical officers as individuals can . . . But it is said that, where you get cases of acts done by servants or agents or delegates, . . . in circumstances which would not render the authority liable to any action, the person acting cannot claim the benefit of this statute. That, I think, would be quite an interesting point to discuss, and I do not know that one might not have been disposed to give some weight to that argument if it were not that the contrary seems to have been recognised as law in quite a number of cases."
- F
- G

- The learned judge then refers to Freeborn v. Leeming (13), and Venn v. Tedesco (14), in both of which it was conceded that medical officers on the staff, in the one case of a workhouse infirmary and in the other of a public hospital, were entitled to the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act. He goes on (ibid., 33):
- H

"It is very difficult to ask a court of first instance . . . to take a different view . . . when one finds that for quite a long time a certain rule has been accepted as law, it would take a great deal to convince one that it was wrong, and I am not satisfied that it is wrong. I think it is right. It seems to me that these two gentlemen were exercising what was really a public authority. It was an authority given to the Middlesex County Council to provide and conduct this hospital and to maintain medical services . . . they cannot do it with their own hands. The county council has not got its own hands. It has to act through other people, and this particular authority was being exercised by these two different men. It seems to me, therefore, that it is idle to say that they were not in fact acting in pursuance of a public duty or authority conferred on the Middlesex County Council. They were; they were performing this public duty or public authority, whichever you like to call it, as agents for, or as delegates for and on behalf of, the council, and I think they are entitled to the benefit of the Act."

Dealing with T. Tilling, Ltd. v. Dick, Kerr & Co., Ltd. (10), ATKINSON, J., said (ibid., 34):

"It seems to me hopeless to regard them [the defendants] as I am asked to do, as independent contractors. The case relied upon for that proposition is T. Tilling, Ltd. v. Dick, Kerr & Co. (10), where the independent contractors were held not to be entitled to the benefit of the Act. In the judgment of WARRINGTON, J. ([1905] 1 K.B. 570) there is this passage: 'It has been held that the protection of the [Public Authorities Protection] Act extends to the officers of a public body and to persons acting under their direct mandate . . .'. It seems to me really almost an absurdity to ask me to regard them as independent contractors. They are not; they are officers of a public body performing a public duty imposed upon the county council, a duty which can only be performed through and by individuals."

I entirely agree with what is said by ATKINSON, J., in this last passage, and I would add that since the decision in Nelson v. Cookson (9) the development of the law along the line that a doctor's uncontrollability in the exercise of his professional functions does not take him out of the servant category to which the principle of respondeat superior applies tends to weaken any argument which can properly be advanced on the authority of such cases as T. Tilling, Ltd. v. Dick, Kerr & Co., Ltd. (10).

While it is not binding on me, Goodisson v. Byrne (15) is interesting. In that case the Supreme Court in Ireland decided that the defendant, a house surgeon at the material time in the whole-time service of the county hospital at Wexford, which was a public authority, was entitled to the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act. FITZGIBBON, J., delivering the judgment of the court, held that any "person" to whom a public authority or the performance of a public duty has been lawfully delegated is entitled to the protection of the Act if the delegation be that of a master to a servant or of a principal to an agent, the words of the Act applying not only to bodies corporate but also to persons identifiable with them.

It is not necessary for me to precisionise what the second defendant's position was in relation to the hospital board. He was certainly acting as an agent for the board at the material time. He would, no doubt, be properly described as an officer of the board. He may have been the servant of the board. At the material time I am satisfied that he was a person acting on behalf of the hospital board in the execution or intended execution of a public duty. The duty which he was performing or intending to perform, was, moreover, one which, for the purposes of this case, I take to have been imposed on the hospital board by the National Health Service Act, 1946, and the orders made under the Act. The second defendant is, accordingly, in my view, entitled to the protection of s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, and I determine the preliminary point submitted to me in his favour.

SLAUGHTER AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.),

Rent Control—"Dwelling-house"—Premises containing shop and dwelling accommodation—Covenant by tenant not to use premises save as shop for greengrocer's business—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (3)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (1).

The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, apply to any premises which are let to a tenant for the purpose of his living in them as his home, provided (a) that he is not a service tenant, and (b) that the premises are within the ambit of the Acts by reason of their rent or rateable value.

By a lease, dated Oct. 16, 1950, premises, which consisted of a shop, office, store room and kitchen on the ground floor, and a self-contained flat, approached by an outside staircase, on the first floor, were let for a term of twenty-one years at a rent of £350 a year. The two floors had never before been let together and were separately assessed for rates. The first floor flat, which contained three rooms and a bathroom and water closet, had always been used for residential purposes. The lease of 1950 contained, inter alia, the following covenants by the tenant: (a) not to "use the demised premises or any part thereof save as a shop only nor [to] permit the demised premises or any part thereof to be used otherwise than for the business of a . . . greengrocer . . ."; (b) not to "keep the demised premises closed for a longer period than fourteen days at any one time during any one year of the . . . term without first obtaining the consent" of the landlord; and (c) not to make any alteration to the demised premises without the written consent of the landlord. The tenant carried on business in the shop premises and lived in the flat. In 1953 he applied to the rent tribunal under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), to fix a reasonable standard rent for the premises, but the tribunal held that they had no jurisdiction to do so as the premises did not constitute a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts. On a motion by the tenant for an order of mandamus, HELD: the premises were let both for residential and business purposes, and the covenant by the tenant in regard to user did not prohibit him from living on the premises, provided that he carried on the business of a greengrocer in the shop, and, therefore, as the premises were let to the tenant for the purpose of his living in them as his home, they constituted a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and the tribunal had jurisdiction to fix a reasonable standard rent under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1.

MOTION for an order of mandamus directed to the Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal requiring them to hear and determine an application by the applicants under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), to fix a reasonable standard rent for premises of which the applicants were the tenants. A

The applicants, who held the premises under a lease dated Oct. 16, 1950, carried on business in a shop on the ground floor and lived in a residential flat on the first floor. At the hearing before the tribunal it was submitted by the landlords that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to fix a rent under s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1949 as the premises were not a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts. In support of their submission, they contended that the tribunal could look only at the lease to ascertain whether the premises were let as a dwelling-house and were not entitled to have regard to the actual user or to any other of the surrounding circumstances, and that, on the true construction of the lease, the tenants were entitled to use the premises only as a shop, and that the user of more than half the premises as a dwelling-house was a breach of covenant. The tribunal accepted the landlords' submissions and held that they had no jurisdiction. B C

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read this judgment of the court. In this case counsel moves on behalf of the applicants, tenants of premises known as No. 195, Tarring Road, Worthing, for an order of mandamus directed to the Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal to hear and determine an application made by them to the said tribunal to fix a reasonable standard rent for the said premises under s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. The facts, which are not in dispute, are as follows. By a lease, dated Oct. 16, 1950, Selsdon Trust, Ltd., let the said premises to one Jack Rumsey for a term of twenty-one years from Sept. 29, 1950, at a rent of £350 per annum. At some time prior to Aug. 15, 1951, Selsdon Trust, Ltd., assigned their rights as lessors to Dawes & Co. (Mitcham), Ltd., the present landlords. On Aug. 15, 1951, Rumsey assigned the lease with the consent of the landlords to the applicants. In April, 1953, the applicants applied to the tribunal to fix a standard rent for the premises under s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. A hearing took place and the matter was hotly contested, the landlords alleging that the tribunal had no jurisdiction. Ultimately, on July 21, 1953, the tribunal informed the parties that they had decided that they had no jurisdiction and dismissed the application. At all material times the premises consisted of a shop, office, store room and kitchen on the ground floor forming shop premises, and on the first floor, approached by an outside staircase, there were three rooms together with a bathroom and a water closet, forming a self-contained flat. The premises, until the date of the lease in question, had never been let as a whole, and the two floors were separately assessed for rates, the rateable value of the ground floor being £51, and of the first floor £19. The applicants carry on business in the shop premises and make their home in the flat. Accordingly, if the premises so let fall to be considered as a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act, they were the proper object of an application to the tribunal and the tribunal would be bound to fix a reasonable standard rent for them. If, on the other hand, the premises do not constitute such a dwelling-house, as the landlords maintain and as the tribunal have found, then the tribunal acted rightly in refusing jurisdiction. D E F G H

A dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act of 1949, which is to be read with the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, is any house or part of a house let as a separate dwelling (subject to the rateable value not exceeding certain limits), and by s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, it is provided that:

“ Subject to the provisions of para. (a) of the last preceding sub-section, the application of the [Rent Restrictions] Acts, by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes . . . ”

A Section 3 (2) (a) is immaterial for the present purpose. It is unnecessary to set out the remainder of s. 3 (3), which has been held to cover only leases where the dwelling-house is let with land or other buildings separate from the dwelling-house. The passage set out above is that applicable where what is being considered is a single, though composite, structure. Whether or not a single structure used partly as a dwelling-house and partly for business purposes is a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts has been the subject of a great number of decisions of the Court of Appeal, beginning with Epsom Grand Stand Assocn., Ltd. v. Clarke (1) and, after that decision became incorporated in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), proviso (ii), with Hicks v. Snook (2) and ending with Whiteley v. Wilson (3). For reasons which will appear hereafter in this judgment, we do not feel it is now necessary to go in detail through the various decisions.

C The argument advanced by the landlords in this case is based on the presence of a covenant which appears in cl. 2 (11) of the lease. It reads as follows:

D “ The lessee will not use the demised premises or any part thereof save as a shop only nor permit the demised premises or any part thereof to be used otherwise than for the business of a fruiterer greengrocer and florist . . . ”

Reliance is also placed on cl. 2 (19):

“ The lessee will not keep the demised premises closed for a longer period than fourteen days at any one time during any one year of the . . . term without first obtaining the consent of the lessor thereto in writing.”

E The principle, as we understand it, is this. If the covenant debars the use of the whole of the premises for the purposes of a dwelling-house so that the tenant can be restrained from such user, that is conclusive against the premises being a dwelling-house apart from any assent to change of user. It appears to us that, apart from the covenant in cl. 2 (11) of the lease, the facts in the present case are really indistinguishable from those in R. v. Folkestone Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Webb (4), which was before this court on May 1, 1953. We relied in that case on the judgments in Whiteley v. Wilson (3). It was a case where the premises were a shop with living rooms above, and there is no substantial difference between the premises in that case and those in the present. In Webb's case (4) we held that the facts gave the tribunal jurisdiction. We decided that it was immaterial to inquire into questions relating to dominant user, and that, if the tenant was making the structure, to use a neutral expression, his dwelling and was doing nothing improper in so doing, that was enough. No appeal was brought against our judgment and it binds this court unless the covenant which we have mentioned distinguishes it. In Webb's case (4) there was a covenant not to carry on any business but that of a tobacconist, while in the present case the covenant is, no doubt, wider as it provides that the premises are not to be used save as a shop for a greengrocer's business. In Whiteley v. Wilson (3), on which, as we have said, this court relied, it is true that ROMER, L.J., did, in his judgment ([1952] 2 All E.R. 944), except the case where a purpose is specified in the agreement, and in the present case it is said that the effect of the covenant is to except, that is, to prohibit, the premises from being used as a dwelling. The rule with regard to the construction of a covenant is conveniently stated in FOA'S LANDLORD AND TENANT, 7th ed., p. 111, and, as we think the passage accurately states the law, we will quote it instead of setting out the various cases which deal with this point:

"A covenant, like any other contract, is to be construed according to the intent of the parties as expressed by their own words, and by regard to the whole of the instrument, and the surrounding circumstances of the case, it being also a rule that if the words be doubtful, that construction is to be taken which is most strong against the covenantor."

Bearing that in mind, it is, in our opinion, impossible to construe this covenant so as to prohibit the tenant from living on the premises. Provided that the tenant carries on a greengrocer's business, it would, in our opinion, be impossible, and, indeed, absurd, to say that he was in breach of his covenant because he lived on the premises. So to hold would mean that the whole of the upper part was sterilised, at least to the extent that the rooms could be used only as a store or for some such purpose, and not for that which they were designed although the tenant is under covenant to preserve and not to alter them. To show the absurdity of such a construction we need only point to the covenant to repair (cl. 2 (5)), which provides that the tenant is among other things to grain, varnish, whitewash and colour such parts as are usually so treated and to paper with paper of suitable quality such parts as are usually papered. You do not paper greengrocer's shops. The premises are obviously let both for residential and shop purposes, and a shop is to be maintained there because they are in a shopping street and, if they were not used as such, their value would or might be impaired. No shopkeeper would be likely to pay £350 a year for these premises, nor would a lessor expect to get that rent, if everything but the ground floor is to be sterilised in the sense that the upper part is not to be used for the purpose for which it is designed. Even if the contract was worded so strongly that the court was constrained to construe it as prohibiting the tenant from living on the premises, it seems to us probable that the landlord here could not insist on that construction. The uncontradicted evidence is that the upper part has always been used as a residence and this must have been known to both the original lessors and to the present landlords who bought their reversion. But as this point was not fully argued before us we will say no more about it, though it will be open to the tenant if this case goes higher.

Cases in which the demise was of a barn or a warehouse, but in which the lessee squatted, to use a convenient expression, or lived as a caretaker are not in pari materia with the present. To use a convenient phrase borrowed from the judgment of MOORE, L.J. ([1923] 2 I.R. 162) in Burns v. Radcliffe (5):

"... the nature of the business is not incompatible with the residence of the tenant ... [and] I can see no reason for holding that the whole premises were not [his] dwelling-house."

This conclusion is, we think, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hicks v. Snook (2). Accordingly, we do not find it necessary to go through the numerous cases which have been cited to us because each must depend on its particular facts. The principle which we would endeavour to state is that, be the premises what they may, if it appears that they were let to a tenant for the purpose of his living in them as his house, provided that he is not a service tenant, then they come within the Rent Restrictions Acts, subject, of course, to their rental or rateable value. No doubt, a difficult problem here confronts the tribunal, for the Acts do not direct that separate rents are to be found for the business part and for the residential part. This, however, does not directly arise on the present motion. In our opinion, the tribunal had jurisdiction in this case and an order of mandamus should issue.

MOTION for an order of mandamus directed to the Folkestone Rent Tribunal (now part of the Kent Rent Tribunal) to hear and determine an application by the applicant, under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), to fix a reasonable standard rent for premises known as No. 72, High Street, Folkestone, of which the applicant was the tenant. The premises consisted of a shop on the ground floor and dwelling rooms on the two upper floors. The residential part, to which there was a separate entrance, consisted of a kitchen, a living room, and a water closet on the first floor, and two bedrooms on the second floor. The services to the premises consisted of gas, electricity, and water. These services were not provided separately and independently for the shop. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant not to carry on any business on the premises other than that of a tobacconist. The rent tribunal held that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the application as the premises were let to the applicant as business premises.

McCreery for the landlord.
J. P. Ashworth for the tribunal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The case raises the familiar question whether premises are business premises or whether they are a dwelling-house. It is a question whether or not the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (3), applies. Section 3 (3) provides:

D "Subject to the provisions of para. (a) of the last preceding sub-section, the application of the [Rent Restrictions] Acts, by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes; and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1938, as amended by virtue of this section, any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house; but, save as aforesaid, the [Rent Restrictions] Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply to any dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house."

E [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] It is impossible, I should have thought, to suppose that the living part of these premises could be described as anything else than a dwelling-house. There is a separate entrance, a kitchen, a sitting-room, bedrooms, sanitary arrangements and everything of that nature which one would expect to find. But the chairman of the tribunal, giving the decision of the tribunal, said:

F "My colleagues and I feel that when the tenant took these premises and was a willing payer of £300 a year, he took them as business premises, and, moreover, he understood that these business premises were to carry out a certain business throughout the period of his tenancy, and, therefore, in the light of the terms of the Rent Acts and case law which has been expounded, we have decided not to accept jurisdiction in this matter."

G It is only fair to the tribunal to say that, at the time when they gave that decision, Whiteley v. Wilson (1) had not been heard. I think that, if they had had the advantage of reading that case, they would have probably come to a different decision. In his judgment, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., showed that, if the premises are in one block, i.e., if the building is a single structure, and one finds that a substantial part is used as a dwelling-house so that one can say that there is a dwelling-house there, the Rent Restrictions Acts will apply. If, however, to give an example, the premises are a block of offices, one corner of which is occupied by a caretaker, it may be that the Acts would not apply. But it is no longer enough to apply the "dominant user" test.

H ROMER, L.J., said ([1952] 2 All E.R. 944):

"I agree that no question of dominant purpose arises in the present case. The question in such cases as this, where the subject-matter of the tenancy is one building used partly as a dwelling-house and partly as a shop, and no purpose is specified in the tenancy agreement, is whether the building should in a broad sense be regarded, on the one hand, as a dwelling-house which is partly or even substantially used as a shop, or, on the other hand, as a shop which is used in part for residential purposes. If the former, then the building is within the Rent Restrictions Acts, by reason of the first part of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and will not be taken out of it because of the general provision at the end of the sub-section. If, on the other hand, the common sense of the matter is that the building is a shop, then it is outside the first part of the sub-section and will not be brought within the Act by virtue of the second part. In my opinion it is only in cases in which the first part of the sub-section is inapplicable that the effect of the second and third parts need be considered, and these apply, as I think, mainly, if not wholly, to land or other premises let together with a dwelling-house and not forming a part of its structure."

In the present case, although there is a covenant in the lease that the only business that may be carried on is that of a tobacconist, it is clear that the premises were let partly as a dwelling and partly as a shop. For these reasons, if the tribunal had properly directed themselves, they would have held that this was a dwelling-house. As they did not, an order of mandamus should issue.

CAVE v. CAPEL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Birkett, L.J.J., and Upjohn, J.), January 25, 26, 27, 1954.]

Execution—Sheriff—Protection—"Action in respect of seizure and possession of goods"—Withdrawal from possession of goods claimed—Action for trespass by person in position of claimant—"Substantial grievance" of claimant—R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A.

A sheriff's officer, in pursuance of two warrants, was instructed to levy execution on the goods of a judgment debtor. At the address of the judgment debtor he found a caravan in which the plaintiff, the mother of the judgment debtor, resided. Believing the caravan to be the property of the judgment debtor, the sheriff's officer removed it to the premises of the judgment creditor where he placed it in a barn. The plaintiff, who had locked herself in the caravan, subsequently left the judgment creditor's premises. Some days later, the true owner of the caravan notified the sheriff that it was her property and the sheriff withdrew from possession. The plaintiff issued a writ against the sheriff for damages for wrongful execution, false imprisonment, trespass and assault, and the sheriff took out a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A, for an order "protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods . . ."

HELD: a sheriff was entitled to the protection afforded by Ord. 57, r. 16A, only where the claimant had suffered no substantial grievance as a result of the seizure of the goods; on the facts, the plaintiff, who was, for the purpose of r. 16A, the claimant, had suffered a substantial grievance by the removal of the caravan, and the sheriff was not entitled to protection under the rule.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of ORMEROD, J., dated July 31, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 929.

A The defendant was at all material times high sheriff of the county of Somerset. On Oct. 29, 1952, a bailiff, William Hext, acting on behalf of the defendant as sheriff's officer, in pursuance of two warrants was instructed to levy execution on the goods of one A. H. Cave in respect of two judgments. At the address of the judgment debtor the bailiff found no property on which to levy execution except a caravan in which Mrs. Cave, the plaintiff, the judgment debtor's mother, was residing. She informed the bailiff that the caravan was not the property of her son, but refused to say to whom it belonged and declined to leave it. The bailiff made inquiries of the judgment creditor's solicitor and others, and concluded that it was his duty to levy execution on the caravan. Accordingly, B on Oct. 30, 1952, he removed the caravan to the judgment creditor's farm. The plaintiff had refused to leave the caravan and had locked herself in. At the farm the caravan was put in a barn with the plaintiff still inside and the main doors of the barn were locked, but a side door was left open through which the plaintiff eventually left. On Oct. 31, 1952, notice was given to the bailiff by a Mrs. F. M. Carr or her solicitors that she was the owner of the caravan, and the C sheriff withdrew from possession. On Apr. 24, 1953, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendant claiming damages for wrongful execution, false imprisonment, trespass and assault. The defendant took out a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A, claiming protection under that order. Protection was refused by the master, and, on appeal from the master, ORMEROD, J., held that the defendant was entitled to protection under Ord. 57, r. 16A.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The writ having been issued by the plaintiff, the defendant sheriff applied for protection under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 16A. The first Act for the protection of sheriffs to which we were E referred was the Interpleader Act, 1831, which enabled sheriffs to take advantage of the interpleader procedure. Its provisions are now substantially reproduced in Ord. 57. As was pointed out, quite rightly, by counsel for the sheriff, there are two aspects to interpleader proceedings: first, they enable the issue as to title between two contending parties to be conveniently tried; secondly, they F give protection in the ordinary case to someone who is in the position of a stakeholder and who claims no interest in the property himself. If proceedings are started against him, interpleader proceedings enable him, in a proper case, to have them stayed. On the other hand, the order may prevent proceedings being taken against him. Indeed, Ord. 57 emphasises that aspect of the matter by commencing with the words "Relief by way of interpleader may be G granted—". Order 57, r. 1, reads:

"Relief by way of interpleader may be granted . . . (b) Where the applicant is a sheriff or other officer charged with the execution of process by or under the authority of the High Court, and claim is made to any money, goods, or chattels taken or intended to be taken in execution under any process, or to the proceeds or value of any such goods or chattels by any person H other than the person against whom the process is issued."

In Moore v. Hawkins (1) the sheriff had seized goods. There had then been a claim which the execution creditor had admitted and the sheriff, having received notice of the claim, had withdrawn from possession. Apart from that, it was an ordinary case of the type in which, I think, relief would have been given had interpleader procedure been applicable. The court, however, held that as the sheriff had withdrawn from possession the procedure was inapplicable and it could not protect him. He had not, as it were, the corpus, which is the foundation of interpleader relief which normally an applicant is agreeing to hold at the disposal of the court. Both POLLOCK, B., and GRANTHAM, J., decided that that was the position. Since the sheriff had elected to withdraw his execution, the matter was at an end, and he no longer had the right to take steps for his own protection as he might have done had he remained in possession. It was obviously thought—and there is no dispute about this—that that was an anomaly and that where an execution creditor is satisfied and the sheriff at once takes the proper course of withdrawing from possession he should be entitled to protection if it were the type of case in which he would have had protection had he interpleaded in the ordinary way. In consequence of that case, r. 16A was added to Ord. 57, and it is that rule with which we are now concerned, because the sheriff in the present case withdrew from possession. Rule 16A reads:

“When the execution creditor has given notice to the sheriff or his officer that he admits the claim of the claimant, the sheriff may thereupon withdraw from the possession of the goods claimed, and may apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods, and the judge or master may make any such order as may be just and reasonable in respect of the same: Provided always that the claimant shall receive notice of such intended application, and, if he desires it, may attend the hearing of the same, and if he attend, the judge or master may, in and for the purposes of such application, make all such orders as to costs as may be just and reasonable.”

At the same time, we were told, words were inserted in r. 2 which now provides:

“The [person seeking relief by interpleader] must satisfy the court or a judge by affidavit or otherwise . . . (c) That the applicant, except where he is a sheriff or other officer charged with the execution of process by or under the authority of the High Court who has seized goods and who has withdrawn from possession in consequence of the execution creditor admitting the claim of the claimant under r. 16 of this order, is willing to pay or transfer the subject-matter into court or to dispose of it as the court or a judge may direct.”

Counsel for the sheriff said, and, if I may say so, I agree with his submission, that the words that I have just read in r. 2 (c) indicate that an applicant under r. 16A is regarded as an applicant within the order. Of course, the special conditions provided by r. 16A have to be satisfied, but he is, nevertheless, a type of applicant for relief under the order. There is no dispute between counsel, and I think they were clearly right in admitting that the type of case in which relief would be given under the normal interpleader procedure is that in which it would be given under r. 16A. If one came to the conclusion that relief would not have been granted had the sheriff been in a position to interplead, one would not give it under r. 16A, and vice versa. It was at one time suggested by the plaintiff that, as she was not the owner of the caravan, but only the occupier, she could not be regarded as the claimant within r. 16A. I agree that she did not write a formal letter, but her claim was clearly a claim through Mrs. Carr, the real owner of the caravan. She was saying that she occupied by virtue of a contract with Mrs. Carr and I have no doubt that Mrs. Carr wrote at her instigation. I think, so far as that is concerned, that the sheriff was in order in saying that that condition of this rule had been satisfied and that the plaintiff was a claimant.

I will now turn to the authorities which indicate the circumstances in which protection would be given in what I call the normal interpleader case, because, as I have said, the same considerations must apply to r. 16A. The first case to which we were referred was Winter v. Bartholomew (2), which was fully considered in Smith v. Critchfield (3). The point which arose in the latter case was whether protection could be given against an action for trespass, the trespass being, if I may so describe it, a mere trespass incidental and necessary to the seizure, the seizure obviously being the main matter of complaint. It was held by the court (14 Q.B.D. 873) that:

"Where the sheriff in the execution of a fi. fa. enters the premises of a person other than the execution debtor and there seizes goods believing erroneously that such goods belong to the execution debtor, the sheriff may, upon interpleader proceedings, be protected against an action for trespass to the land as well as against an action for seizure of the goods, if no substantial grievance has been done to the person whose premises are wrongfully entered."

It is quite clear from the judgment that those last words are not meant to qualify solely the protection against trespass but are necessary if relief is to be given at all. SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., said (ibid., 878):

"It is not, of course, in every case that the judge will protect the sheriff. He will be protected when he has only made an honest mistake in executing the process of the court, and but for such mistake everything that he has done would have been justified by the writ."

He then considered whether the sheriff was to be protected against a necessary trespass as well as the seizure. Then he said (ibid.):

"It seems to me that the sheriff is entitled to protection in respect of the whole of the act which through error he has wrongfully done under the writ, that is, in respect of his having entered the house and seized the goods."

He then referred to Winter v. Bartholomew (2) and approved what was said there and he put it in his own words (ibid.):

"... it is said that the sheriff may be protected in such a case as this in respect both of the trespass to the land and that to the goods where no real grievance has been sustained by the claimant. It is obvious that that cannot mean where there is no legal wrong, because by the hypothesis a tortious act must have been committed. It is clear, therefore, that by 'no real grievance' is meant no substantial grievance beyond the mere entry and seizure of the goods, such as might exist if the sheriff's officer were guilty of insolent or oppressive conduct in excess of his duty, and not justified by the writ."

BOWEN, L.J., referred (ibid., 881) to Winter v. Bartholomew (2), and again he reiterated the phrase "no substantial grievance". He then quoted PLATT, B., in Winter v. Bartholomew (2) and said (ibid.):

"PLATT, B., said that s. 6 of the Act [of 1831] authorised the judge to make such decision as should appear to be just according to the circumstances of the case, and that nothing could be more just than to prevent the sheriff being harassed by an action in which no more than nominal damages could be recovered. MARTIN, B., said '... If indeed the sheriff in execution of the writ has committed any real grievance the court will allow the injured party to bring an action, but if he has done no real wrong the court will stay proceedings against him'."

One has an example of such a case in De Coppett v. Barnett (4), where it was held that the sheriff was not entitled to protection where a substantial grievance had been done. I agree that in one sense, at any rate, the extent of the grievance, and in some cases its existence, must depend on the decision as to the issues raised in the action, but on what is admitted here it seems to me that this case is wholly outside the type of case for which r. 16A was made. It is quite sufficient to decide the case, in my opinion, to state that on the sheriff's own affidavit the caravan which this plaintiff rightly occupied, under a contract with the true owner, was removed from the site where she had it and put in a barn, the main doors of which were kept locked, for four days. No one can say that that was not a "real grievance".

It was suggested that we might consider adjourning the application under this order for protection until the trial of the action so that the judge, presumably, having heard the case might then say: "Having heard all I have now heard I think this is a case under which protection might have been given." As a matter of procedure, I do not think that is right. I am not deciding that in no circumstances could an issue be ordered to be tried under this rule. That can be dealt with if the need arises. In my view, the rule is intended to apply in cases where, on the evidence before the court, it is clear that protection should be given before a trial and the investigation which a trial involves. It is absurd to suggest that a rule which is intended to be used to stop a trial can, as it were, be kept in vacuo, or in a state of suspense, until the trial has been concluded and then be relied on for some purpose on the question of the order to be made as to costs. That does not appeal to me, but for the reasons which I have given (and I hope that I have said nothing that in any way would pre-judge the issues which may arise), I do not think this is a case for protection under Ord. 57, r. 16A.

I should say a word now about what happened below. The learned master took the view which I have taken and he made no order except that the time for the defence was extended for fourteen days. The learned judge made an order that the "appeal be allowed and that the defendant be given protection against the claim of the plaintiff pursuant to the provisions of Ord. 57, r. 16A, and that all further proceedings herein be stayed."

Counsel for the sheriff said that he did not submit to the judge that any such order could be made at that stage. He said he submitted that there must be an issue to determine certain facts. No doubt, there may have been a misunderstanding, but the matter became clearer before us and counsel did not seek to support the order in that form. He agreed that, there being a dispute between the affidavit and the statement of claim, there must be an issue. For the reasons which I have given I think the master's order should be restored.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The facts in this case were, admittedly, most unusual. It so happened that the plaintiff made her home in the caravan which was the subject-matter of a dispute. Although she made a claim that she should be undisturbed, nevertheless, the caravan containing herself and her belongings was taken away from the premises of the judgment debtor to the premises of the judgment creditor and put in a barn for some days and so suffered some humiliation. I think it is quite impossible to say on those facts that this was the ordinary case to which Ord. 57, r. 16A, was intended to apply. On any view of the case the plaintiff here had a substantial grievance. As I read Ord. 57, r. 16A, it was designed to protect a sheriff in what I may call the ordinary or almost inevitable circumstances which are bound to arise in the course of the sheriff's duty. It is almost inevitable that a sheriff will at some time seize goods which ultimately turn out to belong to some claimant. Under r. 16A, when the execution creditor has admitted the claim,

"... the sheriff may thereupon withdraw from possession of the goods claimed, and may apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the said seizure and possession of the said goods, and the judge or master may make any such order as may be just and reasonable in respect of the same."

I understand that to mean that when a sheriff has, in fact, seized goods in the name of the judgment creditor which in truth belong to the claimant, there would, in the ordinary way, be a cause of action against him at least for nominal damages. The design of this rule, in my view, is to say: "In those circumstances we think it right and proper that the sheriff should be protected". But it was clear from Smith v. Critchfield (3) that SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., was saying that it is not in every case that the judge will protect the sheriff. It would depend on the facts of the particular case. I myself think that the learned judge was unduly influenced by the decision in Smith v. Critchfield (3). That was A a case where one would have said: "If the sheriff has, in fact, wrongfully seized goods he must have entered on the land in order to do so". The learned Master of the Rolls was saying: "You cannot separate the two things like that; they are really one and indivisible". The judge in the present case said, in effect, "In this case there can be no separation: if you find that the sheriff has in fact seized goods—in this case this caravan—you cannot separate that from the taking away of the plaintiff inside the caravan to the land of the judgment creditor".

B Indeed, he says ([1953] 2 All E.R. 931):

"After some consideration I have come to the conclusion that the words of the rule must be taken to mean what on the face of them they do mean, and that the sheriff is entitled to apply for an order protecting him from any action in respect of the seizure, and not merely from an action in respect of the seizure which may be brought by the claimant."
C

In my view, Ord. 57, r. 16A, was intended to apply to a case where there was admittedly a cause of action because of a mistaken seizure by the sheriff, a cause of action in which nominal damages could be awarded, and in such a case the rule provides protection, but where, as in this case, there was a substantial grievance, I do not think this rule applies. Therefore, for the reasons which have been
D given by my Lord, I am entirely of the same opinion, and I think that the order of the master should be restored.

UPJOHN, J.: I agree. Order 57, r. 16A, confers on the court a valuable discretionary power to protect sheriffs who have wrongfully seized goods under a writ of fi. fa. The order that the court may make is "such order as may be just and reasonable." That is the test we have to apply. In my judgment, those
E words mean that the order must be just and reasonable, not only from the point of view of the sheriff, but also from that of the claimant (in this case the plaintiff). It may well be just and reasonable to make an order in the ordinary case where the plaintiff or claimant has suffered no real grievance and whose only claim is for nominal damages. I do not propose to refer to the facts, but
F it is clear that this is not the ordinary case, and, in my judgment, it would be neither just nor reasonable to preclude the plaintiff from pursuing such remedies at law as she may have against the sheriff. I agree that the order of the master should be restored.

Appeal allowed.

WAKEHAM v. WAKEHAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 14, 1954.]

Divorce—Custody—Child taken out of jurisdiction by deserting wife—Custody to husband without prejudice to question regarding care and control.

In December, 1950, the wife, who had deserted the husband, in breach of an undertaking given by her took the younger child of the marriage to South Africa. In October, 1953, the husband was granted a decree nisi on the ground of the wife's desertion and an order was made in his favour for the custody of both children of the marriage. On an application by the wife for a variation of that order by granting to her the custody of the younger child, HELD: to accede to the application would be to put the husband at a disadvantage if he sought the custody of the younger child in the South African courts, and the application would be refused, but the original order for custody granted to the husband would be amended by providing that it was without prejudice to any question regarding the care and control of the child.

AS TO CUSTODY OF CHILDREN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 721, 722, paras. 1102-1104; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 27, pp. 500-504, Nos. 4432-4473.

APPEAL by the husband against an order of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated Dec. 10, 1953.

The parties were married in South Africa on Oct. 28, 1943, the husband at that time being in the Royal Air Force stationed in Southern Rhodesia. The wife had been born in England, but had been taken to South Africa at the age of three months and had resided there ever since. There were two children of the marriage, Peter Ronald, born on Feb. 1, 1947, and Brian Vincent, born on Oct. 20, 1948. In July, 1945, the husband was transferred to England, and in October, 1945, the wife came to join the husband at the home of his parents. On Oct. 6, 1949, the wife, with the husband's permission, took the two children to Broadstairs for a holiday with the wife's mother and grandmother who were temporarily in England. The wife never returned to the husband. In January, 1950, she wrote to ask him if he would object to her returning to South Africa with the children. He replied that he would object. The wife then wrote and stated that she would not take them away without informing him and without a court order. In May, 1950, the elder son, Peter Ronald, was returned by the wife to the husband, and in December, 1950, the wife, having given her solicitors specific instructions not to disclose her intention to the husband, returned to South Africa, taking with her the younger son, Brian Vincent. On May 15, 1953, the husband filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's desertion. The petition was not defended, and on Oct. 7, 1953, His Honour JUDGE ENGELBACH, sitting as a divorce commissioner, granted the husband a decree nisi and ordered that he be granted the custody of the two children. On Oct. 15, 1953, the wife, who had intended to defend as to custody, but who had expected this question to be referred to the registrar, applied for a variation of that order by granting the custody of Brian Vincent to her. On Dec. 10, 1953, COLLINGWOOD, J., ordered that the custody of Brian Vincent be given to the wife. The husband appealed.

Ranking for the husband.

Ackner for the wife.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: There is no question that, in taking the child with her to South Africa, the wife deliberately broke her promise to the husband, and counsel for the wife has not sought to palliate that conduct on her part. That unquestioned desertion was the basis of the decree granted in October, 1953.

A A period of approximately three years had elapsed from the time when the breach of her undertaking by the wife became clear and irrevocable to the time of the decree, and during that time I think there is no doubt that the husband did little—if, indeed, he did anything—to inform himself of the well-being, or even the whereabouts, of the child. I get the impression that the husband was accepting as a fait accompli the position that each would have the care and control of one child. But the husband did ask for and obtain, on the making of the decree, an order for custody of both. From the practical point of view, so long as the wife remains in the Union of South Africa it is clear that nothing effective could in any case be done by the husband unless he took proceedings in the courts of that country. And so again I state my impression that if nothing further had happened, matters would have continued thus, perhaps, indefinitely. B But the wife took out a summons which came before COLLINGWOOD, J., who varied the order dated Oct. 7, 1953, of His Honour JUDGE ENGELBACH sitting as a divorce commissioner, ordered that the younger child should remain in the custody of the wife until further order, and directed that the wife should have leave to keep that child out of the jurisdiction of the court, that direction being indefinite in point of time.

C It is a striking and arresting fact that the wife, coming back to this court to ask for a variation of the order of Oct. 7, 1953, made no suggestion or offer in her evidence to the effect that, if the court accepted her application, she would obey any further order about the child that the court might make. Indeed—D and once more I must state my impression—although the summons by the wife before COLLINGWOOD, J., and the present appeal by the husband relate to the child, and although, therefore, the arguments have naturally been punctuated by assertions on both sides that the only concern of the two parties is the welfare of the child, nevertheless, it seems to me that these proceedings are really in the nature of manoeuvres by the husband and the wife to gain tactical advantages. The result of COLLINGWOOD, J.'s order is, undoubtedly and admittedly, that E the husband is, and will be, put at a substantial disadvantage if ever he should see fit to go to South Africa and ask for a return of the younger child. Counsel for the wife says it is right that he should be at such a disadvantage, at any rate if the court is, as was COLLINGWOOD, J., satisfied that for the moment it is in the best interests of that child that he should remain in South Africa with his mother. It is clear that the learned judge's mind was directed exclusively to the question whether it was better that the child should remain, at any rate F for the present, with his mother, or should be transported back to England. On that matter, after considering the somewhat serious conduct of the wife, the fact that she was a deserter, and the husband's lack, or apparent lack, of serious concern about the child during the past two years of his life, COLLINGWOOD, J., thought that the better argument was clearly in favour of the child remaining G where he was—that a young boy who had always been with his mother and would not know his elder brother, or, perhaps, even his father, ought not to be sent back now to England. But counsel for the husband has made it clear that he is not asking this court to express any view whether or not the child now or at some future date ought to come back to England, and I confess that any view that we expressed would be largely futile, because it would be incapable of being made effective unless the court in South Africa should take a similar view.

H I feel the force of COLLINGWOOD, J.'s opinion that, for the moment at any rate, this child is better where he is. Only one matter is not mentioned by him, which seems to me to be not without substance, namely, that this child (who is English by birth) has an elder brother, and a matter which at some time will have to be considered is whether it is not right that he should be brought up to be aware of that fact and to have the advantages of brotherhood as well as fatherhood made available to him. But more on that topic I do not propose to say, for I have come to the conclusion that whatever be, now or hereafter, the right answer to the problem of the care and control of the child, I am not satisfied that it was right to vary the order made on Oct. 7, 1953, when the decree nisi was granted and to give the legal custody to the mother on the ground (for so it must be taken) that she in fact had possession of the child, she in fact took him out of England, she in fact has got him and has brought him up, I understand, well. I do not think, in the circumstances of this case, that it is right, or to the child's advantage, that the husband should be put technically in that disadvantageous position, and, therefore, without saying more, I think that the proper course is to let the original order in this respect stand, namely, to let the husband have the legal custody of the child, but to make it clear—and in the circumstances of this case I think it should be made clear by express statement in the order—that the order as to custody is without prejudice to any question as regards the care and control of this child. If, then, the husband chooses to make an application to the South African courts, the matter will, no doubt, be considered by those courts on its merits, but the husband will not, at any rate, start with the unfair disadvantage that it would be said: "The courts in England have said that the mother ought to have the legal custody of this child". Without more, therefore, I should allow this appeal, and restore, with the qualification that I have mentioned, the order originally made as regards the custody of the child, Brian Vincent, in the decree nisi. A B C

DENNING, L.J.: Cases often arise in the Divorce Court where a guilty wife deserts her husband and takes the children with her, but the father has no means of bringing them up himself. In such a situation the usual order is that the father, the innocent party, is given the custody of the child or children, but the care and control is left to the mother. That order is entirely realistic. By giving the father the custody, it recognises that he, the innocent party, is at least entitled to a voice in the bringing up of the child or children, and also to the consideration of the court when any question arises as to what is to be done for the child. The paramount, but not the only, consideration when the court comes to consider the matter is, of course, the welfare of the child, but the father's views are also entitled to consideration, and that is why the order for custody should be given to him, although, solely for practical reasons, the mother may have the care and control. I think the judge erred in this case because there can be no doubt whatever on the facts before us that the father was the innocent party, and that the wife took a child of two years of age out of the country both in breach of an undertaking which she had deliberately given that she would not do so and contrary to the advice of her then solicitor, who told her that she ought not to do it without communicating with the father. I am of opinion that the custody ought to be given to the father, without prejudice, as SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., has said, to any question of care and control, which, no doubt, will be dealt with by the courts in South Africa. I agree that the appeal should be allowed accordingly. D E F

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. It was suggested that, if we interfered, as we are asked to do by the husband, with COLLINGWOOD, J.'s order, we should, in effect, be overruling the discretion which was vested in him and which he exercised. But that is not so. The point that we are deciding today is different from the point to which COLLINGWOOD, J., was addressing his mind when he said: "I cannot see any argument at all which would justify me in saying that this little boy in his own interest should be taken away from his mother and brought back to England". He gave effect to that view without hesitation and said that he would not make the order. We are now being asked to put the husband into a position in which he can approach, on terms of equality with his former wife, the South African courts if any question in regard to the welfare or control of the child comes up for determination. As the matter stands at the moment, the wife having the legal custody as well as the physical control of the child, I G H take the view that the husband would be gravely prejudiced, and in a difficult position in regard to the South African courts, if, in the face of that order, he made an application which he might well make to them on some matter affecting the child. Today we are merely removing that disadvantage and putting him on equal terms with the wife in any application that may be made. Counsel for the wife said that if we made the order which my Lord has indicated it would be giving the husband an advantage over the wife, but I do not take that view.

- A The words which are to be put into the order, "without prejudice to any question of care or control", will and plainly are intended to leave the matter open, and will, no doubt, receive that interpretation in the South African courts. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Real Property—Restrictive covenant—Modification—Application for leave to apply to Lands Tribunal and for stay of proceedings when granted—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 84 (9).

- D Where proceedings are taken to enforce a restrictive covenant and the defendant applies to the court under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 84 (9), for leave to apply to the Lands Tribunal to modify the covenant and for an order staying the proceedings pending the result of the application to the tribunal, the court should not make an order under s. 84 (9) if it is clear on the evidence that the application to the tribunal would not be successful, but if it appears that the defendant would have some chance of obtaining from the tribunal the modification which he seeks, and if the application under s. 84 (9) has been made promptly, the court should, normally, make the order which is asked for, as the modification of covenants is not within its power, and, therefore, it would seem unfair to deprive the defendant of his chance to obtain the modification from the tribunal.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by the defendant in an action to enforce a restrictive covenant.

- G The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of premises, known as No. 25 Warley Road, Scunthorpe, Lincolnshire, where he carried on the business of a grocer and general dealer, and the defendants were the occupiers of No. 33 Warley Road. In 1937 both properties formed part of the Warley Road estate which belonged to one Jennison, and which had not then been developed. By a conveyance, dated Nov. 15, 1937, Jennison conveyed No. 25 to the plaintiff's predecessor in title and covenanted with him and the persons deriving title under him, with the intent and so as to bind the whole of the Warley Road estate into whosoever hands it might come, that not more than one further shop should be built on the estate, and that the second shop should not be used for the business of a grocer and provision merchant and/or general dealer, but should be used only for the sale of greengroceries, tobacco, cigarettes and matches, together with one only of seven specified groups of trades or businesses. The second shop which was built on the estate was at No. 33 Warley Road, and this property was conveyed to the defendants with notice of the covenant, which was registered as a land charge, class D (ii), under the Land Charges Act, 1925. The defendants carried on the business of a greengrocer and tobacconist on their property, and also sold certain other articles there.

On May 27, 1953, the plaintiff commenced an action for, inter alia, an injunction restraining the defendants from using their property for the business of a grocer and provision merchant and/or general dealer. By the statement of claim, which was delivered on June 6, 1953, he alleged, inter alia, that, notwithstanding the covenant in the conveyance of Nov. 15, 1937, the defendants were carrying on, on their property, the business of a grocer and provision merchant and of a general dealer, and threatened and intended to continue the same. By their defence, which was delivered on July 31, 1953, the defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the covenant was imposed as part of a scheme for the development of the Warley Road estate, and that since 1937 the character of the neighbourhood of the estate had changed in that the surrounding land, which was then vacant and undeveloped, had been greatly developed and built up and was in the course of further development which would result in it being entirely built up. The defence went on to say:

"If, which is not admitted, the defendants have committed any breach of the covenant relied on by the plaintiff . . . the defendants will contend that by reason of the alteration in the character of the neighbourhood . . . the object of the said covenant is substantially at an end and the . . . covenant ought to be deemed obsolete or, alternatively, that the continued existence thereof would impede the reasonable user of the defendants' property for private purposes without securing practical benefit to other persons or unless modified as hereinafter mentioned would so impede such user and that the discharge or modification of the covenant would not injure the plaintiff or other persons entitled to the benefit thereof and that in the above circumstances the same should be wholly or partially discharged or modified to the extent necessary to permit the sale by the defendants of "

sixty-nine specified articles (being those already sold by the defendants). The defendants further pleaded that their predecessor in title throughout his occupation of the property from October, 1947, to August, 1952, had sold thereat, to the knowledge of the plaintiff and his predecessors in title, all but eight of the sixty-nine specified articles; that neither the plaintiff nor his predecessors in title had taken any steps to prevent such sale; and that, therefore, if the sale of the articles involved any breach of the covenant, the plaintiff and his predecessors in title had acquiesced in the breach and impliedly assented thereto, and the plaintiff was precluded from enforcing the covenant.

On Dec. 15, 1953, the defendants took out the present summons, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 84 (9), asking for leave to apply to the Lands Tribunal (to whom the jurisdiction conferred on the "authority" under s. 84 of the Act of 1925 was transferred by the Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, s. 1 (4) (a)) to modify the covenant and for an order staying all further proceedings in the action pending the result of the application to the Lands Tribunal.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an application under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 84 (9), by the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiff for the enforcement of a restrictive covenant. There is no doubt that the covenant is binding on the defendants, because they had notice of it when the property was conveyed to them, and, moreover, the covenant was registered in pursuance of the Land Charges Act, 1925. By their defence the defendants pleaded (a) that the covenant was obsolete and should be discharged or modified on the grounds mentioned in s. 84 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and (b) acquiescence. By the present application they asked for leave to apply to the Lands Tribunal to modify the covenant and for an order staying all further proceedings in the action pending the result of the application to the tribunal.

It appears that an order under s. 84 (9) of the Act of 1925 is in the discretion of the court, but the sub-section does not give any indication as to the considerations which should affect the decision of the court in regard to such an application.

- A Feilden v. Byrne (1), which came before EVE, J., is the only reported case on the subject. The matter is not very clear, even after the decision of EVE, J., and I feel some difficulty in deciding exactly the grounds on which the order should be made. It is, I think, clear that the proceedings should not be stayed for the purpose of an application to the Lands Tribunal for modification of the covenant if, on the evidence, it is plain to the court that such an application would have no real chance of succeeding, but, apart from that consideration, it seems to me that, normally, an application under s. 84 (9) should be acceded to, because the modification of covenants is not within the power of this court, and it would seem, therefore, unfair to deprive the defendants of their chance to obtain a modification from the tribunal, if they are able to make out a case. On the other hand, it seems to me plain that the application under s. 84 (9) should be made promptly when proceedings are brought. I do not think that it is necessary that the defendants should have applied to the tribunal before the issue of proceedings, because, until the plaintiff has proceeded with his action, the defendants may well think that the plaintiff does not propose really to attempt to enforce the covenants, but, once the action has been begun, then, if the defendants wish to take advantage of the procedure which is created by s. 84 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, they should apply promptly to the court.

- D In the present case the writ was issued on May 27, 1953. The statement of claim was served on the defendants on June 6, 1953, so that they then knew definitely what was the complaint which was made against them, and the defence in the action was delivered on July 31, 1953. The present application was not made until Dec. 15, 1953. It is not really possible to compare the present case with the procedure in Feilden v. Byrne (1), because nowadays no order under a summons for directions is required for pleadings, whereas at the time of Feilden v. Byrne (1), pleadings would not normally be delivered until the issue of the summons for directions and the hearing on it. I have felt some doubt whether I ought not to say that the defendants have not proceeded with due dispatch in the present case. On the other hand, it must be recognised, I think, that the advisers of the defendants were entitled to some time in which to examine the circumstances and to obtain evidence, so that they can decide and advise the defendants whether an application to the Lands Tribunal under s. 84 would have any reasonable chance of success. While I feel that the defendants may be open to some criticism in the present case—their application would, in my opinion, have been free from objection if it had been made, for instance, in October, instead of in December—yet, on the whole, I do not think it is a case in which I ought to deprive them of their chance of applying to the tribunal for the modification of the covenant. Accordingly, proceedings will be stayed for the purpose of enabling the defendants to apply promptly to the Lands Tribunal under s. 84, and the costs of this application will be costs in the action.

Order accordingly.

Rent Control—Furnished house—Occupation as “residence”—Use by tenant partly for business purposes and partly as residence—Boarding house—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 2 (1).

The principles which are set out in R. v. Brighton & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Slaughter (ante, p. 423) as those to be applied in determining whether premises, which are intended to be used partly as business premises and partly as a dwelling-house, constitute a “dwelling-house” for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1, are also applicable in determining whether furnished premises are within the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, notwithstanding the difference in the wording of s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and that of s. 2 (1) of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946.

By an agreement in writing, dated Mar. 1, 1953, furnished premises were let to the tenant as a “boarding house” at a rent of £327 12s. per annum. There was no covenant restricting user, and the tenant and her family occupied the basement and one bedroom on the ground floor as their home and conducted the rest of the premises as a boarding house. On a reference by the tenant to a rent tribunal to fix the rent payable for the premises under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2, the tribunal held that they had no jurisdiction on the ground that the premises were let as business premises and not as a residence. On a motion for mandamus, Held: under the contract the tenant was within her rights in occupying the premises as a residence, as they were intended to be used by her partly for business purposes and partly as a dwelling-house, and, therefore, she had been granted “the right to occupy as a residence a house or part of a house,” within s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946 and the tribunal had jurisdiction to consider the reference.

MOTION for an order of mandamus directed to the York, Harrogate, Ripon and Northallerton Areas Rent Tribunal requiring them to hear and determine a reference made to them by the applicant under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2.

By an agreement in writing dated Mar. 1, 1953, the applicant became the tenant of premises described as “the boarding house situated at 19, New Queen Street, Scarborough . . . with the fixtures, fittings and furnishings as per inventory”, at a rent of £327 12s. per annum, for a term of one year with an option to renew for a further twelve months, the tenant to pay all rates and taxes except the landlord's property tax. The premises were substantially furnished. There was no covenant restricting user of the premises, and the applicant and her family occupied the basement and one bedroom on the ground floor as their home and conducted the rest of the premises as a boarding house. On Sept. 2, 1953, the applicant applied to the rent tribunal to fix the rent payable for the premises under s. 2 of the Act of 1946. At the hearing of the reference on Oct. 16, 1953, it was contended on behalf of the landlord that the tribunal had no jurisdiction because the premises were let as business premises and not as a residence. The tribunal acceded to that contention, and, accordingly, declined jurisdiction.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29. PARKER, J., read this judgment of the court. In this case counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, the tenant of furnished premises
B situated at 19, New Queen Street, Scarborough, for an order of mandamus directed to the York, Harrogate, Ripon and Northallerton Areas Rent Tribunal to hear and determine a reference made by her to the tribunal to fix a rent for the premises under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2.

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] In the judgment just delivered in R. v. Brighton & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Slaughter (1) the
C court set out the principles which, in their view, should be applied in determining whether particular premises, intended to be used partly as business premises and partly as a dwelling-house, constitute a dwelling-house for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1. If those principles are applicable to determine whether furnished premises are within the Furnished Houses (Rent
D Control) Act, 1946, it is clear that the premises in this case are within the Act. It is contended, however, on the part of the landlord that those principles are inapplicable since, whereas by s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, the Rent Restrictions Acts apply to "a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling", the Act of 1946 applies to "a house or part of a house" in respect of which "the right to occupy as a residence"
E has been granted [s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946]. In our opinion, however, this difference in wording does not prevent the application of those principles. If anything, the wording in s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1946 admits more easily of their application since the Act is expressly applied to contracts under which the lessee is within his rights in occupying the premises as a residence. Nor does it, in our view, make any difference that under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts there is an express provision that any dwelling-house shall not be
F excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used for business purposes [s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939]. The principles to which we have referred were adopted by the Court of Appeal in Epsom Grand Stand Asscn., Ltd. v. Clarke (2) before there was any such statutory provision. Indeed, the Act of 1920 only gave statutory recognition to that decision. In G our view, therefore, the tribunal here had jurisdiction, and an order of mandamus should issue.

Order for mandamus.

STYLE v. STYLE AND KEILLER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), January 28, 29, 1954.]

Divorce—Settlement of wife's property—Payments to be secured on investments in this country and not on income received from abroad—Power to order payments to be secured from past date—Power of court to order deed settled by conveyancing counsel—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 24 (1).

On May 3, 1950, a decree nisi of divorce pronounced against the wife on the ground of adultery was made absolute and the wife subsequently married the co-respondent. On Feb. 1, 1951, the husband served on the wife notice of an application for a portion of her property to be settled on him under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The wife's net capital was £484,000, of which £54,000 represented investments in this country and the rest a share of property in the United States of America. Her income from all sources was between £11,000 and £12,000 a year, £2,000 being from free investments in this country. On June 18, 1953, the registrar reported that the wife should be ordered to settle a fund producing a gross sum of £1,500 a year, as from the date of the decree absolute, for the husband's life, to be provided out of securities to be agreed by the parties or determined by a registrar. The report was varied by BARNARD, J., on motions by both parties to provide that one half of the £1,500 should be secured on the wife's free investments in this country and one half by a charge on her income receivable in this country, and that the settlement should date only from the date of its execution. On appeal, HELD: (i) in view of the impracticability of charging the income receivable in this country from abroad, notwithstanding the consequential tying up of the wife's free investments in this country, the order of the judge should be provided to provide that the whole £1,500 should be charged on those investments.

(ii) the court had power under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, to order the annual payments to be secured to the husband under the settlement from some past date—in this case the date of the service of the husband's application, and effect should be given to such order by increasing the annual sum to be secured for the first seven years by an amount sufficient to discharge the arrears.

Judgment of BARNARD, J., on these issues ([1953] 2 All E.R. 836), reversed.

Semle, the court cannot of its own motion refer the drafting of such a settlement to conveyancing counsel of the court, though able to do so by consent.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of BARNARD, J., dated July 29, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 836, varying a report of the registrar submitting that the wife should be ordered to settle on the husband, as from the date of the decree absolute of divorce which he had obtained, a fund producing a gross sum of £1,500 for his life, and that this should be provided from securities to be agreed by the parties or in default of agreement directed by a registrar. BARNARD, J., directed that £750 of the £1,500 should be secured on the wife's free investments in this country and the remaining £750 by a charge on her income receivable in this country from property in the United States of America, and he held that the court had no power to ante-date the settlement to the date of the decree absolute, and that it became effective only as from its date. The husband appealed.

Beyfus, Q.C., Phillimore, Q.C., and Elverston for the husband.
Laskey for the wife.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The petitioner, Charles Richard Style, was married to Gabrielle Muriel Style, the respondent, in 1938, when he was thirty-seven and the wife was thirty years old. There is no issue of the marriage, but the wife has a child by an earlier marriage who is now eighteen or nineteen years old. In 1950 the husband divorced his wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, who was ordered to pay, and did pay, £5,000 damages. The decree was made absolute on May 3, 1950, and the wife has since married the co-respondent.

The husband is a sick man. He has an income of £1,550 a year gross, of which £1,000 is what has been described as a voluntary pension paid to him by his former employers. The wife has considerable income and assets, most of which came to her in or about 1943. Her financial position, as it was about the beginning of 1953, is shown in schedules attached to a letter from her accountants, dated Jan. 14, 1953. The schedules show that at Apr. 5, 1952, her net capital could be taken as something over £484,000. The greater part of that is a share in property in Texas. She had in this country, as shown by sched. B, investments which were then of a capital value of £54,000. Her income from all sources was between £11,000 and £12,000 a year, mostly from her share of the property in America.

On July 3, 1950, the husband's solicitors took out a summons showing the husband's intention to apply to the court for an order that the wife should make such provision by way of settlement as might be reasonable for the benefit of the husband. Notice of the application was not served on the wife's solicitors until Feb. 1, 1951, as shown by a letter of that date. There had been extended inquiries and negotiations as to income tax and surtax arising out of the wife's income. Demand notes had been served on the husband, and they had been passed in turn to the wife's solicitors, and some years were occupied in discussions before ultimately the wife, I think first by an indemnity, and later by payment, discharged her responsibility thereunder and thus freed the husband. No doubt, it was by reason of the tax position that service of the summons did not take place earlier. After service there were long discussions again, but ultimately the husband's application made under s. 24 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, came before the registrar. The sub-section reads:

"If it appears to the court in any case in which the court pronounces a decree for divorce or for judicial separation by reason of the adultery, desertion or cruelty of the wife that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion, the court may, if it thinks fit, order such settlement as it thinks reasonable to be made of the property, or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage or either or any of them."

In the report of the registrar dated June 18, 1953, he sets out particulars of the income of both, and other matters and after stating his findings generally, reports:

"In all the circumstances I think that the wife should be ordered to settle upon him, as from the decree absolute, funds producing a gross sum of £1,500 for his life; and that this should be provided from securities to be agreed by the parties, or, in default of agreement, directed by a registrar. There are ample stocks and shares available for this purpose within the jurisdiction."

The report came before BARNARD, J., on July 29, 1953, and both parties raised questions on it. The judge varied the report in two respects. On the method by which payments should be secured he said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 838):

"... I only propose to vary the registrar's report by giving slightly more detailed instructions as to how the property is to be settled. I think it correct to order the wife to execute a settlement of her property to produce £1,500 a year gross payable to the husband during his life, one moiety, that is to say, £750 a year, to be secured on the wife's free investments in this country and, as to the other moiety, the remaining £750 a year, by a charge on her income receivable in this country."

It had been pointed out to the judge that to secure the whole yearly sum of £1,500 on the wife's investments in this country would tie up a very considerable part of those investments, and the judge assented to that and ordered only the sum of £750 a year to be secured on the free investments in this country, and the remaining £750 a year to be secured by a charge on her income receivable in this country. In this court it has been shown that there is difficulty in securing an annual sum by a charge on income receivable from abroad. Counsel for the husband read to us an opinion given by his junior counsel, which sets out the position quite clearly, and I take this sentence from it:

"... accordingly it seems to me, if the views I have expressed above are correct, the order of BARNARD, J., so far as it directs a settlement of the [wife's] income receivable in this country, may be of no effect for want of jurisdiction, or as having been made per incuriam."

It is common ground that there are difficulties in securing an annual sum on the income to which the wife is entitled in Texas, and which may, or may not, be received in this country. Such an order, even if it could be enforced, as to which I have some doubt, would add to the costs of everyone, and would mean continuous inquiries and would not be, as I think, to the advantage of either party. The fact remains that the wife has both a very considerable income and assets in Texas. In the circumstances, I feel that it is right that, if this court is to make an order under s. 24 (1), the amount ought to be secured on the free investments which she has in this country. The order of BARNARD, J., should be varied accordingly.

The other variation made by BARNARD, J., arises on the date from which the income should run or should be secured. The report was that the wife should be ordered to settle on him as from the decree absolute funds producing a gross sum of £1,500 a year for his life. BARNARD, J., on that said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 838):

"... the wife says that the settlement ought not to take effect as from the decree absolute, and she also objects to the sum being settled on the husband for his life. With regard to that latter objection it is well within the jurisdiction of the court to order a settlement for the life of the husband, and I think it is very right and proper in this case. As to the other matter I feel grave difficulty. I do not think myself on looking at the section that the court really has any jurisdiction either to ante-date the settlement or to ante-date the effect of the settlement."

The judge read s. 24 (1) and said (ibid.):

"That is different from the wording of s. 19 (2) which deals with maintenance, and which commences: 'On any decree for divorce.' I cannot help feeling that the court has no jurisdiction to do anything except to order the wife to settle the property. That, I think, must mean that it only becomes effective as from the date of the settlement."

The section appears to me to give the injured husband a right to ask the court to order such settlement as it thinks reasonable to be made of the property, or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party. If application is not made until some considerable time after the decree absolute has been granted, I do not think that the court should order a settlement which would have the effect of securing income as from the date of the decree absolute. On the other hand, I cannot think it is right to say, as counsel for the wife submitted, that where the hearing of an application by the injured party is held up for one reason or another, perhaps for years, the court has no power to deal with the period elapsing between the notice of application and the execution of the settlement. The rights of the injured party, the husband, might be entirely defeated if that were so. He might be dead before the litigation ended, or before a settlement was executed. Once notice of application is given to the wife, the court ought to regard that as done which ought to have been done, if and when the court comes to a conclusion that the settlement ought to have been ordered. It is only thus that the section can be made effective and given its true meaning. In those circumstances, I feel that the court should say that the order should apply as from Feb. 1, 1951, i.e., the date on which notice of application was given to the wife's solicitors.

The remaining question is one of more difficulty. The court may order such settlement as it thinks reasonable. If the court thinks it reasonable to order that £1,500 a year should be secured as from Feb. 1, 1951, but no settlement has yet been executed or will be for a little time, provision must be made for the period between Feb. 1, 1951, and the date on which the settlement is executed. Three years have elapsed now. That means a gross sum of £4,500. I indicated to counsel for the wife in the course of the argument that we were most anxious to consider how we could secure that any order made was carried out most conveniently for the wife, but counsel was unable to say how we could best help his client. One reason for my question was that the form of order might affect the wife's position with the tax authorities. The order will provide that the annual sum is payable from Feb. 1, 1951, and sufficient of the free investments in this country will be settled to bring that about. It may be doubtful whether the court can order the payment of a lump sum as part of the settlement. I have reached the conclusion that the best way to ensure the carrying out of this decision is to order that a greater proportion of the free investments in this country shall be settled so as to secure that, over a period of, perhaps, seven or eight years, increased payments may extinguish the £4,500, which might be described as arrears, or as sums which would have been paid if the settlement had been executed on Feb. 1, 1951. Consequently, the settlement will embrace a larger proportion of the free securities than is necessary to secure a payment of £1,500 a year. But the settlement should further provide that, as and when the arrears are extinguished, a proportionate amount of the securities will be freed from the settlement and returned to the wife. In that way I feel that the court will be able to carry out the provisions of the section.

One other question was raised. R.S.C., Ord. 51, r. 7, provides:

"The court or a judge may refer to the conveyancing counsel of the court any matter relating to the investigation of the title to an estate with a view to an investment of money in the purchase or on mortgage thereof, or with a view to sale thereof, or to the settlement of a draft of a conveyance, mortgage, settlement, or other instrument, or any other matter which the court or judge may think fit to refer, and may receive and act upon the opinion given in the matter referred."

Rule 80 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, provides:

"Subject to the provisions of these rules and of any enactment, the Rules of the Supreme Court shall, notwithstanding the provisions of Ord. 68 thereof, apply with the necessary modifications to the practice and procedure in any cause or matter to which these rules apply."

It was submitted that the court might refer the drafting of the settlement to conveyancing counsel of the court, although no provision to that effect is made in s. 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. In s. 19 (2) of the Act, which deals with alimony and maintenance in cases of divorce and nullity of marriage, there is an express power to refer such a question to conveyancing counsel of the court.

In view of the omission of any such power from s. 24, I find it difficult to see how we can of our own motion so refer the question which arises here. Learned counsel have been most helpful in this matter. Counsel for the wife agrees that the question of the drafting of the settlement shall be referred to conveyancing counsel of the court, provided that the court approves, and that it is open to either side to bring the matter before the court. I think it is right that that should be done, and, consequently, I would direct, by consent, that the drafting of the settlement be referred to conveyancing counsel of the court, subject to the right of either party to apply with regard to any question arising on the draft. In my judgment, this appeal should be allowed in the respects which I have mentioned. A

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The registrar's conclusion was to this effect:

"In all the circumstances I think that the wife should be ordered to settle upon him [the husband], as from the decree absolute, funds producing a gross sum of £1,500 a year for his life; and that this should be provided from securities to be agreed by the parties, or, in default of agreement, directed by a registrar. There are ample stocks and shares available for this purpose within the jurisdiction." B

While upholding the registrar's view that £1,500 a year was the proper annual amount to be provided for the husband, the judge varied his recommendation in two respects. The first variation had the effect of providing that the £1,500 a year, instead of being wholly secured on the wife's free investments in this country, should be secured as to £750 a year in that way, and as to the remaining £750 a year by a charge on the wife's income receivable in this country, meaning thereby the income from the wife's American assets. It appears that both before the registrar and before the judge counsel for the husband had contended that the court had power to direct the making of an effective charge on the wife's American income. On the other hand, counsel for the wife contended that this could not be done. The judge took the view that the American income receivable in this country could be effectively charged, and, holding that view, made the variation to which I have referred. The argument of counsel for the wife has, I think, consistently been that, as the American income cannot be effectively charged, the only available security consists, for practical purposes, of the wife's free investments in this country, and that it would be wrong to fix the payment to be made to the husband at as large a sum as £1,500 a year, inasmuch as that would involve taking out of the wife's disposition substantially the whole of her free investments in this country. It now appears (and I do not think it is seriously disputed on either side) that it is impracticable to provide for an effective charge on the wife's American income receivable in this country, so that the judge, in varying the registrar's report in that respect, was proceeding under a misapprehension. Nevertheless, the judge agreed with the registrar that the proper figure to be provided for the husband was £1,500 per annum, and counsel for the wife did not contend before us that this sum, considered simply with reference to the relative means of the parties, was excessive. In these circumstances, it seems to me that this court must do the best it can to see that the £1,500 per annum is effectively secured to the husband on such assets of the wife as are available for the purpose. The American assets not being so available, I think our order should proceed on the footing that the settlement securing the £1,500 per annum should be a settlement of the wife's free investments in this country, or a competent part thereof. C D E F G H

The second matter on which the judge varied the registrar's report was in so far as the report provided that the settlement should be made on the husband as from the decree absolute. As to that the judge said ([1953] 2 All E.R. 838):

"I do not think myself on looking at the section that the court really has any jurisdiction either to ante-date the settlement or to ante-date the effect of the settlement."

If, in expressing the view that the court had no jurisdiction to "ante-date the settlement", the judge meant that it was not possible for the court to order that specific stocks should be settled as from a certain past date, I would not differ from him, for, in the nature of things, it is not possible to put back the clock and treat investments as having been settled on some past date, when in fact the income arising from them during the past period in question has been spent. Even so, I think it is wrong to say that the settlement can only operate from the date on which it is actually executed, for I am satisfied that it is perfectly competent to the court to direct a settlement which will take effect with respect to the investments to be settled as from the date of the order directing the settlement.

So far as the learned judge expressed the view that the court has no jurisdiction to "ante-date the effect of the settlement", I cannot agree. The court's power under s. 24 (1) is expressed in these terms. In the circumstances set out "the court may, if it thinks fit, order such settlement as it thinks reasonable to be made of the property, or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage or either or any of them."

If, in all the circumstances of a case, the court thinks it reasonable that a settlement should be made for the benefit of an innocent husband, that the benefit to be taken by him thereunder should be in the form of an annual payment, and that the annual sum should be payable during his life and be computed from some past date, I find nothing in the construction of the section, and no ground in principle, against holding that the court has jurisdiction under the section to give effect to that view. The date from which one should compute the benefit given to a husband under a settlement ordered to be made in any particular instance must, of course, depend on all the circumstances of the case. In the present case I agree with my Lord that the reasonable date to fix is the date of the service of the application for a settlement, i.e., Feb. 1, 1951. The result, therefore, is that the proper settlement to be here directed is a settlement comprising the wife's free investments in this country, or a competent part thereof, and it will be so framed that the husband will receive under it £1,500 a year for his life, together with an additional yearly sum of such amount as will give him an aggregate sum equal to the yearly sum of £1,500 computed from the date of the service of the application down to the execution of the settlement.

The only other matter is the period over which the payments required to give the settlement retrospective effect (if I may use that expression) shall be spread. I agree that it would be reasonable, and I think it might be advantageous to the wife from the point of view of income tax, if the period fixed for that purpose was seven years, and I also agree that the settlement should be framed so as to allow surplus investments to be released to the wife after the additional payments for giving the settlement retrospective effect have all been made. Accordingly, I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed, and that an order should be made in the sense he proposes, the draft being referred, in accordance with the consent of the parties, to conveyancing counsel of the court, subject to the parties' right to raise before the judge any question that they may conceive to arise on the draft.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree, and have nothing to add.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), January 13, 1954.]

Will—Charging clause—Remuneration of professional trustee—Trustee changed by codicil—Right of substituted trustee to charge for services.

By a will dated Mar. 14, 1944, the testator appointed as the executors and trustees thereof two solicitors and directed that they should be entitled to be paid their ordinary professional charges. On Aug. 6, 1953, the testator executed a codicil in which he stated that he wished to change the executors and trustees named in the will to the W. bank "whom I now appoint executors and trustees."

HELD: the codicil created a valid appointment of the bank as sole executor and trustee under both will and codicil, and, as the will expressly provided for the payment of their professional charges to the solicitors who were then appointed executors and trustees, the testator must have intended that the bank, who would be acting in the same capacity, should also be entitled to payment for their services.

AS TO OF WHAT PROBATE MAY BE GRANTED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 14, pp. 192-205, paras. 316-337; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 23, pp. 93-98, Nos. 863-908.

PROBATE MOTION.

By a will dated Mar. 14, 1944, the testator appointed two partners in a firm of solicitors to be the executors and trustees of the will and devised and bequeathed to them his estate in trust for Alice Dillon Malcolm Longbotham (widow) and Mary Davison (married woman) for life and on their death to Arthur Davison for life with remainders over. The testator directed that the solicitors should be paid their ordinary professional charges for the work they did in connection with the trust. On Dec. 30, 1948, one of the solicitors died. On Aug. 6, 1953, the testator wrote a codicil on the two sides of a sheet of note-paper, stating, inter alia:

"I wish to change the executors and trustees named in my will from Messrs. Parson, Lee & Co. . . . to the Westminster Bank whom I now appoint executors and trustees."

J. A. Brightman for the Westminster Bank, Ltd.

R. W. Vick and Michael Bowles for the beneficiaries under the will.

Marshall-Reynolds for the Greater London Fund for the Blind (interested under the codicil).

WALLINGTON, J., stated the facts, held on the facts that the codicil was duly executed and valid, and continued: Questions have been raised as to (i) whether or not there is a valid appointment of the Westminster Bank, Ltd., as sole executor and trustee under both will and codicil, and (ii) whether the bank should be given the right to charge for their services as executor and trustee under the will and codicil. In my opinion, it is clear that the codicil contains an express and unambiguous appointment of the bank as executor and trustee under both will and codicil. It is the plain intention of the testator to place the administration of his whole estate in the hands of the bank on the basis of both the testamentary documents. The only reference in the will to any question of charges is a provision that the solicitors for the testator (who under the will were appointed as executors and trustees) should be paid their ordinary professional charges. Obviously that provision cannot apply to the bank. It is, however, plain that the testator intended that the bank should be the executor and trustee and would not have wished them so to act con amore. Moreover, since the testator stated in the will that his solicitor executors and trustees should be entitled to charge their ordinary professional charges for their work in that capacity, when in the codicil he expressed a wish to change the executors named in his will from the solicitors to the Westminster Bank, Ltd., it follows that he changed from one professional executor to another who would act in the same capacity and with the same right to be paid. It is plain, to my mind, that the testator never contemplated the appointment of an unpaid executor or that the bank would accept the appointment on a gratuitous footing. Further, there is ample authority that the court is entitled in cases of this kind to order that the bank acting in the capacity of executor and trustee should be entitled to make their ordinary charges for the work they do in administering the estate. I, therefore, decree that probate of both the will and codicil be granted to the Westminster Bank, Ltd. and that the bank, when acting under the grant, so act on their standard terms and conditions in force at the date of the said codicil including those governing the bank's remuneration in accordance with their scale of fees.

BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. v. BIRD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), January 20, 22, 26, 1954.]

Husband and Wife—Deserted wife in occupation of husband's dwelling-house—

Mortgage of matrimonial home by husband before desertion—Equitable mortgage—Claim for possession by equitable mortgagee—Wife's right to remain in matrimonial home.

On Feb. 10, 1947, the husband executed an equitable charge on the matrimonial home in favour of a bank, and, by cl. 8 thereof, irrevocably empowered the bank to appoint one of its officials to be his attorney for the purpose of executing a legal mortgage in the bank's favour. In December, 1952, the husband deserted his wife, who, on Mar. 11, 1953, obtained under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, from the master an order that she and her children be permitted to reside in the matrimonial home and that the husband should not create any right in any other person to evict them or interfere with their residence therein. On May 6, 1953, the husband was adjudicated bankrupt, and on July 9, 1953, in pursuance of the power of attorney conferred by cl. 8 of the charge, a legal mortgage of the property was executed in favour of the bank. On a summons for possession by the bank,

Held: (i) before any right of the wife to remain in the matrimonial home could have arisen on the husband's desertion, the bank's right to possession arose on the creation of the equitable mortgage, and the fact that the bank was only an equitable mortgagee made no difference to its right to ask the court for possession; and, therefore, the wife's right was subject to the rights of the bank as mortgagee, which was entitled to possession.

Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Oliver's Trustee ([1953] 2 All E.R. 1443), followed.

(ii) by virtue of the power of attorney conferred by cl. 8 of the charge, the bank had an absolute right to have the legal mortgage executed, and the order restraining the husband, the donor of the power, from creating rights in the property in any person other than the wife, in no way affected the rights of the bank.

SUMMONS for possession of the premises known as 38, Crownhill Road, Woodford Bridge, Essex, which were charged to the plaintiff, Barclays Bank, Ltd., by an equitable charge dated Feb. 10, 1947.

Plowman for the plaintiff bank.

P. E. Whitworth for the second defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy of the husband. C

J. L. Arnold for the third defendant, the wife.

The first defendant, the husband, did not appear.

HARMAN, J.: This summons raises once more the question of the position of the deserted wife in the matrimonial home, a matter much canvassed recently. It is now the law that there are circumstances in which a wife who has been deserted by her husband can assert the right or privilege of remaining in the matrimonial home. Had the matter been res integra I should have preferred to look on her as being in a position vis-à-vis her husband analogous to that of tenants, so-called, under the Rent Restrictions Acts who have no estate or interest in the land, but have, as LUSH, J., said in Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini (1) ([1924] 1 K.B. 686), a "status of irremovability". That status can be explained by the fact that a husband cannot sue his wife in tort as GODDARD, L.J., pointed out in Bramwell v. Bramwell (2) which lies at the foundation of these cases. The wife's right has recently been held by the Court of Appeal in Bendall v. McWhirter (3) to hold good as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the husband. That decision was reached on the footing that the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt subject to all the bankrupt's disabilities and liabilities. As the husband could not procure the wife's removal by action, but only by an application under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, so the trustee was in a similar, although, perhaps, a worse, position because he could not apply under that Act. It was said in the course of the judgment ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1311) that the wife has something in the nature of a licence to remain in the house. I do not think that was necessary to the decision, but there it is, and I cannot help thinking that the law is taking a dangerous path. It has since been held by JONES, J., in Ferris v. Weaven (4) that the wife's status of irremovability holds good as against a purchaser from a husband, but not a purchaser in good faith. In that case, the purchaser, knowing of the husband's difficulties and to help him terminate the wife's occupation, pretended to purchase the house for £30 in order that the husband might sell it to his advantage. It was not unnatural that the judge held that such a person could not be in a better position than the husband. I think the law has not yet gone beyond that point. D

In a recent decision, Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Oliver's Trustee (5), UPHOHN, J., decided that the wife's right or privilege did not hold good against a person having a legal mortgage created before the date when the desertion occurred. A much larger claim was there made for the wife, on whose behalf it was argued E that her rights, whatever they be, arise directly after she and her husband enter a house as their matrimonial home, but only, as it were, crystallise when desertion occurs. The learned judge rejected that submission as fantastic. It seems to me that any extension of this privilege of the wife may, in the end, prove detrimental to the public interest, because money will not be lent to men who have houses for fear they may have deserted or may thereafter desert their wives and so rob their creditors of their security. I should, of course, follow that decision of UPJOHN, J., but the case now before me differs from that which he decided.

In this case, on Feb. 10, 1947, the husband, the first defendant, while living with his wife, created an equitable charge on the matrimonial home in favour of the plaintiff, Barclays Bank. That is in familiar form and reads:

"I the undersigned Joseph William Bird of 38, Crownhill Road, Woodford Bridge, Essex, hereby declare that the title deeds and other documents have been delivered by me and deposited by me with you for securing to you the payment and discharge of all moneys and liabilities now or hereafter due from or incurred by me and/or Messrs. Jay Miller."

Messrs. Jay Miller was a firm in which the husband was interested. The charge contains an undertaking to pay on demand, and, by cl. 3, the husband, as beneficial owner, charges the property with the payment and discharge of all the moneys and liabilities due or to become due under the document. There is a covenant to execute and deliver effectually a legal and formal mortgage or registered charge on the said lands, buildings, and hereditaments in such form as the bank should elect. That is followed by cl. 8, which is an irrevocable appointment by the husband in these terms:

"I hereby irrevocably appoint such one of your local directors or managers for the time being at [blank] as you shall from time to time by writing under the hand of your chairman or deputy chairman or general manager or assistant general manager designate to be my attorney for me and in my name and on my behalf and as my act and deed or otherwise to sign, seal and deliver and otherwise perfect any such legal or formal mortgage or registered charge as aforesaid."

There is an undertaking that no one should be registered as proprietor to the detriment of the mortgagee. That charge was extended from time to time to cover further advances.

At the time when the equitable mortgage was made, the husband was living in the house as the matrimonial home with his wife, Hilda Kathleen Bird, the third defendant. It appears that in December, 1952, the husband deserted his wife, who has since continued to live in the house with two children. In January, 1953, the wife obtained a magistrates' order for her maintenance which must have been made on the footing that there had been matrimonial misconduct on the part of the husband, namely, desertion of his wife. On Mar. 11, 1953, the wife obtained an order made by the master in an action in the Queen's Bench Division under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by which it was ordered that the husband,

"until further order or other order varying this order be made by the court do permit his wife, Hilda Kathleen Bird and her two children, to reside in and occupy 38, Crownhill Road, Woodford Bridge, in the county of Essex, as the matrimonial home unless and until the said Joseph William Bird shall have first provided reasonably suitable alternative accommodation as a matrimonial home for his wife and children. And it is further ordered that without leave of the court [the husband] do take no steps by sale or assignment of any right title or interest which he now has in the said property or by any act whatsoever create any right title or interest in any other person to evict his wife and children or any of them from the matrimonial home or in any way interfere with their residence therein."

On Apr. 8, 1953, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against the husband and on Apr. 17 the bank demanded payment of the money due under its equitable charge. On May 6 the husband was adjudicated bankrupt and his trustee is the second defendant to this summons. On July 7 the bank, relying on cl. 8 of the equitable mortgage, appointed one Lavery to be the attorney of the husband to execute a legal mortgage. That document purports to be signed by the bank's assistant general manager in pursuance of the powers conferred by cl. 8 of the mortgage. On July 9 the attorney executed in the name of the husband a charge by way of legal mortgage of the property. It is signed by the husband, J. W. Bird, by his attorney, the person appointed under the document to which I have referred.

By the present summons, dated July 24, 1953, the bank demands possession of the property and no resistance to that demand is made either by the husband or his trustee; but the wife claims to be entitled in priority to the bank to possession of the property. The difference between this case and Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Oliver's Trustee (5) is merely this. At the date of desertion when the wife's rights, whatever they be, arose, the bank had no legal estate in the property, and, it is said that, that being so, as an equitable mortgagee the bank had no right to possession. Therefore, the bank's right to possession having arisen only on the execution of the legal mortgage, the wife's right to possession arose before that of the bank. It is also argued on behalf of the wife that the bank, by using the power of attorney and executing the legal mortgage on July 9 in the husband's name has, albeit unconsciously, flouted the master's order made under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which restrains the husband from creating any interest in priority to that of the wife. Therefore, it is said, the bank cannot have possession because of the wife's privilege or licence, or whatever it may be, which prevails over the rights of the bank.

In my judgment, there is no legal justification for that claim. The bank was, long before the wife's rights arose, in all respects an equitable mortgagee. It was entitled, therefore, as any other equitable mortgagee, to take out a summons for possession. It matters not from that point of view that it was only an equitable mortgagee. The only limitation on an equitable mortgagee in that respect is that he has no right to possession until the court gives it to him, and the equitable mortgagee could always apply to the court to foreclose and have a receiver appointed to receive the rents and profits. Indeed, the practice of the Court of Chancery, back to the time of LORD ELDON at least, was to allow the equitable mortgagee to have the rents and profits from the date of the petition and not merely from the date of the decree of foreclosure. I think that appears in Ex p. Bignold. Re Keer (6). I should add at this point that it is now no objection, as it was once said to be, to proceedings on originating summons by an equitable mortgagee that possession is asked for alone and not as part of the more elaborate relief of foreclosure. Therefore, the bank, having these rights as from the time when the document of Feb. 10, 1947, was executed, had an equity which, as it seems to me, must come before the equity, if one may so call it, of the wife. Qui prior est tempore, potior est jure. It is true that the bank had not the legal estate, but it had a right to create it in itself without any interference by the husband, who at the time the mortgage deed was executed had no estate, right, title, or interest in this property. If I were to hold that the wife's rights, though inchoate, existed at an earlier date, the situation might be different, but in that respect I follow the decision of UPPJOHN, J., in Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Oliver's Trustee (5).

As to the second point which was urged, viz., that the exercise of the rights under the power of attorney were, in some way, an infraction of the order under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, I cannot take that view. The bank had an absolute right to do what it did and an order made restraining the donor of the power of attorney from creating rights could not without notice affect the donee in any way. That is supported by Tingley v. Müller (7), where the point, as shortly stated in the headnote, was ([1917] 2 Ch. 144):

A "An irrevocable power of attorney to sell land and give receipts for the purchase-money is not avoided by the donor of the power subsequently becoming an alien enemy."

That case is only analogous to the present, but WARRINGTON, L.J., made a general observation (ibid., 165) which I find helpful:

B "Again, a recognized mode of dealing with land is through an attorney acting under a power of attorney. If such a power is made irrevocable, as is the case with that of May 20, 1915, then, in favour of a purchaser, not only can it not be revoked in the ordinary sense, but any act done by the donee within the limits of the authority conferred by the power will be as valid as if anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee had not been done."

C The learned judge there referred to the Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 9, which section has been repeated totidem verbis in the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 127. He continued (ibid.):

D "The attorney under such a power is not like an ordinary agent. As between him and a purchaser he is, so long as he does not exceed his authority, absolutely independent of the principal. He has no occasion to consult or confer with him, and he need pay no attention to any directions he may give. The attorney in fact, when dealing with a purchaser, is exclusively clothed with all the capacities of the principal in reference to the subject-matter."

Although he is talking there of the power of an attorney quoad a purchaser, it seems to me that those capacities are equally applicable to an attorney in a case such as the present. Consequently, it seems to me that the creation of the legal charge, which was merely a piece of machinery designed, no doubt, to enable the bank conveniently to make a title for sale, is not something which I should consider adversely as being an infraction of the order of the Queen's Bench Division. In fact I rest my decision on this: the equitable mortgagee is, under a document of this sort, in precisely as good a position as under a legal mortgage to ask the court for possession, and it makes no difference—and it is no valid distinction between Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. Oliver's Trustee (5) and this case—that the mortgage is equitable and not legal. It seems to me, therefore, that the mortgagee, as of right, should have an order for possession.

F It was suggested to me that, if that were so, it was a case in which a period longer than the usual interval should be given to enable the mortgagor to find other accommodation. I was referred to Vaughan v. Vaughan (8) on that point. That was a case where a husband was seeking possession of the matrimonial home which the wife occupied. This is a case of a mortgagee seeking possession of the mortgagor's property, and, therefore, considerations relevant in that case do not apply. If I were to depart from the usual order it would only be, in my judgment, a case of hard cases making bad law, and I do not propose in this instance to give way to my natural feelings of sympathy for the wife and children. I shall make the ordinary order which is that possession shall be given twenty-eight days after the service of the order.

Order accordingly.

SCOTT AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman and Danckwerts, JJ.), January 25, 1954.]

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Notice based on judgment debt—Reduction of judgment debt on appeal—Set off of costs—Validity of notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 2 (ii), s. 5 (2), (3).

On Mar. 17, 1953, the creditor obtained judgment in the Queen's Bench Division against the debtor for £200 and costs. On Apr. 16, 1953, a bankruptcy notice was issued against the debtor by the creditor for £200. The costs of the action not then having been taxed, they were not the subject of the notice. On Apr. 27, 1953, the debtor gave notice of appeal against the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division. After service of the bankruptcy notice, the debtor filed an affidavit in opposition, and on June 26, 1953, the registrar dismissed the debtor's opposition. The costs of the action in the Queen's Bench Division were taxed at £226, and on July 28, 1953, the petition was filed for the judgment debt of £200 and £226 costs. On Oct. 12, 1953, the Divisional Court dismissed the debtor's appeal from the registrar's order. On Oct. 22, 1953, the debtor's appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was heard, and the damages were reduced to £25, and, although the order for costs in the Queen's Bench Division was upheld, the debtor was awarded half the costs in the Court of Appeal with the right to set them off against the amount of the judgment debt and costs awarded against him. On the hearing of the petition, a receiving order was made. On appeal, Held: notwithstanding the right to set off costs awarded to the debtor by the Court of Appeal, there was at the date of the hearing of the petition a debt of £25 (which was a sufficient debt to avail as an act of bankruptcy) because the costs to be set off had not been quantified by taxation; furthermore, the right of set-off did not arise until the Court of Appeal gave judgment on Oct. 22, 1953, so that, on its issue on Apr. 16, 1953, the bankruptcy notice was good, and it remained good; and, therefore, there being no injustice to the debtor by the form of the notice, there was proof of an act of bankruptcy on the basis of which it was proper to make a receiving order.

AS TO AMOUNT AND NATURE OF PETITIONING CREDITOR'S DEBT, see HALSBURY, Simonds Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 292-300, paras. 551-570; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 4, pp. 113-126, Nos. 1025-1148.

APPEAL by the debtor against a receiving order dated Nov. 27, 1953, made by the registrar of the Brentford County Court.

Muir Hunter for the debtor.

Eife for the creditor.

HARMAN, J.: This case raises one or two novelties. The petition in bankruptcy was filed on July 28, 1953, and is based on a judgment for £200 pronounced by LYNSEY, J., on Mar. 17, 1953, in an action in the Queen's Bench Division brought against the debtor by the petitioning creditor. In the ordinary way that judgment carried the costs of the action to be taxed. The judge was willing to grant a stay only on the terms that £200, the whole of the damages, were paid into court. The debtor was either unwilling or unable to do that. The result was that execution could be levied on the debtor, and on Apr. 16, 1953, a bankruptcy notice was issued against the debtor for £200, the costs not then having been taxed and, therefore, not being the subject of the bankruptcy notice. On Apr. 27, 1953, the debtor gave notice of appeal against the Queen's Bench decision and evaded service of the bankruptcy notice, with the result that an order for substituted service was made by the registrar at Brentford on May 6, 1953. At the same time, the period for which the bankruptcy notice should run was extended to June 16.

A The bankruptcy notice having been served by post, the debtor filed an affidavit in opposition to it. That was eventually heard on June 8 when the registrar adjourned the hearing. Why he did so is a little obscure, but he restored the matter for hearing on June 22 and heard it on June 26 when he dismissed the debtor's opposition to the bankruptcy notice. There was an appeal against that to the Divisional Court on July 17 which was dismissed on Oct. 12, 1953. So one may take it that the matter of the validity of the bankruptcy notice at that time is now beyond cavil.

B The costs in the Queen's Bench action were taxed at £226. The allocatur for those was issued on July 16 and was in the manner customary in the Queen's Bench Division, added at the end of the order, there being no taxing master's certificate.

C On July 28 this petition was put on the file for the debt of £200 plus costs £226, making in all £426. That came on to be heard on Oct. 21, 1953, when it was adjourned pending the hearing of the appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, which in fact was heard on the next day, Oct. 22. The appeal was allowed and the order of LYNSKEY, J., was varied by reducing the judgment for damages from £200 to £25. The costs in the Queen's Bench action were left standing, but the debtor was given half the costs in the Court of Appeal and the right to set them off against what he owed on the judgment and costs below.

D As a result of that, the creditor's solicitors wrote a letter to the registrar, a practice which seems to me very much to be deprecated, saying that they wanted the petition restored and, as it were, arguing their case behind the debtor's back. That is not a practice which, I think, ought to be encouraged. However that may be, there was a re-hearing of the petition on Nov. 27, 1953, when a receiving order was made. Although the facts do not clearly appear either from the petition or from the affidavit sworn to verify it, it does not seem that there was any miscarriage of justice, either on that hearing or from the fact that this undesirable letter had been written. The registrar seems to have been in possession of the right facts. He simply took the view that, as the costs to be taxed in favour of the debtor when taxed would not reduce the total debt of the creditor below £50, there was a good petitioning creditor's debt and a receiving order ought to be made. Accordingly, he made a receiving order, and against that this appeal is brought.

F I think the main ground of appeal is this. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 5 (2), the court is bound to require proof of the act of bankruptcy, and it is said here that it could not be satisfied in that respect because, in the events which happened, there was no proof of an act of bankruptcy despite the fact that this court had declared the act of bankruptcy a good one and there has been no appeal against that. This bizarre result is arrived at in this way. It is said the act of bankruptcy alleged was respecting £200. The Court of Appeal reduced that to £25. £25 would be a sufficient debt to avail as an act of bankruptcy, but it is further said that the debtor has the right to set off against the debt, i.e., the £25, the right to costs which may amount to £60, and, therefore, having regard to the effect of the order of the Court of Appeal, there was no debt to support the act of bankruptcy, the condition of the statute was not complied with, and the court cannot make an order. Secondly, it is said that, if a creditor serves a bankruptcy notice on a man for a very large sum which he cannot pay and follows it up by a petition admitting that the sum is very much smaller, the debtor has suffered an injustice inasmuch as, though he could not have paid the larger amount, he might have paid the smaller one, and, therefore, the court, in the exercise of the discretion which s. 5 (3) confers on it, should come to the conclusion that there is "sufficient cause" why no order ought to be made.

In my judgment, neither of those points ought to prevail. I do not wish to canvass the larger contention of the creditor, which amounted to this, that if a sufficient act of bankruptcy was committed at the time when the notice expired it mattered not that there was no debt at all by the time the petition came on. That is a matter which can be decided when it comes necessarily into controversy.

It seems to me, however, that the true view is that there remained at the hearing of the petition in this case a debt of £25 and that was enough to support the bankruptcy notice. The right to set off the costs in the Court of Appeal is not a present right because those costs have not been quantified by taxation. Apart from that, it seems to me that the cross-claim created by the order of the Court of Appeal was not in existence before the date when the Court of Appeal made its order. It is not as if that were a matter which dated back as does in some senses the variation in the damages claimed. So that, in my judgment, the bankruptcy notice remained a good bankruptcy notice, notwithstanding that it was not for £25 for which it should have been made, but had been made for a larger sum.

Section 2 of the Act of 1914 provides:

"A bankruptcy notice . . . (ii) shall not be invalidated by reason only that the sum specified in the notice as the amount due exceeds the amount actually due . . .", unless certain other conditions are satisfied which do not arise here. I do not see that any such injustice was done by the form of the bankruptcy notice as would induce us to say that in the exercise of our discretion we ought to refuse the petition. The substance of the matter is that this debtor owes the creditor the costs and £25, subject to a cross-claim which admittedly will leave a very substantial balance in favour of the creditor. In those circumstances, neither justice nor equity demands that the usual consequences should not be visited on the debtor.

DANCKWERTS, J.: I agree. When, on Nov. 27, 1953, the petition came before the registrar for further hearing, it seems to me that the view which he took was an entirely sensible one on the information which was given to him as regards the cross-claim. It appears plain that, taking the cross-claim or set-off of the debtor at his highest figure of £100, at least £150 remained owing by the debtor to the petitioning creditor. It seems to me that either the debtor was in a position to pay that sum, or, if he was not in a position to do so or was unwilling to pay that sum, justice demanded that a receiving order should be made. The answer which is given seems to me to be an entirely technical one, and, if that answer be a technical one, the debtor cannot complain if it is defeated on technical grounds.

It is true that the judgment of LYNSKEY, J., for £200 damages was reduced by the Court of Appeal to £25, and, therefore, the bankruptcy notice when it was issued was demanding a sum which ultimately turned out to be larger than the proper sum. Presuming, therefore, that it is to be treated as stating too large a sum, and that the judgment of LYNSKEY, J., must be treated as if it ought to have been from the beginning one for £25, it seems to me that that amount was a valid subject for a bankruptcy notice. As to the argument that it would be wiped out by the amount of costs which were recoverable by the debtor under the order of the Court of Appeal, I agree that, at the date of the bankruptcy notice, that right of the debtor could not possibly be operative. It was a claim which did not and could not arise until the Court of Appeal dealt with the matter on Oct. 22, 1953. Therefore, there was at the date of the bankruptcy notice, if not a valid debt for £200, at any rate a valid debt enforceable by bankruptcy notice for £25. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the bankruptcy notice is validated by the second proviso to s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Consequently, there was a valid bankruptcy notice on which a petition could effectively be founded, and it seems to me, therefore, that the receiving order was properly made. Appeal dismissed.

BAMPTON v. COOK.

APPLICATION for security for costs of appeal.

In an action for damages for personal injuries by an infant by his next friend judgment was given for the defendant. HILBERY, J., ordered the plaintiff, who was an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, with a disposable income of £343 and whose contribution was assessed at £93 10s., to pay £30 towards the defendant's costs. On notice of appeal being given by the plaintiff, the defendant applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that the plaintiff give security for the costs of the appeal under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15 (2), which provides:

“The Court of Appeal may in special circumstances order that such security shall be given for the costs of the appeal as the court may direct.”

At the time of the hearing of the application, the plaintiff was not an assisted person for the purposes of the appeal, but it was clear from correspondence that legal aid would be granted.

R. I. S. Bax for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and M. J. Morris for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., said that counsel for the plaintiff had asked the court to follow the decision in Conway v. George Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1) and make no order for security. In that case the plaintiff was not an assisted person when the order was made. In the present case the plaintiff as an assisted person in the court below had been ordered to make a substantial contribution. That was, in his view, a “special circumstance” which took the present case out of the decision in Conway's case (1). Leading counsel for the defendant has drawn the court's attention to Murray v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Ltd. (2) in which the plaintiff had been ordered to make a maximum contribution of £95 towards the costs of the hearing in the court of first instance and had been an “assisted person” at the time of the application to the Court of Appeal for security for costs. The Court of Appeal had ordered security to the extent of £28 to be given by the plaintiff, and he (HIS LORDSHIP) and his brethren proposed to follow that decision and order in the present case that the plaintiff give security to the extent of £20. The order was intended to cover the plaintiff when she became an assisted person, whatever contribution she might be required to make towards the costs of the appeal.

BIRKETT and ROMER, L.JJ., agreed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Birkett, L.JJ., and Upjohn, J.), January 27, 1954.]

Contract—Illegality—Motor vehicle—Sale in unroadworthy condition—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 3 (1)—Road Traffic Act, 1934 (c. 50), s. 8 (1)—Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 2101), reg. 12 (1), reg. 20, reg. 44 (1), reg. 73.

The plaintiff sold the defendant a motor car of which the speed indicator, silencer, and braking system were defective. The defendant gave the plaintiff a cheque for the purchase price of the car, but, on discovering the unsatisfactory condition of the vehicle, he stopped the cheque. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the amount of the cheque,

Held: the defects in the car were not defects in construction to which Part II of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, made under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3, applied, but arose owing to a failure to maintain the vehicle in proper working order, to which Part III of the regulations, made under s. 30 of the Act of 1930, applied; since the defects did not fall within s. 3, it followed that the contract was not rendered unlawful by the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 8 (1); and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Decision of STREATFIELD, J. ([1953] 2 All E.R. 515), reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of STREATFIELD, J., dated June 29, 1953, and reported [1953] 2 All E.R. 515.

In February, 1952, the plaintiff bought for the purpose of re-sale a 1939-40 Morris eight horse-power motor car. The plaintiff advertised the car for sale, the defendant answered the advertisement, and on Feb. 27, the plaintiff, in accordance with a previous arrangement, took the car to the defendant's house. He indicated to the defendant such defects as he knew of, and then took the defendant for a short run in the car. The defendant decided that he would buy the car, a price of £310 was agreed, and the defendant made out a cheque for that amount and gave it to the plaintiff. The defendant then drove the plaintiff in the car about ten miles to the plaintiff's house, the plaintiff knowing that the defendant would then drive it back to his own house. While the defendant was inspecting the car on the following day, he found that the chassis was fractured and, consequently, stopped the cheque. He told the plaintiff of the defect and asked him to cancel the contract, but this the plaintiff was unwilling to do. The plaintiff twice presented the cheque for payment and on both occasions it was dishonoured.

In an action by the plaintiff for recovery of the amount of the cheque the defendant contended that (i) there was an implied warranty that the car was in a fit condition for use on the road and otherwise free from mechanical defects; (ii) there was an express term that the cheque had been delivered to the plaintiff as an escrow pending the defendant's proper examination of the car in daylight; and (iii) that the contract was tainted with illegality because the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant constituted a breach of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 8 (1). As to the first contention, STREATFIELD, J., found that there was no implied warranty of fitness as alleged, and, as to the second, that the cheque was delivered unconditionally. As to the third contention, the judge held that the condition of the vehicle in question was such that its use on the road in that condition would be unlawful under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3, since it failed to comply with the requirements of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, Part II, reg. 12, reg. 20 and reg. 44, and, therefore, that the sale was unlawful under s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934, the contract was tainted with illegality, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

- A Aldous and Elton for the plaintiff.
Gazdar for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The matter arises under s. 8 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1934, which reads:

- B "Subject to the provisions of this section it shall not be lawful to sell . . . a motor vehicle . . . in such a condition that the use thereof on a road in that condition would be lawful by virtue of the provisions of s. 3 of the [Road Traffic Act, 1930]."

Section 8 (4) is, in effect, a proviso, and it provides:

- C "A person shall not be convicted for an offence under this section in respect of the sale . . . of a motor vehicle . . . if he proves . . . that he had reasonable cause to believe that the vehicle . . . would not be used on a road in Great Britain, or would not be so used until it had been put into a condition in which it might lawfully be so used."

The learned judge considered that there was a breach of the section and held that the plaintiff could not rely on s. 8 (4). I agree with his decision as to s. 8 (4).

- D Section 8 (1), the material section, refers to s. 3 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, sub-s. (1) of which reads as follows:

"Subject as hereinafter provided, it shall not be lawful, to use on any road a motor vehicle . . . which does not comply with the regulations applicable to the class or description of vehicles to which the vehicle belongs, as to the construction, weight and equipment thereof . . ."

- E The other relevant provision is s. 30 (1) of the Act of 1930 which deals generally with regulations:

"The Minister may make regulations for any purpose for which regulations may be made under this Part of this Act, and for prescribing anything which may be prescribed under this Part of this Act, and generally as to the use of motor vehicles and trailers on roads, their construction and equipment and the conditions under which they may be so used and otherwise for the purpose of carrying this Part of this Act into effect, and in particular . . .",

- F and then various matters are specified. It will be seen that the power given there goes beyond the subject-matter of s. 3 of the Act of 1930 which deals with construction, weight and equipment.

- G The real question in this case is whether the defects, to which I will refer later, come under s. 3 or whether they are outside s. 3 but are breaches of regulations made under the wider power given by s. 30. There were three defects. First, the speedometer cable was broken. The plaintiff told the defendant of that and he also told him that he had another cable, but he had not had time to fit it. It was a defect easily remedied and the new cable was available and at hand. Secondly, the foot brake was defective, and that was a defect which, on the learned judge's finding—and this was common ground—could be remedied.
H Indeed, a sum was deducted from the original price in respect of those two matters. Thirdly, it was found, although the plaintiff did not realise this, that the silencer was not in proper working order. The learned judge dealt with those matters and set them out as breaches of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, which purport to deal with the subject-matter of s. 3, namely, construction and equipment. If that were right, and if they were defects which fell properly within s. 3, the conclusion would be that the sale was illegal, as, indeed, the learned judge held. It was argued before us that these defects were not within the subject-matter of s. 3. Very broadly, it was said that the car was properly constructed, the equipment was there, but that it was not in good working order and that is a matter which is outside s. 3. The fact that it is a matter which falls within the wider section (s. 30 (1)) does not, of course, affect the argument, but that is the background against which we have to deal with the matter.

The Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, Part II, is headed:

“Regulations governing the construction, weight and equipment of motor vehicles and trailers”, a heading which reproduces the wording of s. 3. Part III is headed:

“Regulations governing the use of motor vehicles and trailers”, a heading which indicates an obvious intention to use the wider power conferred by s. 30 of the Act of 1930. Although there may be difficult border-line cases, it is quite plain that the construction of a machine is one subject-matter and the maintenance of that construction in good working order is another subject-matter. Having read the judgment and the findings and having heard counsel's submissions, in my view, all these defects indicated a failure to keep and maintain in good working order. There is no suggestion in the judgment or in any argument put before us that the vehicle or the relevant parts had not been properly constructed. It was sought to say that there was a breach of what I will call the construction regulations because the silencer, speed indicator and foot brake did not work. As to the speed indicator, reg. 12 (1) [which is within Part II of the regulations] provides:

“To every motor vehicle registered on or after Oct. 1, 1937, and to every public service vehicle which is for the time being used as an express carriage there shall be fitted an instrument so constructed and in such a position as at all times readily to indicate to the driver of the vehicle within a margin of accuracy of plus or minus ten per cent. if and when he is driving at a speed

In my opinion, that deals with the fitting of the instrument. That is reinforced in considering this code as a whole by reg. 73 [which is within Part III of the regulations] which provides:

“Every instrument for indicating speed provided in compliance with the requirements of reg. 12 of these regulations shall (a) at all material times be maintained in good working order . . .”

I think it is plain that the offence here was under reg. 73 and not under reg. 12. Counsel for the defendant put to us various other regulations and posed problems which it is unnecessary to decide. He took the example of a driving mirror, and said that if the mirror were not in the car, there being no special maintenance provision with regard to mirrors, we must hold that there was a breach of the construction regulations. I do not propose to consider that. It seems to me quite sufficient that we should decide this case on the basis that these defects are outside s. 3. I would, however, add this. Counsel for the plaintiff, in opening the appeal, used words, which he does not seek to uphold now, which indicated that he was putting forward the view that s. 3 applied only to the original manufacture. I think that must be wrong. If there has been anything in the nature of a reconstruction, or anything which could be properly described as an alteration in construction, so far as I can see, s. 3 would apply. I only say that to indicate that in coming to my decision I have not based myself on any rigid principle that s. 3 applies only at the time of the original construction. I do not think it does. I think it has a wider application. That conclusion is, I think, borne out by Keeble v. Miller (1), although that case was dealing with a different section. For those reasons, holding that these defects are outside s. 3, it follows that the contract was not made illegal under s. 8 (1) and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am entirely of the same opinion. The important point with which we are concerned was put in this way. It was said this was an unlawful sale under s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934 which my Lord has read. That sub-section prohibited the sale of a motor car which offended against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 3 (1). The latter sub-section refers to the construction, weight and equipment. The regulations to which reference has been made, in Part II of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1951, refer to the construction, weight and equipment of motor vehicles and trailers, whereas Part III contains the regulations governing use. I observe that in his judgment, when dealing with the matters which were alleged in relation to the speedometer, the silencer and the braking system, the learned judge says ([1953] 2 All E.R. 517):

“The particulars pleaded, in which it is alleged that this motor car was illegally sold because it was unroadworthy, first of all refer to the speed indicator, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that in fact the speedometer was in breach of reg. 12 (1) . . . which is applicable to the speedometer.”

Similarly, with regard to the silencer, he said that it was admitted that that was in fact a breach of reg. 20. Thirdly, he said that it was admitted that the motor car was not equipped with an efficient braking system and that it was in breach of reg. 44 (1). Had there been breaches of those three regulations, one could understand why the provisions of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1934 and s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1930 were invoked. It does, however, seem a somewhat startling proposition that, if one sells a motor car in which the speedometer happens to be faulty or the silencer is not quite efficient or the braking system is not quite up to the mark, one has made an illegal sale. I think all three matters which were the subject of contest in the court below were not breaches of Part II of the regulations as the learned judge considered, but were breaches of the regulations in Part III dealing with use and maintenance.

UPJOHN, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

STUDHOLME v. SOUTH WESTERN GAS BOARD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), January 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 20, 1954.]

Gas—Nationalisation—Vesting of liability—Service agreement with gas company—Remuneration calculated on capital of company—Frustration of agreement as from vesting date—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 17 (3) (b).

Gas—Nationalisation—Financial provisions—Provision for compensation—Loan capital—Gas stock issued to area board—Money borrowed by Gas Council and lent to area board—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), s. 43 (1) (a), s. 44 (2) (a).

By an agreement dated June 7, 1938, the plaintiff was appointed solicitor to the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., and its subsidiaries, and for his work was to be paid a retaining fee at the rate of £400 (in 1947 increased to £600) per annum per £1,000,000 of issued share and loan capital of the corporation to the nearest £100,000, payable half-yearly or as otherwise arranged. On May 1, 1949, the vesting date under the Gas Act, 1948, the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., was vested in the defendants, together with six of the corporation's subsidiaries, the other subsidiaries being vested in three other area boards. The defendants did not avail themselves of the plaintiff's services, and, on Mar. 20, 1950, he was given written notice in accordance with the agreement of June 7, 1938, to expire on Mar. 31, 1951. He claimed from the defendants a balance which he alleged to be due under the agreement for his remuneration for the period Apr. 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1951.

HELD: although s. 17 (3) (a) of the Gas Act, 1948, enabled the defendants to be treated as a party to the agreement of June 7, 1938, under s. 17 (3) (b) of the Act the defendants were liable only "as respects anything falling to be done on or after the vesting date"; the thing falling to be done after the vesting date in the present case was the payment of the retaining fee as fixed by the agreement; that fee, however, was fixed in relation to the issued share and loan capital of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., and, as this basis of calculation had ceased to exist after the vesting date, the agreement was not possible of performance, even as modified under s. 17 (3); and, therefore, it became frustrated from and after the vesting date.

The defendants having admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to reasonable remuneration for the period May 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1951, there would be judgment for the plaintiff for an agreed amount.

Per curiam: the allocation (even if only provisional) under s. 44 (2) (a) of the Act of 1948 to the defendants by the Gas Council of ultimate responsibility for a proportion of the gas stock issued as compensation under the said Act constituted a debt due from the defendants to the Gas Council which was a funded debt with the character (having regard to s. 44 (2) (a)) of borrowed money, and which could, therefore, properly be described as loan capital; and, a fortiori, money borrowed by the issue of stock by the Gas Council under s. 43 (1) (a) of the Act for the purpose of exercising its powers under s. 42 and lent to the defendants constituted loan capital of the defendants.

FOR THE GAS ACT, 1948, s. 17 (3) (b), s. 43 and s. 44, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 880, 919, 920.

ACTION for balance of annual remuneration alleged to be due under an agreement in writing, and for damages for breach of agreement.

In 1934 the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., was formed as a holding company the object of which was to obtain control of gas undertakings by acquiring the majority holding of their shares or stock. The plaintiff, Richard Home Studholme, a solicitor, was employed by this company, and also by a second company, Gas Consolidation, Ltd., formed with the same objects shortly after his appointment to the first company, at a joint salary of £1,000 a year. He did legal work for both companies, and also a good deal of work on the administrative, technical and financial side. By an agreement in writing dated June 7, 1938, between the plaintiff and the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., the plaintiff was appointed solicitor to the corporation and its subsidiaries. He was to perform the general parliamentary, legal and administrative work for the corporation, and was to be given the refusal of the parliamentary and legal work of the subsidiaries, charging his fees for the work done to the subsidiary concerned. He was to be paid a general retaining fee calculated at £400 per annum per £1,000,000 on the issued share and loan capital of the corporation to the nearest £100,000 at the end of each financial year, plus travelling expenses, payable half-yearly or as otherwise arranged, and for other work not covered by the retaining fee he was to be paid at rates not exceeding normal professional rates. These arrangements came into force on Apr. 1, 1938, and, unless otherwise agreed, were to be subject to twelve months' notice by either side, expiring on any Mar. 31. An agreement on similar lines was also come to between the plaintiff and Gas Consolidation, Ltd. In 1939 the plaintiff, who was a member of the Territorial Army, was called up for service in the forces where he remained until 1945, when he was invalided out with a spinal injury. He returned to the employment of both companies, and, on Mar. 5, 1946, became a director of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. On July 1, 1947, his retaining fee for the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., was increased to £600 per annum per £1,000,000 of issued share capital and loan capital. On July 31, 1948, the Gas Act, 1948, was passed, and the vesting date under that Act was May 1, 1949. For the three years prior to the vesting date, the plaintiff's remuneration averaged £2,065 3s. 6d. a year, paid in part by the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., and in part by its twenty-six subsidiaries. On the vesting date, by virtue of the Act of 1948, the Gas (Vesting Date) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 392), and the Gas (Allocation of Undertakings to Area Boards and Gas Council) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 742), the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. was dissolved and was vested in the defendant gas board, as were six of the subsidiary companies, the other twenty subsidiaries being vested in three other area boards. The defendants did not avail themselves of the plaintiff's services after the vesting date, and sought to give him notice. He insisted on notice in accordance with the agreement of June 7, 1938, and the defendants then gave notice on Mar. 20, 1950, to expire on Mar. 31, 1951. The plaintiff claimed the balance of his annual remuneration from Apr. 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1951, due under the agreement of June 7, 1938.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 20. LYNSKEY, J., read the following judgment. This is a claim for the balance alleged to be due to the plaintiff for his remuneration for the period from Apr. 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1951. The agreement for service under which the claim is made was one between the plaintiff and the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. As a result of the provisions of the Gas Act, 1948, the plaintiff says that his agreement with the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., became vested in the defendants, the South Western Gas Board, on May 1, 1949, and thereafter this agreement must be construed as if made with the South Western Gas Board and not with the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., and any reference, however worded and whether express or implied, to the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., in the agreement must be read as if the name of the South Western Gas Board were substituted in that agreement for the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. As a result, the plaintiff says he is entitled to remuneration by way of retaining fee from the South Western Gas Board as from May 1, 1949, of approximately £10,000 a year as against the remuneration by way of retainer to which he was entitled from the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. of £754 8s. 11d. per year.

The first question I have to consider is what is the true construction of the Gas Act, 1948, and, in particular, of s. 17 of that Act, and whether it produces the somewhat remarkable result which the plaintiff contends that it has. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] Section 17 of the Gas Act, 1948, is the section on which the plaintiff relies as the basis of his claim. Sub-section (1) reads:

“Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, all property, rights, liabilities and obligations which, immediately before such date as may be appointed by order of the Minister (in this Act referred to as ‘the vesting date’), were property, rights, liabilities and obligations of an undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies, shall on the vesting date vest by virtue of this Act and without further assurance in such area board as may be determined by order of the Minister.”

That sub-section on the vesting date vested in the defendants “all property, rights, liabilities and obligations” of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. as they existed immediately prior to the vesting date. Sub-section (3) provides:

“Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, every agreement to which any undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies was a party immediately before the vesting date, whether in writing or not, and whether or not of such a nature that rights, liabilities and obligations thereunder could be assigned by the undertaker, shall, unless its terms or subject-matter make it impossible that it should have effect as modified in manner provided by this sub-section, have effect as from the vesting date as if— (a) the appropriate board had been a party to the agreement; (b) for any reference (however worded and whether express or implied) to the undertaker there were substituted, as respects anything falling to be done on or after the vesting date, a reference to the appropriate board . . . (e) in the case of an agreement for the rendering of personal services to the undertaker, the services to which the agreement relates were, on and after the vesting date, any services under the appropriate board, to be selected by that board, which are reasonably equivalent services; and (f) save as provided by the three last preceding paragraphs, for any reference (however worded and whether express or implied) to the undertaking of the undertaker or any part of that undertaking or to the limits of supply of the undertaker or any part thereof there were substituted, as respects anything falling to be done on or after the vesting date, a reference to so much of the business carried on by the appropriate board as corresponds to the undertaking or part of the undertaking of the undertaker or, as the case may be, a reference to the area comprised in the said limits immediately before the vesting date or part thereof.”

Sub-section (4):

“Every agreement, whether in writing or not, and every document (not being an agreement or a document to which the last preceding sub-section applies or an enactment) which refers whether specifically or generally to any such undertaker shall be construed in accordance with the provisions of the last preceding sub-section, so far as applicable.”

There are certain exceptions which are dealt with in sub-s. (6). Sub-section (9):

“Subject to the next following section, every undertaker to whom this Part of this Act applies, being a body corporate, shall be dissolved on the vesting date.”

The agreement which I am considering is an agreement for rendering personal services. If it had not been for the provisions of s. 17 (3), it would be impossible of performance (Nokes v. Doncaster Amalgamated Collieries, Ltd. (1) ([1940] 3 All E.R. 554)), as the contract was only to render personal services to the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. By the provisions of s. 17 (9), that corporation, being a body corporate, was dissolved on the vesting date. The question I have to consider is whether, assuming the contract is modified as provided by sub-s. (3), it would still be possible of performance. So far as the plaintiff's services are concerned, sub-s. (3) (e) enables the board to substitute for the contractual services reasonably equivalent services selected by the board, and, although the services may be varied under para. (e) of sub-s. (3), there is no express power given by the section (or, indeed, any part of the Act) to vary the remuneration for those services. The scheme of the whole section appears to be that persons contracting with the undertakers shall retain the rights they had as against the undertakers with the substitution of the board as the party liable. It is said, however, on behalf of the plaintiff that, as his retaining fee was to be calculated at £600 per annum per million on issued share and loan capital at the end of each financial year, the section requires that "the issued share and loan capital of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd." must be read as "the issued share and loan capital of the South Western Gas Board" which, according to the statement of claim, means substituting £16,713,032 for £1,382,971 as the figure on which the £600 per million per annum has to be calculated. I feel sure that this result was never envisaged by those who drafted or passed the Act.

The defendants did not avail themselves of the plaintiff's services. They sought to give him notice shortly after the vesting date, but he insisted on notice in accordance with the terms of his agreement to expire on Mar. 31, 1951. The notice was given on Mar. 20, 1950, to expire on Mar. 31, 1951. The defendants, or those representing them, appear to have thought the agreement was binding on them, but there is no plea of estoppel and no point was made as to this before me.

It seems to me that the real issue in this case is: What is the proper construction of s. 17 (3) (b)? Section 17 (3) (a) enables the board to be treated as a party to the agreement, but para. (b) sets out the extent to which the board, as from the vesting date, is to become liable under the agreement. Paragraph (b) does not provide that for any reference in the agreement to the undertaker there shall be substituted a reference to the appropriate board. The words are limited. The substitution is only to be made

"as respects anything falling to be done on or after the vesting date."

The words "falling to be done" mean falling to be done under the agreement, but by the board, in substitution for the undertaker. What falls to be done by the board here is to pay the plaintiff the retaining fee fixed by the agreement. That fee was fixed in relation to the issued share and loan capital of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. The issued share and loan capital was the yardstick by which the basis of the retaining fee was fixed. There is nothing in the agreement which called on the undertaker to issue shares or acquire loan capital. The agreement was made on the basis that shares had been issued and might vary from time to time, but there was no obligation on the undertaker to issue such shares in the future or acquire such loan capital. In fact, the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. had no loan capital. The issue of shares or the creation of loan capital was not something falling to be done under the agreement with the undertakers, and para. (b), therefore, in my view, does not operate to substitute a reference to the board's issued share and loan capital at the end of each financial year for that of the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd.

As, by the Gas Act, 1948, the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. was dissolved on May 1, 1949, there was thereafter no issued share or loan capital existing at the end of each of the succeeding financial years and nothing, therefore, on which the plaintiff's retaining fees could be calculated. The obligation of the area gas board to pay the retaining fee assessed in accordance with cl. 2 of the plaintiff's agreement became impossible of performance. Under para. 3 of his agreement, the plaintiff was to be given the refusal of the legal and parliamentary work of the subsidiary companies and was to charge his professional fees for such work to the party concerned, that is, in the proper case, to the subsidiary company. At the date of the vesting order there were some twenty-six of these subsidiaries and twenty of these had been allocated to other area boards. It might have been possible for the area board under s. 17 (3) (e) to direct the performance by the plaintiff of reasonably equivalent services, but they had no power to remunerate him under the terms of his agreement for such services in place of the services he would previously have rendered the subsidiary companies. The result was that this part of the plaintiff's agreement also became impossible of performance by the board. A basic part of any agreement for the rendering of personal service is the remuneration the employer is to pay under the agreement for such service. Applying the modifications provided for in s. 17 (3) as I understand them, the board would not be able to pay the retaining fee called for under cl. 2 of the plaintiff's agreement as the basis on which it was calculated had ceased to exist after the vesting date. They would not have been able to procure the giving of the offer to the plaintiff of the work of some twenty of the subsidiary companies or procure payment by such companies for such work, as those companies had ceased to exist on the vesting date and their property, rights and obligations vested in other area boards.

In my view, therefore, the agreement between the plaintiff and the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd. by its terms and subject-matter, even when modified as set out in s. 17 (3), made it impossible that it should have effect. Although the agreement between the plaintiff and the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., may have vested in the defendants, as it was not possible of performance even as modified under s. 17 (3) the agreement became frustrated as from the vesting date.

By their defence, the defendants, whilst denying that the plaintiff is entitled to any remuneration under or by virtue of his agreement with the Severn Valley Gas Corporation, Ltd., admit that he is entitled to reasonable remuneration for the period from May 1, 1949, to Mar. 31, 1951, and they admit that the reasonable remuneration for such period would be £3,958 5s. 1d., and, after taking credit for £635 19s. 9d. already paid to the plaintiff, admit that there is due and owing to the plaintiff the sum of £3,322 5s. 4d. In view of this admission, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for this sum against the defendants.

This is enough to dispose of this case, but, in view of the arguments addressed to me by counsel for both parties, I propose to deal with the further question debated, although, of course, it can have no effect on the result which I have already indicated. If I am wrong in the view I have taken of the construction of s. 17 and the plaintiff is entitled to have his retaining fee calculated on the basis of the issued share and loan capital of the board, the question then arises what was the issued share and loan capital of the board on Mar. 31, 1950, and Mar. 31, 1951—if, indeed, there was any such capital. It is common ground that there was no issue of share capital by the area board. The plaintiff, however, contends that the amount of gas stock for which the ultimate responsibility for meeting the obligations in respect of such stock is allocated to the area board under a scheme under s. 44 of the Gas Act, 1948, is capital loan of this area board. I was referred to the Finance Act, 1899, s. 8, as to what is a capital loan for the purposes of the Finance Acts, and "loan capital" there means, inter alia, any funded debt, by whatever name known, and any capital raised by any corporation, company or body of persons which is borrowed, or has the character of borrowed money. The Finance Act, 1946, s. 52, exempts from the stamp duty imposed by the Finance Act, 1899, s. 8, documents connected with nationalisation schemes and loan capital issued to raise money required to be paid as consideration for the transfer to the nationalised body of an undertaking. But for this exemption it would seem that money so raised would have attracted this duty as loan capital.

A The scheme of the Gas Act, 1948, is to create a Gas Council as a body corporate and twelve area gas boards, each again being a body corporate. The Gas Council, by s. 43, is to issue stock to be known as British gas stock. It is empowered to issue such stock for the purpose of exercising its powers under s. 42, and required to create and issue such stock for the purpose of satisfying any right to compensation which, under the Act, is expressly required to be satisfied by the issue of stock. By s. 25 of the Act every holder of securities of any undertaker, not being an undertaker to which s. 18 of the Act applies, shall be entitled to be compensated by the issue to him by the gas council of British gas stock. The British Gas Council become responsible to the stockholder for the redemption of the stock and payment of the interest on it, and the stockholders are given no rights directly against the area gas boards. On the other hand, by s. 17 (1) all property, rights, liabilities and obligations of the undertakers vest in such area board as the Minister may determine. Under s. 44 (2) (a), however, a scheme is to be settled by the Gas Council and the Minister to determine the shares in which the ultimate responsibility for meeting the obligations in respect of the issue of stock is to be borne, and the scheme must provide (a) for allocating to the area boards ultimate responsibility for any stock issued for the purpose of satisfying rights to compensation, having regard to the extent to which the assets in respect of which the compensation is payable vest by virtue of the Act, or are subsequently transferred to the respective boards. By s. 44 (3):

E "Each area board shall, at such times as may be directed by the Gas Council, pay to the council—(a) such sums as may be necessary to enable the council to make any payments, or to refund to themselves any payments made, in respect of interest on or the redemption of British gas stock, including payments into a sinking fund, so far as the payments are attributable to stock for which the area board are ultimately responsible under this section; and (b) such contributions towards the expenses incurred by the Gas Council in issuing any British gas stock and in managing that stock as bear to the total expenses so incurred the same proportion as the amount of the stock in respect of which the area board are ultimately responsible under this section bears to the total amount of the stock. Any sums paid by an area board under this sub-section to enable the Gas Council to make payments in respect of interest on British gas stock shall be deemed to be annual payments, and any sums so paid to enable the council to make payments in respect of the redemption of such stock shall be deemed to be capital payments."

G Section 45 provides for a Treasury guarantee and the Gas Council are the body responsible for meeting any liability incurred by the Treasury in implementing the guarantee. By s. 46 a central guarantee fund is to be created, and by sub-s. (1) of that section the Gas Council's solicitors shall maintain

H "... a fund, which shall be known as the central guarantee fund, for the following purposes—(a) in the event of any area board or the Gas Council being unable temporarily to discharge their obligations in respect of the payment of interest on, or the redemption or repayment of, any British gas stock or any temporary loan, or in respect of any payment by way of compensation to a local authority, for enabling those payments to be made out of the fund; (b) for repaying to the Treasury any payments made by them for the purposes of fulfilling any guarantee given by them under the last preceding section; and the moneys in the central guarantee fund shall be applied by the Gas Council for those purposes only."

No scheme was settled by the council and the Minister under s. 44 until July 31, 1952, but the council had made provisional allocations of stock for such purposes to the South Western Gas Board on Mar. 31, 1950, of £11,376,595, and on Mar. 31, 1951, of £12,714,188 in respect of compensation stock. There was no direct obligation of the area boards to the stockholders. The obligation imposed by the statute on the area boards is to be the ultimate responsibility of the Gas Council for the payment of interest on and the redemption of that gas stock. The payments are to be made under that obligation at such times as may be directed by the Gas Council, who are given complete control as to rate of interest and amounts of repayments made under the Act, namely, the Gas (Stock) Regulations, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 751). The British gas stock issued by the Gas Council consisted of British gas three per cent. guaranteed 1990-95 and British gas three and a half per cent. guaranteed stock 1969-71. This stock, as far as the Gas Council is concerned, was clearly a funded loan. The question I have to decide is whether the area board's ultimate responsibility to the Gas Council for meeting obligations of the stock, the responsibility for which was allocated to the area board, can properly be described as loan capital as being a funded debt or capital raised which is borrowed or has the character of borrowed money.

I have come to the conclusion, although I must say with considerable reluctance, on the facts of this case, that the statutory debt owed by the area board to the Gas Council is a funded debt, and, having regard to the provisions of s. 44 (2) (a), the credit obtained has the character of borrowed money. Payments required to be made by the area board to the Gas Council to enable the council to make payments for the redemption of the gas stock are, by s. 44 (3), deemed to be capital payments. If the ultimate responsibility had been allocated by the Gas Council and the Minister under the scheme on Mar. 31, 1950-51, that responsibility would be a funded debt and loan capital of the area board. The fact that only a provisional allocation had been made at those dates would not, in my view, prevent the credit thereby obtained being loan capital. Those entitled to such compensation by way of gas stock were entitled to such compensation at the vesting date or at the conversion date and the area board's obligation when the final allocation is made dates back to the vesting date.

In addition to issuing the gas stock required for compensation, the Gas Council, under s. 43 (1) (a), may create and issue any stock required for the purpose of exercising their powers under s. 42. Section 42 reads:

"(1) Each area board and the Gas Council may, with the consent of the Minister and with the approval of the Treasury or in accordance with the terms of any general authority issued by the Minister with the approval of the Treasury, borrow temporarily, by way of overdraft or otherwise, such sums as the board or council, as the case may be, may require for meeting their obligations or discharging their functions under this Act. (2) The Gas Council may, with the consent of the Minister and the approval of the Treasury, borrow money by the issue of British gas stock, for all or any of the following purposes, that is to say—(a) the redemption of any British gas stock; (b) the provision of money for meeting any expenditure incurred by any area board or by the Gas Council in connection with any works the cost of which is properly chargeable to capital account; (c) the provision of any working capital required by any area board or by the Gas Council; (d) the provision of money required for the payment of compensation by area boards under this Act, except payments to local authorities in respect of loans and advances; (e) any other purpose for which capital moneys are properly applicable by any area board or the Gas Council, including the repayment of any money temporarily borrowed under the last preceding sub-section for any of the purposes mentioned in this sub-section; and (f) any other payment which any area board or the Gas Council are authorised to make and which ought in the opinion of the Gas Council to be spread over a term of years. (3) The aggregate of the amounts outstanding in respect of the principal of any stock issued by the Gas Council, otherwise than for the purpose of paying compensation under Part II of this Act whether in stock or in cash, and in respect of any temporary loans raised by the Gas Council or any area board, shall not at any time exceed the sum of £250,000,000: Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the Gas Council from borrowing in excess of the said sum for the purpose of redeeming any British gas stock which they are required or entitled to redeem, or of repaying any money temporarily borrowed under sub-s. (1) of this section. (4) Save as aforesaid, neither an area board nor the Gas Council shall borrow any money."

It is quite clear that the powers given by s. 43 for the issue of gas stock for exercising the Gas Council's powers under s. 42 constitute powers to borrow money. It is not stock raised for the purpose of compensation, but stock issued for the purpose of borrowing money from stockholders, to be applied for the purposes set out in s. 42. In this case the Gas Council borrowed money on issued gas stock, and the money was actually lent to the defendant gas board, and, whatever view may be taken of the allocation of responsibility for compensation gas stock, it seems to me reasonably clear that stock issued for borrowing money and the loan of that money to the area board for what obviously are mostly capital purposes, in any event which called for a funded debt, must be treated as loan capital. According to the reports, the defendant board received £3,500,000 from the gas council under s. 42 of the Act, and that, in my view, whatever may be said about the rights or wrongs of my decision with regard to the compensation stock, must clearly be loan capital.

The ultimate result is that there will be judgment for the plaintiff for the admitted amount set out in the earlier part of my judgment.

ISAACS v. TITUS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 26, 1954.]

Rent Restriction—Shared accommodation—Kitchen shared by two tenants—Premises vacated by one tenant—Right of landlord to possession as against remaining tenant—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 8 (1) (b).

The tenant rented one room together with a kitchen the use whereof she shared with another person who had later vacated his premises. The landlord did not resume occupation of the premises thus vacated, but he claimed possession of the room and kitchen, contending that the right to share the kitchen had reverted to him, that s. 8 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, no longer applied, and that he was thus entitled to possession.

HELD: where a tenant shared accommodation with a person other than the landlord and that person vacated the premises, the landlord did not automatically step into the shoes of that person so that the tenant now shared the accommodation with the landlord, and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to possession.

FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1949, s. 8 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 1103.

Case referred to:

(1) Lockwood v. Lowe, post, p. 472.

APPEAL by the tenant from a decision of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, Q.C., at Brighton County Court, dated Oct. 29, 1953.

By his particulars of claim, dated Sept. 30, 1953, the landlord claimed against the tenant possession of the front room and kitchen on the first floor of the landlord's property known as No. 12, Norfolk Square, Brighton, and stated, inter alia:

"2. By the terms of the said tenancy the [tenant] shares the said kitchen with the tenant or occupier of the other room or rooms situate on the said first floor."

By amended particulars of claim, dated Oct. 26, 1953, the landlord added:

"3. The tenant with whom the [tenant] has heretofore shared the said kitchen has vacated the premises and the right of sharing the said kitchen has accordingly reverted to the [landlord]."

By his defence the tenant relied on the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 8 (1). The facts were not in dispute and in the note of his judgment, the county court judge said:

"This is a very doubtful point, but in the events which have happened the landlord and no one else at present has any right to share the kitchen with the [tenant], and so I feel constrained to hold that s. 8 of the Act of 1949 does not protect the defendant."

Accordingly, the judge made an order for possession in one month and the tenant appealed.

P. P. Elman for the tenant.

The landlord did not appear.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: Section 8 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, is as follows:

"Where—(a) a tenant has the exclusive occupation of any accommodation (in this section referred to as 'the separate accommodation'), (b) the terms as between the tenant and his landlord on which he holds the separate accommodation include the use of other accommodation (in this section referred to as 'the shared accommodation') in common with another person or other persons, not being or including the landlord, and (c) by reason only of the circumstances mentioned in para. (b) of this sub-section, the separate accommodation would not apart from this section be a dwelling-house to which the [Rent Restrictions] Acts apply, the separate accommodation shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply, and the following provisions of this section shall have effect."

That provision altered the law as it had previously been laid down, namely, that where there was sharing, whether with the landlord or anyone else, of accommodation of the kind indicated, there was no letting as a separate dwelling, and so no protection for the tenant. Section 8 (6) provides:

"While the tenant is in possession of the separate accommodation by virtue either of the contract of tenancy or of the provisions of the [Rent Restrictions] Acts, any term or condition of the contract of tenancy terminating or modifying, or providing for the termination or modification of, his right to the use of any of the shared accommodation which is living accommodation shall be of no effect . . ."

Sub-s. (8) gives to the court a right, on the application of the landlord, to modify the sharing provision.

Had the learned county court judge had the advantage of having cited to him Lockwood v. Lowe (1), he would not have felt constrained to hold, as he did, that the tenant has lost the protection of the Act. In that, as in the present, case, there had originally been a letting to two persons of separate accommodation, each having the right to share with the other an essential part of the habitation of each, namely, the kitchen and scullery and the bathroom, and one of the two had gone and left his part of the premises vacant. The majority of the court (DENNING and MORRIS, L.JJ.), in deciding the case in favour of the remaining tenant, came to the conclusion that, on the facts as found by the county court judge, the terms of the original letting remained as they had previously been, notwithstanding the departure of one of the two original tenants, that is to say, they were of opinion that the right of the remaining tenant was, as it always had been, a right to the exclusive occupation of certain of the accommodation, plus a right to share with the other tenant and with no one else. ROMER, L.J., who was the third member of the court, based his conclusion rather on this, that, as Bartholomew had gone, the practical effect was that Lowe had an exclusive right, on the facts as found, not only to the original accommodation, but also to that which he had formerly had to share with Bartholomew. But all three judges indicated that, unless there was by mutual consent some modification or alteration of the contract, or the making of a new contract, it could not be said that because one of the two tenants had gone, the landlord had, so to speak, automatically stepped into the shoes of the old tenant so as to produce the result, as a matter of law, that the tenant who formerly had the right to share with another tenant was now in the position of having a right to share with the landlord. ROMER, L.J., drew attention to the point that, according to the amended and added para. 3 in the particulars of claim in the present case, it was alleged by the landlord that, because of the departure of the other tenant, the right of sharing the kitchen "has accordingly reverted to the [landlord]". By the particulars of defence the tenant relied on the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, generally as a defence, but did not in terms challenge that statement. I construe the statement in para. 3 merely as an allegation that because the former tenant has gone, therefore, that tenant's former estate in the premises has, no doubt, come to an end, and in that sense the landlord is entitled to possession of the room which the previous tenant formerly occupied. But it does not follow, as I think, that the remaining tenant's terms of tenancy have automatically undergone some change. We are told by counsel for the tenant, no doubt accurately, that it is not in any case the fact that the landlord is himself in occupation, and is himself sharing with the tenant the accommodation which the tenant formerly shared with the other tenant. In those circumstances, I cannot conclude that para. 3 in the particulars of claim, which is not challenged, serves to distinguish the present case on these facts from Lockwood v. Lowe (1). On the contrary, as I have already indicated, the present case is, in my judgment, necessarily on its facts governed by the decision of this court in Lockwood v. Lowe (1), and that, had Lockwood v. Lowe (1) been cited to the learned judge, I have little doubt that his opinion would also have been to that effect. I, therefore, think that the appeal must be allowed and the order for possession set aside.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

LOCKWOOD v. LOWE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Denning, Morris and Romer, L.JJ.), March 17, 31, 1953.]

Rent Restriction—Shared accommodation—Kitchen shared by two tenants—Premises vacated by one tenant—Right of landlord to possession as against remaining tenant—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 8 (1) (b).

In 1941 the landlord let her house to the tenant and one B., each occupying a separate part of the house with the shared right of user of the kitchen and bathroom. The tenant and B. each had a separate tenancy, to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and a separate rent book. In June, 1950, B. left the premises and the landlord sought possession of the premises from the tenant on the ground that, since he no longer shared the kitchen with another tenant, he was not protected by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 8 (1) (b).

HELD: although the tenant no longer shared the kitchen because there was no other tenant with whom to share it, until the court made an order under s. 8 (8) of the Act of 1949 permitting the landlord herself to enter into occupation and share the kitchen, the terms of the contract of tenancy remained the same and the tenant was still protected by s. 8 (1) (b).

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE REGINALD CLARK, Q.C., at Ilford County Court dated Dec. 16, 1952, dismissing the landlord's action for possession of the premises known as 170, Pembroke Road, Ilford.

R. H. W. Dunn for the landlord.

The tenant appeared in person.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 31. The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: In 1941 the landlord let her house, 170, Pembroke Road, to the tenant, Lowe, and one Bartholomew, who were brothers-in-law. Each family had a part of the house separately, but they shared the scullery (which was used as a kitchen) and the bathroom. Each had a separate tenancy and a separate rent book. In June, 1950, Bartholomew moved out, and the landlord now seeks an order to evict the tenant because she (the landlord) wants to sell the house with vacant possession. The judge has found that the tenancy of the tenant is one for exclusive occupation of the upstairs rooms with the shared right of user with Bartholomew of the scullery-kitchen and bathroom.

It is clear that before Bartholomew left the house both he and the tenant were protected by the Rent Acts. The terms on which each of them held included the use of the kitchen in common with the other. Each, therefore, came within s. 8 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. When Bartholomew went out the tenant, of course, no longer used the kitchen in common with him. He used it alone because there was no one else with whom to share it. But does that mean that the tenant was no longer protected by the Act? I think he was still protected. His contract of tenancy remained unaltered and the terms on which he held remained the same. The only difference was that there was no occasion for him to share the kitchen.

A It was argued that it was open to the landlord to go into that part of the house Bartholomew had occupied, to share the kitchen with the tenant, and then to say that he (the tenant) was not protected save to the limited extent given by s. 7 of the Act of 1949, in short, that he could be evicted. Why, it was asked, should the landlord be put to the trouble of going into occupation to achieve this result? Why should she not reap the advantage of s. 7 at once? The answer to this argument is, I think, that the landlord was not at liberty to go into the house herself and share it with the tenant unless she first obtained an order of the court enabling her to do so. The tenant agreed to take his part of the house on the terms that he shared the kitchen with Bartholomew, and not with anyone else. On the wording of the contract, the landlord could not go in herself, nor could she put anyone else in to share it with the tenant. But the Act of 1949 has provided for some modification of the contract. Section 8 (8) gives the court power to modify the terms so as to enable the landlord to put someone else into the house in place of Bartholomew with the right to share the kitchen just as Bartholomew had done. Incidentally, I find it difficult to understand the proviso to that sub-section, but I am inclined to think that its principal object is to see that, on any change of occupants, the hours during which the tenant can use the shared accommodation are not diminished or altered to his disadvantage. At any rate, the proviso should not be so construed as to nullify the operative part of the sub-section. If the court, under s. 8 (8), can make an order to vary the persons in occupation of the house, as I think it can, it means that the landlord, by applying to the court, can put someone into the house to share with the tenant. The new tenant will presumably be someone other than the landlord. It is possible that the court might modify the terms so as to permit the landlord himself to go in and share the house, but it would hesitate to do so when the result would be to deprive the tenant of the protection of s. 8 (1). At any rate, the court has as yet made no such order, and until it does so the terms on which the tenant holds are that he shares the kitchen with someone other than his landlord. He is, therefore, protected by s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1949. The appeal should be dismissed.

D MORRIS, L.J. (read by DENNING, L.J.): The learned judge has held as a determination of fact that the tenancy was one for the exclusive occupation by the tenant of the upstairs rooms with the shared right of user with Bartholomew of the scullery and bathroom. It is conceded that until Bartholomew left in 1950 the tenant's tenancy could have been protected as a result of s. 8 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. No event has since taken place in reference to the house save that a notice to quit was served on the tenant in October, 1952. But I cannot see that any change has taken place in the terms on which the tenant held. There has been no new agreement or modification of the prior agreement, and, save by mutual consent, there could be no alteration of the provisions of the tenant's contract of tenancy which form the terms and conditions of his statutory tenancy. As, however, the agreement between the tenant and the landlord was marked by a singular economy of express provisions there is, undoubtedly, room for certain implied provisions. The contingency of the departure of Bartholomew, for any one of a variety of possible reasons, was not provided for. Terms are not lightly to be implied in a contract, and certainly will not be implied merely because they might be considered by a court to be reasonable. Terms will only be implied which the court can say must have been of ready mutual acceptance by the parties. It is unnecessary on this appeal to decide what, if any, terms can be implied for, in my view, it is at least clear that the tenant would not have agreed to a term which gave to the landlord a right, in the event of Bartholomew's departure, to enter the vacated part in such a way as to deprive the tenant of the security of tenure which otherwise he would enjoy. No term to that effect ought to be imported into the terms on which the tenant holds. In my judgment, this appeal fails.

G ROMER, L.J.: The issue which was argued in this case before the learned judge and before us was whether the tenant is entitled to the protection afforded by s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1949. I have come to the conclusion that on the whole he does not qualify for protection under that particular statutory provision, but that he can claim security of tenure, at all events for the present, for another reason.

H So far as s. 8 (1) is concerned, the tenant would have to establish that at the date of the commencement of the proceedings (i) he had the exclusive occupation of separate accommodation at the premises in question, and (ii) that the terms as between himself and the landlord on which he held the separate accommodation included the use of other accommodation in the house in common with another person or other persons, not being or including, the landlord. No difficulty arises as to the separate accommodation, for the tenant had such accommodation from the time when he first went to live in the house in 1940, and he still had it on Oct. 31, 1952, when these proceedings were started. As to the shared accommodation, the first step must be to ascertain what, in this regard, were the original terms of tenancy. The judge held "that what the landlord let to the tenant was a part of the house to be agreed on between the tenant and Bartholomew, together with a right to use the scullery for cooking purposes in common with Bartholomew. I accept the tenant's evidence that he occupied the upstairs rooms, and I, therefore, hold that his tenancy was one for the exclusive occupation of those rooms with the shared right of user with Bartholomew of the scullery and bathroom."

Bartholomew left the house in June, 1950, and has not since returned. What, then, was the position which arose on his departure, and what was it at the date of the commencement of these proceedings?

The original arrangements between the landlord, the tenant, and Bartholomew, as disclosed by the evidence, seem to have been of a loose and somewhat indefinite character, and I should imagine that no thought was given, and certainly no intention was proved, as to what was to happen if and when either the tenant or Bartholomew, with their respective wives, were to leave the house for the purpose of living somewhere else. That contingency was left in nubibus. I cannot think, nor, in my judgment, did the learned judge intend to hold, that the common intention of landlord and tenant was that the tenant's right to share with Bartholomew was to continue during the lifetime of the latter regardless of where he might have been living. The corollary of the tenant's right to share the scullery with Bartholomew was necessarily, as I think, that Bartholomew had a right to share it with the tenant. And if Bartholomew left the house, as he did, in order to live elsewhere, his right to use the scullery in common with the tenant would cease, if only for the reason that he would have no right to enter the house at all. Accordingly, it is implicit in the contract as found by the judge, I think, that the tenant's right to share the scullery with Bartholomew was to last only for so long as Bartholomew was there himself. If it were possible to say that after Bartholomew's departure, or on Oct. 31, 1952, or now, it was or is a term of the tenant's tenancy that he had or has a right to use the scullery in common with Bartholomew, it would be equally possible to say so, I suppose, in ten or twenty years' time (provided that the tenant is still living in the house), even though by then Bartholomew may have gone to live in America or may, indeed, be no longer alive. Accordingly, I come to the conclusion that whoever else (if anyone) may be regarded as "another person or other persons" for the purposes of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1949, when these proceedings were started, Bartholomew is not one of them.

It is, however, clear, I think, that the tenant's contractual right to use the kitchen did not automatically cease altogether when Bartholomew left the premises. The contrary view would impute to the parties an intention so capricious and improbable that I should only accept it if there were clear evidence to support it, which there is not. Further, if, in fact, there was a term to that effect in the tenant's contract, it would appear to be of no effect by reason of s. 8 (6). Accordingly, it follows, in my opinion, that, as at the date of these proceedings the tenant still possessed the right to use the scullery, such right was either an exclusive right or one which he shared with someone else. The only other person, I think, who could be said at the relevant date to have a right of user in common with the tenant was the landlord herself. There was no reason that I can see why the landlord should not have re-occupied Bartholomew's accommodation when Bartholomew went out. She did not, however, do so, nor has she done so since, and, in my opinion, the mere fact that the landlord had the ordinary rights as such to take possession of property which belongs to her does not justify the view that she should be regarded as being entitled to use the kitchen in common with the tenant. Moreover, it certainly was not, nor has it ever been, a term of the tenant's tenancy of his separate accommodation that he should share the right of using the kitchen in common with the landlord. Such a term, as I have previously indicated, would involve the existence of a correlative right in the landlord as the other sharing party, and this right was not one to which the tenant ever agreed. It is not possible to suggest anyone other than Bartholomew or the landlord herself as a person with whom the tenant had the right to use the kitchen when these proceedings commenced, and as, in my opinion, neither of these persons can fairly be regarded as being such a person it must follow that no such person existed at all.

The result would seem to be that on Oct. 31, 1952, the tenant's right to use the kitchen was, in effect, and still is, an exclusive right. If, however, the landlord were herself to re-occupy the separate accommodation in which the Bartholomews lived, a different position would, or might, arise, as to which I would prefer not to express any concluded opinion. It may be also that the county court judge could entertain an application by the landlord under s. 8 (8) of the Act of 1949, but I do not desire to indicate any view, either on this point or on what the position would be if the court, on any such application, made an order modifying the tenant's right to use the scullery in the manner authorised by the sub-section. It is sufficient for the purposes of this appeal to say that, in my opinion, the tenant's separate accommodation, the bathroom and the scullery together, constituted a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply; that the landlord made out no case entitling her to possession of the premises so constituted; and that this appeal must, accordingly, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

A MARSDEN v. REGAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 27, 28, 29, 1954.]

Executor and Administrator—Liability—Personal liability—Relief—Legal advice followed—Insolvent estate—Business continued to be carried on by executor—Ejectment proceedings resisted—Unsuccessful claim for new lease—Trustee Act, 1925 (c. 19), s. 61—Judgment for rent obtained by landlord in county court—Presumption of devastavit—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 32, r. 2 (1).

The testatrix was the tenant of premises where she lived on the first floor and carried on the business of an old clothes dealer on the ground floor. By her will she appointed the defendant to be her executrix and trustee and bequeathed to her "the business at" the premises. On June 15, 1951, she died. Her estate was virtually insolvent, and the defendant, as executrix, carried on the business in order to raise funds. Shortly after the death of the testatrix the plaintiff purchased the reversion of the premises, and commenced proceedings for possession and mesne profits against the defendant as personal representative. The defendant, who acted throughout on the advice of a reputable firm of solicitors, resisted the claim for possession, but she did not plead plene administravit or insufficient assets. On Feb. 13, 1952, the plaintiff obtained judgment for possession and mesne profits amounting to £29 15s. and costs which were later taxed at £21 18s. In November, 1952, a claim by the defendant for a new lease under s. 5, or compensation under s. 4, of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was dismissed. In March, 1953, the plaintiff levied execution on the judgment he had obtained, but there was a return of nulla bona testatoris on execution. The defendant delivered up possession on May 9, 1953. The plaintiff now claimed from the defendant personally the judgment debt of £29 15s. with £21 18s. costs and a further £55 5s. mesne profits for the period from the first judgment till possession was given, on the ground that the defendant had received assets amounting to at least £200 which she had wasted in legal proceedings and in carrying on the business when it was not profitable. The defendant pleaded, inter alia, plene administravit, and at the hearing she produced trading accounts showing that for the year ending June 21, 1952, the business made a net profit of £175 8s. 1d., but that from that date to Feb. 9, 1953, it made a net loss of £11 7s. 8d. She also produced her account as executrix showing that she had paid all the creditors of the estate except the plaintiff. The plaintiff relied on the presumption of devastavit which arose from the facts that in the proceedings resulting in the judgment of Feb. 13, 1952, the defendant must be taken to have conclusively admitted assets in her hands sufficient to pay all debts then known to her and that the sheriff returned nulla bona to the warrant of execution. The defendant submitted that that presumption was not available having regard to Ord. 32, r. 2 (1), of the County Court Rules, 1936, and contended that there was no waste, but that, if there was waste committed by her, relief should be granted under s. 61 of the Trustee Act, 1925.

HELD: (i) a rebuttable presumption that the defendant had wasted assets flowed from the judgment of Feb. 13, 1952, but this presumption covered only the debt of £29 15s. and not the costs which had not at that date been taxed or, therefore, ascertained.

Observations of FARWELL, J., in Batchelar v. Evans ([1939] 3 All E.R. 609), applied.

(ii) Order 32, r. 2 (1), of the County Court Rules, 1936, was not intended to, and did not, abrogate the presumption of devastavit, and was only directed as a matter of procedure to a case where the plaintiff had to prove that the personal representative had assets at the relevant date and had wasted the same, whereas in the present case the plaintiff relied on the fact that the defendant was estopped from denying that she had assets.

(iii) as to the claim for £55 5s. for mesne profits arising after the judgment of Feb. 13, 1952, there was no presumption and the plaintiff must allege and prove both that the defendant had had assets and had wasted them.

(iv) assuming that the defendant had committed a devastavit with regard to the £29 15s. and the £55 5s., the question whether or not she should be granted relief under s. 61 of the Trustee Act, 1925, was essentially a matter within the discretion of the county court judge, and, as there was no misdirection, his judgment would not be disturbed.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: A trustee seeking relief under s. 61 must show that he has acted honestly and reasonably and that he ought fairly (i.e., in fairness to himself and the other persons affected) to be excused. The mere fact that he has acted throughout on a solicitor's advice will not automatically result in relief being given.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE ARCHIBALD, at Huddersfield County Court, made on Nov. 17, 1953, whereby he dismissed the plaintiff's action for devastavit.

The testatrix, Jane Marsden, lived on the first floor and carried on a second-hand clothes business on the ground floor at 13 Northgate, Huddersfield, and her daughter, Mrs. Martha Annie Regan, the defendant, lived next door. By her will, dated Oct. 7, 1947, the testatrix appointed the defendant to be her executrix and stated:

"I give and bequeath unto [the defendant] the business at 13 Northgate."

The testatrix died on June 15, 1951, and the defendant, as executrix, took possession of those premises and carried on the business. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff, Joe Marsden, the son of the testatrix and brother of the defendant, acquired the reversion to the premises and instituted proceedings against the defendant as executrix for possession thereof and mesne profits. In July, 1951, the defendant applied under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5, for a new lease of the premises on the ground that the business which the testatrix had carried on had caused goodwill to adhere to the premises, and, alternatively, for compensation under s. 4 of the Act. In December, 1951, the defendant obtained a grant of probate, valuing the estate at £150 for goodwill, £50 for stock in trade, and £50 for miscellaneous items including £20 for furniture. The debts, consisting of funeral and testamentary expenses, amounted to not less than £78 at the date of the death of the testatrix.

The defendant resisted the claim for possession. She admitted her representative capacity, but she raised no plea of a total or partial administration of assets or insufficient assets, and on Feb. 13, 1952, at the Huddersfield County Court judgment was obtained against her for (i) possession, (ii) £29 15s. mesne profits from June 11, 1951, to the date of judgment, and (iii) costs. The order thereupon drawn up was for judgment against the defendant personally and not as executrix. The defendant was granted a stay of execution and entered an appeal, which was, however, later abandoned. In November, 1952, the referee made his report as a result of which the defendant's application under the A Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was dismissed. On Feb. 11, 1953, the plaintiff was granted leave to issue execution. On Mar. 11, 1953, the plaintiff's costs were taxed and allowed at £21 18s. On Mar. 20, 1953, the plaintiff issued a warrant of execution in respect of the sums of £29 15s. and £21 18s., and on Mar. 27, 1953, the sheriff made a return of nulla bona testatoris. On May 9, 1953, the defendant vacated the premises.

B In the present proceedings, by particulars of claim dated Aug. 4, 1953, and amended on Sept. 25, 1953, the plaintiff pleaded, inter alia:

"7. The defendant has received assets upwards of £200 and has wasted the same, (a) By serving notice of appeal against the judgment [dated Feb. 13, 1952], which appeal was subsequently abandoned by the defendant. The appeal, if successful, would have benefited the defendant personally and not the estate of [the testatrix]. (b) By making application under the C Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, for a new lease of the . . . premises. (c) By converting the same to her own use, and thereby the plaintiff has been unable to obtain satisfaction of his . . . judgment. 8. The plaintiff did not obtain possession of the . . . premises until May 9, 1953. During such period the D defendant carried on the business formerly carried on at the . . . premises by the . . . testatrix, and made a profit therefrom of at least £175 which the defendant has retained for her own use. The mesne profits for the period from Feb. 13, 1952, to May 9, 1953, amount to £55 5s. And the plaintiff E claims: (i) payment of the sum of £29 15s. [being the mesne profits from June 11, 1951 to Feb. 13, 1952] by the . . . defendant personally, (ii) payment of the taxed costs amounting to £21 18s. by the . . . defendant personally, (iii) an order for the payment of mesne profits for the period from Feb. 13, 1952, to May 9, 1953, amounting to £55 5s. by the . . . defendant personally, (iv) costs against the defendant personally."

By her defence the defendant denied the allegations in the particulars of claim and pleaded, inter alia:

F "7. The defendant will plead plene administravit with regard to the estate of the . . . [testatrix]."

At the hearing in the county court the defendant produced (i) her trading accounts which showed that the business as carried on by her had made a net profit of £175 8s. 1d. for the year ending June 21, 1952, but a net loss of £11 7s. 8d. for the period June 21, 1952, to Feb. 9, 1953, and (ii) accounts which showed G that, taking into account the business profit, there was a deficiency, after payment of the funeral and testamentary expenses and of the legal expenses in connection with the action for possession and the application under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The county court judge found that the defendant had at all times been legally advised and that she should be protected and should not have to make up the deficiency out of her own pocket. He, accordingly, H entered judgment for her with costs, and the plaintiff appealed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: The present proceedings are brought, not against the defendant personally, but against her in her capacity as executrix of the testatrix, the mother of the plaintiff and of the defendant. The plaintiff claims an order against the defendant personally for three sums, namely, £29 15s. mesne profits, £21 18s costs, and £55 5s. mesne profits. In my judgment, different considerations apply to each.

As regards the subject-matter of the previous judgment, the law is, in my judgment, clearly stated by FARWELL, J., in Batchelar v. Evans (1). There is no question (and counsel has not argued to the contrary) that the effect of the judgment of Feb. 13, 1952, which was obtained by the plaintiff in the absence of a plea of no assets or plene administravit, together with the return on Mar. 27, 1953, by the sheriff to the warrant of execution of nulla bona testatoris, is, first, that the defendant must be taken to have conclusively admitted assets in her hands at the date of the judgment sufficient to pay all debts then known to her, and, secondly, that there is against the defendant in respect of the sums in question a rebuttable presumption that, not now having (as she pleads) any assets, she has committed devastavit. After referring to older authorities, including Leonard v. Simpson (2), in which the matter was fully dealt with (2 Bing. N.C. 179) by TINDAL, C.J., FARWELL, J., says ([1939] 3 All E.R. 609):

"In my judgment, it is clear from that case that, in the view of TINDAL, C.J., the sheriff's return of nulla bona is not conclusive against the defendants, but it is open to the defendants, if they can, to show why, at the date of the return of nulla bona, the assets, admittedly in their hands at the date of judgment, are no longer in their hands and to show that that is not due to any devastavit committed by them."

It is clear, however, in my view, that the admission and the presumption which inevitably flow from the judgment obtained on Feb. 13, 1952, does not cover the sum of £21 18s. in respect of costs. Counsel for the plaintiff drew our attention to Re Marvin (3) in which a judgment had been obtained under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for a sum of £5,000 and £7 for costs. In that case, as counsel for the plaintiff observed, the discussion went on the basis that there was a single judgment for both the sum claimed and costs, which, by some means that is not at all clear, had arrived at the net figure of £4,519. But, having drawn our attention to the case, counsel, I think, was not disposed to contend that it was authority for the view that the admission and the presumption could relate to the costs of the proceedings which had not been taxed, and, therefore, had not become due or even ascertained at the date when the judgment was obtained. I, therefore, take the view that the sum of £21 18s. for costs is for present purposes out of the picture. In saying that, I am not indicating that the plaintiff is unable to recover it. So far as I can see, if he claims against the defendant personally for those costs which the defendant has personally been ordered to pay, there would be no answer to the claim, and counsel for the defendant conceded as much.

A point was taken by counsel for the defendant to the effect that having regard to the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 32, r. 2 (1), it is not competent in a county court proceeding (for to such length I understand this point goes) for a plaintiff to rely on the general law, and, in particular, on the presumption which results from a judgment such as was obtained on Feb. 13, 1952. The terms of Ord. 32, r. 2 (1), are:

"Where a plaintiff alleges that an executor or administrator has had assets and has wasted them, he shall make the allegation in his particulars [of claim] and state the amount of assets alleged to have been left by the deceased and the manner in which they have been wasted."

So far as the plaintiff's particulars of claim in the present action are concerned, they do make particular allegations which, as counsel for the defendant concedes, would meet the requirements of that sub-rule. For para. 7 alleges: "The defendant has received assets upwards of £200 and has wasted the same" in three particular ways which are thereafter stated. Accepting the correctness of the pleading, counsel says that the plaintiff can only rely on such a plea

A and cannot set up the admission and presumption that I have mentioned, although the preceding six paragraphs of the particulars of claim clearly plead the facts necessary to found an argument based on the admission and presumption. I must say that I am unable to accept the argument of counsel for the defendant on this point, or to accept the view that the rule-making body under the County Courts Act, 1934, either intended or had power by rules, which were directed to forms of procedure, to alter and, indeed, to abrogate in the county court part of the general law. To my mind, the sub-rule is directed, not to a case like the present, but only to a case where the plaintiff has to, and does, allege that an executor has had assets at the relevant date. In the present case, as regards the sum of £29 15s., the plaintiff has not so sought to allege or prove, for as I have already indicated the defendant is estopped from denying that she had assets, and the plaintiff relies on that.

B So far, however, as the claim for £55 5s. is concerned, it is plain that the plaintiff must not only allege and prove assets—they having been denied by the defendant—but also must allege and prove devastavit. Paragraph 7 of the particulars of claim which I have mentioned is particularly directed to that aspect of the case. Therefore, a separate question arises involving our determination whether the plaintiff can establish, as I think he can, not only the existence of assets but also the devastavit. Assuming that those facts are established, the position will then be that the defendant is presumed to have wasted to the extent of the £29 15s., and is found to have wasted to the extent of the £55 5s. There would still, however, remain the plea under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61, namely, that in all the circumstances the defendant ought to be excused. It is convenient at this stage to say that the learned judge came to the conclusion (and I will return in due course to his judgment) that the defendant ought in the circumstances to be excused, and so he dismissed the present action.

C Let me now return to the first part of the claim, which relates to the £29 15s. For the first question is: Has the presumption to which the form of the first judgment (of Feb. 13 1952) has given rise been rebutted? Counsel for the defendant says that it has, because the defendant has shown that the most substantial asset of all, namely, the goodwill valued at £150, was lost, not through any waste or neglect on the part of the defendant, but because the plaintiff successfully claimed an order for possession of the premises and that automatically destroyed the goodwill. Although, it is argued, the asset has been lost, it has not been lost through any neglect on the part of the defendant, who, indeed, over a period of time, by defending proceedings, appealing against the order, and applying under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, did all that lay in her power to preserve the asset. Counsel for the defendant says that, if that premise is right, the conclusion follows that it is not open to the defendant to give evidence inconsistent with the admission which is conclusively made, but she can give evidence consistent with it, and she can, therefore, plead that one of the assets which she had was the goodwill, and, if she can show that that asset, valued at £150, has not been wasted, then, whatever may be the facts about other assets (as to which there is no evidence), she has discharged the onus on her and rebutted the presumption. I am not satisfied that counsel for the defendant makes good that point. I am not satisfied that the whole goodwill was so closely and intimately bound up with the premises that the mere loss of the premises alone destroyed the goodwill. In other words, I think that to discharge this burden on her, the defendant would have to show that some attempt was made by her to preserve this goodwill other than by trying to retain the premises. As she herself lived next door, it would appear obvious that she might have tried to translate, and thereby preserve, the business and the goodwill to those premises. I am not, therefore, prepared to hold that the presumption to which the order has given rise is in this respect rebutted.

Prima facie, therefore, in the result the defendant is liable for the sum of £29 15s., but, as I have already said, not for £21 18s. costs.

It is now convenient to deal with the claim for £55 5s. The evidence before the court includes certain accounts. They were subjected to some criticism in that they were not properly vouched, but they appear to show that up to June 21, 1952, the defendant's conduct of this business was not unsuccessful since she made in actual fact a net profit of some £175. But I draw attention to the fact that June 21, 1952, though a convenient date for the purpose of accounting, has no other particular significance. The defendant went on conducting the business until February, 1953, and during the second period (i.e., from June 22, 1952, to Feb. 9, 1953), according to the accounts, the business was less successful and she made a small net loss. The third sheet before us shows that the sum made out of this business went, by and large, in paying the costs of the solicitor who advised the defendant. The costs of the earlier proceedings, including the costs in respect of acting for obtaining probate, amounted to £163 15s. 9d. The defendant also paid various items in connection with the business—remuneration to employees, and telephone and advertising accounts—and counsel for the plaintiff alluded to the item of travelling expenses which over the period amounted to £28 1s. 6d. In truth—though, as counsel for the plaintiff said, this is a matter for consideration under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61—the conduct of the business enabled the defendant to pay everyone, and she did pay everyone, with the notable exception of the plaintiff. He alone was left unpaid for.

The first question is: Is the defendant, having throughout acted on advice and carried on the business for most of the time successfully, to be found to have committed a devastavit? That, I think, is by no means clearly established. I have already indicated that this matter must be judged, not as at January, 1954, and on the material before us in the Court of Appeal, but by the situation in which the defendant found herself as executrix of the testatrix, her own mother, whose estate, when she first took over its administration, was insolvent. Counsel for the plaintiff has said that, although, no doubt, she would, or, at any rate, might, be justified in carrying on the business for some time, she ought to have paused to consider whether or not the game, if I may use the phrase, was really worth the candle, and, had she so paused, she would, or might, have concluded, before a decision was forced on her by possession being given, that the business could not and should not be further carried on, and that, in so far, therefore, as she went on conducting the business beyond the time when it was profitable and fruitful to do so, she committed a devastavit. As ROMER, L.J., has observed, I think that is, in all the circumstances, a harsh view to take of the defendant's conduct. For myself, therefore, I am not satisfied on this question, though it is not necessary for me to express a final conclusion, for, even if the defendant did commit a devastavit, the question still remains: Ought she to be relieved under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61? I say at once that, on the whole and bearing in mind that, if I had been trying this case, I am not saying that I should have wholly relieved the defendant, still I am not satisfied that, in a matter which is essentially within the learned judge's discretion, it would be right that we should interfere with his conclusion.

Let me assume that the plaintiff has established a devastavit sufficient to entitle him to judgment for £55 5s. He would then be entitled, on the presumption which the defendant has failed to rebut, to £29 15s., and on the facts which he has proved to £55 5s. But s. 61 is available in both cases, and I think that it is impossible to distinguish between the two, for, if the defendant ought to be relieved at all, she ought to be relieved in respect of the whole period. I can see no basis on which we could relieve her in respect of the £29 15s., and not the £55 5s. or vice versa, though I can see, as I have said, that if I had been trying the case I might have held that she ought to be not wholly, but partly, relieved in respect of both items. But before I discuss, briefly, why I think we ought not to disturb the learned judge's conclusion, I must first point out that as to £22 it seems to me there is no answer to the plaintiff's claim. It is clear that the defendant proceeded to give away furniture which was comprehended in the miscellaneous items valued for probate, and, further, that before she gave it away she improved or embellished some bedding by spending £2 of the estate money on it for that purpose. So far as the value is concerned, there is no evidence except that the defendant herself stated the sum of £20 for the purpose of obtaining probate, and since there can be no possible defence against a charge of devastavit by an executor who admits having given the furniture away, I do not think she can be heard to say that it was of less value than that which she herself swore it had for the purpose of probate. The result is that as to £22, the plaintiff must be entitled to recover. Counsel for the plaintiff has not suggested that in the circumstances he could claim the £29 15s. on the basis of the presumption that has not been rebutted, and the £22 in addition—in other words, that the defendant would be entitled to say that the £22 went towards the £29 15s. which would leave a sum of £7 15s. to be considered in reference to s. 61 on the first part of the case. But I do not think those arithmetical calculations much matter. The broad and single question is: Ought the defendant to be relieved, or ought this court to interfere with the judge's order relieving her as regards the balance of the sums of £29 15s. and £55 5s. after allowing for the £22 for which the defendant is, undoubtedly, liable?

In approaching this matter, counsel for the plaintiff rightly drew attention to the threefold obligation on an executor or trustee seeking relief, namely, that he must show that he himself acted honestly and reasonably, and he must further satisfy the court that he ought "fairly" to be excused, which I take to mean, in fairness to the executor and to other people who may be affected. Counsel for the plaintiff made some suggestion (and I hope he will forgive me if I say that I regret it) that the defendant had not acted honestly. There was no such suggestion or finding in the court below which could possibly justify such an inference, and no question, therefore, can possibly be raised in this court that the defendant acted otherwise than perfectly honestly. But it is said that she did not act reasonably, and in any case ought not fairly to be excused. It was to the last requirement that the most formidable part of counsel for the plaintiff's argument, I think, was directed. For he showed that, in effect, the defendant used the business for the purpose of paying everybody except the plaintiff, whose premises she had occupied throughout for the very purpose of carrying on the business. But, first, counsel contended that it was not sufficient to say, as the defendant said: "I acted throughout on a solicitor's advice". That, he says, was a mere abdication of her duty as executrix; and however wise the solicitor, and however natural it is to seek a solicitor's advice, nevertheless that of itself cannot suffice. The mere fact that you take a solicitor's advice, natural and prudent though such a course be, will not automatically result in relief being given. With that last contention I do not disagree. But the learned judge, as I gather from the short note of his judgment which we have before us, did not proceed on any such general view. As I apprehend, he had his attention drawn to the circumstances that there was, to start with at least, the serious problem of who was entitled to what property, and, in particular, what was the beneficial interest in the premises apart from the business, and that, having regard to the financial state of affairs, it was obviously desirable in everyone's interest, if the business could produce some sort of return, that the defendant should try to preserve it. And she is not in any worse position because, when the will eventually was proved, it turns out that she herself was beneficially entitled.

Sitting in this court, it is our unhappy lot sometimes to come across cases in which nothing is more deplorable than the fact that a person inexperienced in matters in which they are involved fail to take advice from solicitors, who could clearly have given advice and have protected them from the consequences of their rash conduct. I think that one must pay some regard to the kind of station in life of the people here concerned, the character of the business, and the difficulties with which they were confronted, including the unfortunate fratricidal strife. If this court were to say that the defendant ought to have taken some further advice by way of going to counsel or applying to the judge, I think it would shock the common sense of many people and certainly be a most disturbing factor when other persons in like situation found themselves in the position of being personal representatives of their deceased relatives. I, therefore, acquit the learned judge entirely of forming the view that merely taking advice, without more, is necessarily a passport to relief, but I think with him that, in all the circumstances of the present case and bearing in mind the grave difficulties with which the defendant was confronted, it was reasonable for her, having taken the advice and paying regard to the advice which was given, to act on it as she did.

There still remains the question: Ought she fairly to be excused? That is the most difficult point of all, and I have said that, if I had been trying this case, I am not convinced that I should have wholly excused her. But this is essentially a matter within the discretion of the judge, and although the judgment is short I am not prepared to say that the learned judge failed to consider any of the points before him, though he may well not have had the advantage of having them so forcibly put to him as counsel for the plaintiff put them to us. But having had all the material facts before him, I think it would be wrong for this court to assume that in some way he had misdirected himself or left out something which he should have taken into account. Therefore, I think that we ought not to disturb his conclusion. So, assuming against the defendant that she committed devastavit as to the £55 5s. and holding that she must be presumed to have committed it as to the £29 15s., still, I think she is entitled to retain her judgment save, as I have already indicated, to the extent that she must be accountable for the £22. That matter seems to have been omitted from consideration in the court below. It is not referred to in the judgment, and I think must have eluded the memory or observation of the learned judge when he came to deliver his judgment. I conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff should have recovered judgment for £22, but no more, and that, accordingly, the appeal must be allowed, but so only as to enable judgment for that sum to be substituted.

DENNING, L.J.: This case ought to have been simple, but the lawyers have made it complicated. The plaintiff seeks to recover the rent or the mesne profits from the defendant. I think that in the circumstances he could have sued her personally and said: "You have carried on this business, and, even though you did carry it on as executrix, you ought to pay rent". But he did not bring proceedings against her personally. Instead, he sued her as the executrix and obtained judgment against her for a portion of the rent, £29 15s. and for costs taxed and allowed at £21 18s. As executrix, the defendant, if she had had proper grounds, could have pleaded that she had used up all the assets, or that she had no assets with which to pay the debt. She did not plead either, and judgment went against her. The effect of that judgment is not in doubt, namely, that it is an admission in law that she had assets with which to pay this debt of £29 15s. for rent.

The first question that arises for determination in the present case is whether or not the defendant can rebut the presumption which the law raises against her. As to £22 she clearly has not rebutted the presumption, because she gave away furniture and some bedding of the testatrix, and in respect of that sum she clearly has no answer to this claim. As to the remainder, she says that she has not wasted the assets because she spent the money on the litigation. She appealed to the Court of Appeal from the judgment against her for possession. The appeal was abandoned, but a bill of costs was run up with the solicitor on that account which she paid. It is said by the plaintiff that that was a devastavit, in other words, that she had wasted the assets.

I am by no means sure that it was a devastavit because she was carrying on that litigation for the benefit of the estate generally, but, in any event, I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., that it is a matter in which, having taken and acted on legal advice, she ought fairly to be excused under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61. I was much impressed by counsel's argument on behalf of the plaintiff.

A He asked pertinently why should she pay every other creditor and not the landlord? Why should she pay her solicitor in full? Why should she leave only the landlord unpaid? I think there is a lot to be said for that view. But, on the other hand, this matter of relief is essentially one for the judge in his discretion. He hears the matter, and, he having come to his decision on it, I do not think that this court should interfere. For these reasons, although the defendant

B has no defence as to the £22 in respect of which she has wasted the assets, I feel that we cannot refuse to give relief against her in respect of the remainder, and I, therefore, agree with the order that my Lord proposes.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I am not satisfied that there was a devastavit in respect of the £55 5s., and I share the doubt on that matter which my brethren

C have expressed. It seems to me that the plaintiff, seeking as he has done to sue the defendant, not in her personal capacity, but in her capacity as executrix, has to prove that she wasted assets of the estate which would otherwise have been available for payment of debts, and that the plaintiff has in respect of that sum no such presumption to support him as he had in relation to the £29 15s. The suggestion made on behalf of the plaintiff was that the defendant really

D looked more to the beneficiaries in continuing this business than to the creditors, and that that was wrong. But, as has already been pointed out, this estate was not solvent. The defendant had to obtain money for the probate and the testamentary expenses which would be incurred in winding-up the estate, and she had not sufficient money for those purposes, so, for my part, I think that she was well justified in continuing to carry on this business for the purposes of

E raising some money—which, indeed, she did successfully, because the first year's accounts showed a profit of £175, from which it follows that she increased the assets of the estate to that extent, and thus raised funds which could be applied for the purpose of paying off the debts. Apart from that, she was placed in further difficulties. She was advised that her brother (the plaintiff) and sisters would have an interest in the lease of the premises on which the business was

F carried on, and she had to look after them. That, of course, is no answer to the suggestion that I have mentioned, that she ought to have first met the claims of the creditors. But she acted in accordance with the advice given to her by her solicitor, and I cannot see that she did anything wrong, except, perhaps, in carrying on the business for a longer period than she should have done. It was suggested by counsel for the plaintiff, with some force, that at all events

G she ought to have discontinued the business when she found in November, 1952, that she was not going to make a profit, but we do not know that in fact she did know this or what further loss was in fact incurred between November, 1952, and the time when she actually closed down the business.

Speaking for myself, taking all the circumstances into account, I do not think that the defendant can be held guilty of a devastavit in the administration

H of the estate. Even if I am wholly or partially wrong on that, nevertheless, I agree with what my brethren have said as to the application of the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 61, and I do not desire to add anything to their observations on that part of the case.

Appeal allowed in part.

POWELL v. BRAUN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 26, 1954.]

Master and Servant—Remuneration—Quantum meruit—Remuneration additional to salary—Bonus on net profits.

On Mar. 18, 1946, the defendant wrote to his secretary, the plaintiff, that instead of a rise in salary he proposed to pay her each year a bonus on the net trading profits of the previous financial year. On the same day the plaintiff replied that the "idea of a yearly bonus is very considerate, and one which I much appreciate". Bonuses were paid until 1951, but the defendant refused to pay a bonus for the years 1952 and 1953 on the ground that no firm promise had been made, and that the promise, if made, was too vague to be enforced. On a claim by the plaintiff,

HELD: as a matter of construction of the letters it was intended by the parties, not that the payment of a bonus should be within the discretion of the defendant, but that he should pay the plaintiff a reasonable sum, i.e., a sum which bore a reasonable relation to the relevant trading profit; the principle of quantum meruit was no less applicable where the remuneration in question was additional remuneration than it was where the basic remuneration was the only remuneration; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover a sum agreed as reasonable in respect of the two years in question.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE GLAZEBROOK at Bromley County Court, dated Nov. 10, 1953.

The plaintiff, Pamela Irene Powell, was employed as his secretary by the defendant, Henry William Braun, who, on Mar. 18, 1946, wrote to her a letter in the following terms:

"You have now been with me for just two years, both of them very eventful, and during the first you did without question many things which were hardly within your contract of engagement . . . As I have mentioned to you on various occasions, it is my wish for you to act and work on your own initiative rather than to feel you must always refer matters to me. I am, of course, on hand for any business problem which may arise, but now we have two juniors it is more necessary than before that you are able to handle matters yourself both from the business angle and from [that of] your own personal prestige and authority as befits your position. I have not hitherto mentioned to you the question of a rise in salary, and with the added responsibility you now have I feel that some recognition of this and of past service is due to you. A stereotyped rise is all very well, but my opinion has always been that a bonus on the net trading profit is more interesting to anyone. I, therefore, propose to adopt this with you, and that, say about May each year, I shall pay you an amount according to the trading results of the previous financial year to the end of March. I cannot say at this juncture what the amount will be, but I am sure you will not be disappointed with it from year to year. I will conclude with the hope that you may stay with me for many a day as my confidential secretary and senior member of the staff even if the latter be only small."

A To that letter the plaintiff on the same day replied:

"Your letter of today was quite unexpected, but a very pleasant surprise. Your idea of a yearly bonus is very considerable, and one which I much appreciate. I do agree with you that this is more interesting than an actual weekly increase, and it is certainly very encouraging."

B The defendant paid the bonuses until 1951, but he refused to pay a bonus for the years 1952 and 1953. On a claim by the plaintiff for, inter alia, bonuses for those two years, the defendant contended (i) that, on the true construction of the letter of Mar. 18, 1946, there was no firm promise to pay anything, (ii) that that document was of so vague and general a character that it was incapable of forming the basis of a claim in contract, and (iii) that a claim based on quantum meruit would not be maintained. The county court judge found that any further payment over and above the fixed salary was in the discretion of the defendant, and dismissed the claim. The plaintiff appealed.

M. B. Scholfield for the plaintiff.

Bramall for the defendant.

D SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts and continued: I have no doubt, on the facts as found by the judge, that the plaintiff's continued service with the defendant would never have occurred had it not been for her reliance on his promise in the letter of Mar. 18, 1946, and, as the judge expressly said, she thenceforth undertook more responsible work than otherwise she would have performed. Still, that is not necessarily an answer to the question E raised, namely, whether or not, having regard to the vague and general terms of that letter and the plaintiff's reply, the plaintiff can now sue for the sums claimed.

Two answers to the plaintiff's claim are put forward. First, it is said that, on the true construction of the letter of Mar. 18, 1946, there was no firm promise to pay anything, but that it was merely a statement that, if the plaintiff continued to serve and to undertake more responsible work as suggested, the defendant F would give her something or nothing as in his discretion he might from time to time think fit. Secondly, it is said that, in any case, the whole document is of so vague and general a character that it is incapable of forming the basis of a claim in contract. Further, it is said that a claim based on quantum meruit or its equivalent in a case of this kind is a novelty which finds no exact parallel in the decided cases. It emerges from a number of cases in which this kind of G question has been before the court that the first and vital question is that of the construction of the document or documents which must be taken to represent and evidence the joint intention of the two parties at the time, namely, Mar. 18, 1946.

The learned judge, perhaps influenced by the use of the word "bonus", concluded in his careful judgment that the true effect of this arrangement was H that, with regard to any further payment over and above the fixed salary, it should be—to quote BAYLEY, J. (1 M. & S. 291) in Taylor v. Brewer (1)—"in the breast of" the defendant whether he should pay the plaintiff anything or nothing. For my part, I am unable to accept that view. I think that the nature of the engagement, the service which the plaintiff had rendered, the circumstances in which the letter was written, the particular emphasis on the defendant's desire in his own business interest that the plaintiff should assume more responsibility and act more on her initiative—there having been two juniors:

engaged—all make it plain that this suggestion for what was called a bonus meant an obligation to pay something in lieu of an addition to salary. The conduct of both parties, to my mind, makes it plain that it was so understood by them both. The plaintiff, whom the judge clearly regarded as a truthful witness, said: "I should not have accepted it [this offer] if I had known that the defendant claimed, as he did shortly afterwards, that the arrangement did not operate for another fourteen months", and so, I think, made it clear that she relied on this promise as being something which she was accepting in lieu of increased salary and in consideration of continued service and greater responsibility. On the other side, there was no hint or suggestion on the part of the defendant until the action had been brought that he was under no liability at all, if he chose not to pay. When eventually the plaintiff left the defendant's service, the only point the defendant took was that there was only one year's so-called bonus "due" from him instead of two, as she claimed. Assisted, as I have been, by the cases cited, which illustrate the approach which the court makes in cases of this kind, I conclude here as a matter of construction that the parties did not mean and intend the payment of a bonus to be purely discretionary.

That, however, leaves the further question whether or not the whole document is in its terms and character too vague and general to be capable of supporting a claim of this kind. Again, I reject that view. Once it is concluded that this was not to be a reward in the discretion of the defendant, then, inevitably, it must be taken that the sum to be paid—unless the parties chose from time to time to agree some other figure—would be a reasonable sum, that is, a sum arrived at so as to bear a reasonable relationship to the trading profit. If there were no trading profit, no doubt, there would be no so-called bonus, but, in any other event, I think the principle of quantum meruit or of reasonable remuneration (which comes to the same thing) is no less applicable where the remuneration in question is additional remuneration—that is, over and above the fixed salary—that it is where the basic remuneration is the only remuneration.

That being so, the rest of the case is simple. The judge took the view himself that 12s. a week would be a fair sum to fix since that would be the sort of additional salary, according to the defendant, which would have been paid if there had not been a bonus, but the parties themselves have seen fit to come to an agreement that, having regard to the trading profits as they were during the two years ending Mar. 31, 1952, and Mar. 31, 1953, a reasonable remuneration on the basis of those profits would be £25 for the two years. In those circumstances I think that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for £25.

DENNING, L.J.: It was said in the course of the argument that no case has been found in the books where a quantum meruit has been awarded in a case like the present. I hope that this case will provide the deficiency. In lieu of a rise in salary, the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff a bonus each year on the net trading profit. The defendant made trading profits, but he refused to pay any bonus for the years 1952 and 1953 whereas the agreement clearly contemplated that he should pay something. The learned judge said that what he should pay was a matter for the defendant in his discretion, that is, whether he should pay something or nothing. I do not agree. I think the defendant plainly bound himself to pay something. The precise amount would not be an amount in his unfettered discretion. It would be an amount within his reasonable discretion, that is, it would be the amount which a fair and just man would pay in the exercise of a reasonable discretion. That being so, I think that we should award to the plaintiff that sum, namely, £25, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. This court is not a court of morals, but I am bound to say that I think the attitude which the defendant has thought proper to adopt in this dispute reflects very little credit on him. In March, 1946, he obtained from the plaintiff an advantage for himself and his business. He now seeks to adopt the attitude that he is under no liability over a period of two years to pay, on the ground that he was never under any legal liability to make any payment at all. When one looks at these two letters of Mar. 18, 1946, setting out the promise from the defendant and the acceptance of that promise by the plaintiff, it seems to me clear that she took the view that she was to get from the profits of the business, if any, a bonus instead of an increased salary, and the consideration which, as the learned judge found, she was going to give for that increased emolument was her promise to undertake further responsibilities. It has not been suggested that she failed in the fulfilment of that promise, but it appears to me clear that it never dawned on her (and there was no reason why it should have, having regard to the reference in the defendant's letter to the increase of salary) that she was going to take on this extra responsibility at a remuneration which rested solely in the discretion of the defendant. That, indeed, as far as I can make out, was not the view of the defendant himself at one time, because he admitted that there was one bonus now due, and, if he was under no liability to pay anything, the word "due" would seem to be an inapt word to use. I think that the judge was in error in finding that the intention of the parties was that the defendant should pay such portion of the profit as he in his discretion might decide. In my view, it was a matter of a legal bargain giving rise to a legal right, and the plaintiff was to get at all events something, provided there were profits. I think the case is covered by the type of authority exemplified by Taylor v. Brewer (1) and Way v. Latilla (2), and I agree that the plaintiff should be remunerated on a quantum meruit or reasonable basis in the way that SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has indicated.

Appeal allowed.

Re LYBBE'S WILL TRUSTS. KILDAHL AND ANOTHER v. BOWKER AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), January 22, 26, 1954.]

Will—Accruer—Devolution of accrued share—Primary provision for accretion.

In exercise of a power of appointment conferred on him by a settlement, a testator, in a codicil to his will, directed his trustees to hold the trust fund "upon trust for the benefit of such of them [A., B. and C.] as shall be living at the time of my decease . . . in equal shares as tenants in common in manner following that is to say upon trust to pay the income of one such equal share to each of them the said [A., B. and C.] during her life . . . and after the decease of any of them . . . the trustees . . . shall stand possessed of the share of the person so dying as aforesaid upon trust in equal shares for all or any of the children of such person" as therein mentioned and the issue of any then dead "and I hereby declare that if there be no child or other issue of the person so dying as aforesaid who attains a vested interest . . . then the share of the person so dying shall be held upon trust for the benefit of the said [A., B. and C.] or the survivor of them or of their children similar to the trusts hereinbefore declared with regard to [the trust fund] so far as may be and the law will allow". A., B. and C. all survived the testator, but on Apr. 1, 1922, A. died a spinster. On Jan. 29, 1945, B. died leaving issue who attained vested interests. On Apr. 17, 1953, C. died a spinster. As to C.'s share of A.'s original share,

HELD: there was no sufficient context in the codicil to displace the primary meaning of the word "share", which meant "original share" and did not include "accrued share", and, therefore, C.'s accrued share was undisposed of by the codicil and devolved as in default of appointment.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of a settlement dated Feb. 16, 1883, and the will and codicils of Philip Lybbe Powys Lybbe and in the events which had happened, the whole, or some and if so what part, of the trust funds held by the plaintiffs as trustees of the said settlement was held (a) on trust for the first five defendants in equal shares, or (b) on trust for the last four defendants as residuary legatees under the will of Helen Lybbe deceased, or (c) how otherwise.

By his will dated Apr. 23, 1870, Philip Lybbe Powys Lybbe ("the testator") gave his residuary estate on trust for Fanny Worth during her life and after her decease on trust for such one or more of the children of the said Fanny Worth living at the time of his decease who should attain the age of twenty-one years or being female marry and if more than one in such shares as the said Fanny Worth should appoint. By a settlement dated Feb. 16, 1883, the testator directed that the fund thereby settled should be held on trust to apply the income thereof in the manner therein mentioned during the lives of the said Fanny Worth and the testator and the life of the survivor of them, and after the death of the survivor in trust for such one or more of them Amy Lybbe, Mabel Lybbe and Helen Lybbe (the children of the said Fanny Worth) and of such other persons or person if any in such shares and proportions and generally in such manner as the testator should by deed or will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for such of them the said Amy Lybbe, Mabel Lybbe and Helen Lybbe as should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry under that age and if more than one in equal shares (subject to hotchpot). By a third codicil dated Nov. 16, 1887, to his will, the testator appointed that, after the decease of the said Fanny Worth and himself, the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of the trust fund on trust

"for the benefit of such of them the said Amy Lybbe, Mabel Bowker [formerly Lybbe] and Helen Lybbe as shall be living at the time of my decease and shall as regards the said Helen Lybbe attain the age of twenty-one years or marry with the consent of the said Fanny Worth and myself or of the survivor of us in equal shares as tenants in common in manner following that is to say upon trust to pay the income of one such equal share to each of them the said Amy Lybbe, Mabel Bowker and Helen Lybbe during her life for the sole and separate use of such of them as shall be married . . . and after the decease of any of them the said Amy Lybbe, Mabel Bowker and Helen Lybbe the trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the share of the person so dying as aforesaid upon trust in equal shares for all or any of the children of such person living at the time of such person's decease who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry with the consent of her guardian or guardians and for all or any of the issue living at that time who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry with such consent as aforesaid of any child of the person so dying who dies in the lifetime of such person leaving issue living at the time of such person's death and so that such issue shall take per stirpes according to their stocks and in equal shares the share which the parent of such issue would have taken if living at the time aforesaid And I hereby declare that if there shall be no child or other issue of the person so dying as aforesaid who attains a vested interest under the trusts lastly hereinbefore contained then the share of the person so dying shall be held upon trust for the benefit of the said Amy Lybbe, Mabel Bowker and Helen Lybbe or the survivor of them or of their children similar to the trusts hereinbefore declared with regard to the said [trust fund] so far as may be and the law will allow."

On Sept. 12, 1897, the testator died, and on Aug. 5, 1919, the said Fanny Worth died. On Apr. 1, 1922, the said Amy Lybbe died a spinster. On Jan. 29, 1945, the said Mabel Bowker (then Vinall, a married woman) died, having had one child, Claude Herbert Bowker, who had died in the lifetime of his mother having had issue five children (the first five defendants) all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years. On Apr. 17, 1953, the said Helen Lybbe died a spinster.

J. V. Nesbitt for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlement.

Arthur Bagnall for the first five defendants, the children of Claude Herbert Bowker.

M. J. Albery for the last four defendants, the residuary legatees under the will of Helen Lybbe.

ROXBURGH, J.: I regard this point as one of the most difficult which I have ever had to decide. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, read the relevant part of the third codicil of the testator, and continued:] I feel no doubt that where the word "share" comes first in the passage by which the appointment is made it means "original share" and that it is the accruer clause and not the word "share" which augmented that share. I feel no doubt that the word "share" where it occurs in the accruer clause means "the original share". It seems to me quite plain that it does, and moreover in the Court of Appeal, in Re Allan (1), a case which has caused me much difficulty and uncertainty, STIRLING, L.J., recognises that prima facie such a word does not include an accruing share. Therefore, as a matter of construction, my conclusion would be straightforward, viz., that there is no second accruer for the simple reason that there are no words in the will to bring it about, but I recognise several things. The first is that that is unlikely to be the intention of the donee of the power. So far as I am concerned, that does not help me much because my answer would be that he did not think of a second accruer and that if anything goes in default of appointment it is certainly not because he intended it so to go, but it may be because he forgot to provide for that eventuality, and I should expect that that was the reason. There is, however, an old saying that a person is not likely to intend to die partially intestate, and I suppose the same sort of reasoning might (though not, perhaps, so strongly) be applied to the exercise of a power of appointment. What is much more difficult is that there is a rule which has been evolved and which is stated in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Allan (1), and I am most anxious to give effect to it, but I have experienced some little difficulty in ascertaining precisely what the rule is.

In Re Allan (1) there was an undoubted division in shares, and the accruer clause read as follows:

"I declare that if any one or more of my said daughters, Marion Harriett, Charlotte, and Sophia Henrietta, shall die without leaving any child, or the issue of a child lawfully begotten, living at their respective deceases, or if my said daughter Eleanor shall die without leaving any child or issue of a child by any husband other than the said George Mence, the shares or share of my said daughters or daughter so dying shall fall into and become part of my residuary estate, and be held and disposed of on the same trusts as are hereinbefore declared thereof."

The Court of Appeal, reversing BUCKLEY, J., held that there was a second accruer. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1903] 1 Ch. 284):

"Mr. Medd [counsel] says that the closing words, 'hereinbefore declared thereof', cannot mean to include that which is included in this clause itself, but that 'hereinbefore' must mean that which appears in this will antecedently to this clause. I do not at all mean to say that that is not a possible, and even a natural, construction of these words; but, in my opinion, we ought not so to deal with this case."

I understand that to mean that there is a rule which the court thought precluded them from giving the natural construction to those words. But, when I come to look for the rule, my difficulty arises. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., continued (ibid.):

"This is a case in which, although there are both original shares and accrued shares, which in a testamentary instrument may very often be dealt with in different ways, it is obvious that the intention of the testator was to create one aggregate fund, and to dispose of that absolutely."

To what is he referring? I am not quite sure, I must confess, but it is quite certain that the testator did intend the fund which was settled to be split up and divided into parts. Therefore, I think that VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., must have been referring to the concluding words of the gift over, i.e., where the testator said:

"shall fall into and become part of my residuary estate, and be held and disposed of on the same trusts as are hereinbefore declared thereof."

He then read a passage from a judgment of SIR THOMAS PLUMER, M.R., in Barker v. Lea (2), and said (ibid., 285):

"Here it seems to me to be manifest, following the words of SIR T. PLUMER that the disposition is of one aggregate fund which the testator meant should remain an aggregate fund, and should not be broken into fragments if some person to whom interests in it were given happened to die."

What does that mean? Again, I am not sure, but I think it means, on balance, that, again regarding the words to which I have referred, it is plain that the testator did not mean to die intestate as regards any part of this fund. STIRLING, L.J., adopted the reasoning of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., and I need say nothing more about his judgment. COZENS-HARDY, L.J., based his conclusion on what, I think, is really the same ground as the other two, if I have rightly construed their language. He said (ibid., 286):

"The . . . point raised by Mr. Medd created for a moment, I thought, a little more difficulty; but, on consideration, I am satisfied that there is sufficient in this will to show that the testator was dealing with his residue as a whole, and disposing of it as a whole."

I understand that to mean that there is sufficient context—it must not be a mere matter of guessing—to show that the testator did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his residue, and I think the context to which he was referring was the words which I have already read.

If that be so, then it seems to me that there are no words in this case which would enable me to depart from the natural meaning of the language used. True enough, I think that the testator intended to exhaust his power of appointment, but that is certainly not enough. I must not merely guess. I must find a context, especially as it seems to me that the strong probability is that he overlooked the possibility of a second accruer, and for that reason alone failed to deal with that possibility. I cannot find any context. There are no words at all resembling the words which I have stressed in Re Allan (1). There is certainly no re-amalgamation of a secondly accruing share with the original trust fund as there was in Re Allan (1), because it is not "to be held upon the same trusts" but "upon similar trusts so far as may be and the law will allow", which seem to me to point to the view that the testator did not contemplate that there would necessarily be any complete re-amalgamation.

On the whole, I can see nothing in those words which could be used to enable me to put on the word "share" a construction which it does not naturally bear, and there will be no second accruer unless the word "share" includes "an accrued share". With doubt, because I am not at all sure that I fully understand the decision in Re Allan (1), I hold that there is no second accruer.

Declaration accordingly.

HILL v. HILL.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Davies, J.), January 21, 22, 1954.]

Divorce—Desertion—Defence—"Just cause"—Estoppel—Pleading based on substantially same matters as relied on to support charges of cruelty in former unsuccessful suit alleging cruelty.

On May 7, 1949, the wife left the matrimonial home. On Aug. 19, 1949, she presented a petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty. On Mar. 7, 1950, the judge dismissed the petition on the ground that, although the wife's health had been affected, that was not due to any matrimonial misconduct by the husband. The husband now presented a petition for dissolution on the ground of the wife's desertion on May 7, 1949, and the wife, by her answer, pleaded "just cause", the matters she relied on in support of this plea being substantially the same as those alleged by her in her unsuccessful petition, or matters which could have been so alleged. In his reply the husband pleaded that in the circumstances the wife was estopped from alleging "just cause".

HELD: on the facts the matters alleged by the wife could not be of such a grave and weighty character that, even though they did not amount to cruelty, they could be relied on by the wife as just cause for her leaving her husband; but, in any event, just as the wife would not have been entitled in support of a plea of constructive desertion to rely on matters which she had previously alleged unsuccessfully, so she was not entitled to rely on such matters as constituting grave and weighty matters giving her good cause for leaving her husband and preventing him obtaining a decree of restitution of conjugal rights; in the circumstances of the case considerations of public policy and the duty laid on the court by s. 4 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, did not demand that the court should inquire into the facts alleged by the wife in her answer; and, therefore, the husband was entitled to a decree.

PETITION by the husband for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's desertion.

On May 7, 1949, the wife left the matrimonial home, taking with her the two children of the marriage. On Aug. 19, 1949, she presented a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty. The husband denied cruelty, and on Mar. 7, 1950, PILCHER, J., dismissed the petition. The husband now petitioned for a dissolution on the ground of the wife's desertion on May 7, 1949. The wife, by her answer, denied desertion. She admitted in para. 2 that she left the matrimonial home, but she alleged (a) that she did so at the suggestion of the husband, and (b) that she had just cause for leaving the matrimonial home and for not returning to him, particulars whereof were numbered (1) to (14). In para. 3 the wife alleged constructive desertion by the husband from May 7, 1949, and repeated as particulars the items under para. 2 (b). By his reply the husband alleged, inter alia:

"2. That [the wife] is estopped from alleging the matters set out in para. 2 (b) and (3) of the . . . answer and the particulars thereto by reason of the following matters:—(a) On Aug. 19, 1949, the [wife] presented a petition in this Honourable Court for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the [husband's] alleged cruelty; (b) the said petition was heard and determined in this Honourable Court by PILCHER, J., and was dismissed by him on Mar. 7, 1950; (c) no appeal has been entered or prosecuted against the said order dated Mar. 7, 1950, and the same is a valid and subsisting order; (d) the allegations contained in para. 2 (b) and (3) of the said answer herein and the particulars thereto are the same or substantially the same as those which were alleged or which could have been alleged in the said petition dated Aug. 19, 1949."

It was not disputed by the wife that, in view of recent authorities, decided after the date of filing the answer, she was estopped from pressing her cross-charge of constructive desertion. The case is reported on the question whether or not she was also estopped from pleading the defence of "just cause".

John Latey for the husband.

Marshall-Reynolds for the wife.
